No one can miss the literary beauty of Mr. Yeats' dialogue or the power of his symbolic representation of the struggle between good and evil; but it is no doubt provocative to those who insist on regarding it as realism, or with perhaps still more excuse take the Irish peasant of the play to stand for the Irish peasant of Kerry or Donegal. The moral of the controversy is well drawn by Mr. Yeats himself in his reply to Cardinal Logue. "These attacks were welcome, for there is no discussion so fruitful as the discussion of intellectual things, and no discussion so much needed in Ireland." And on the whole the promoters of the Irish Literary Theatre are certainly to be congratulated on its successful inauguration. Next year they are to give Calderon's St. Patrick's Purgatory, and plays are promised from Mr. Standish O'Grady and Fiona Macleod.

An interesting experiment is being tried in the New York State Library—viz., the institution of a special department which undertakes to copy documents or make researches, at a reasonable charge, on behalf of students who are unable to come and consult the books for themselves. It is a useful branch of industry which in most libraries is left to private enterprise, and the advantages of organizing it are likely to be felt by everyone concerned. The searchers and copyists would be better off if they were the servants of the library, instead of living, as they now do, from hand to mouth. The student would have a guarantee that the searcher was efficient, and that there would be no attempt to overcharge him. For a student living in London, and desiring to have researches made for him at St. Petersburg or Berlin, the convenience of the plan would obviously be enormous. The new departure in the United States, in short, is one which may be commended to the attentive consideration of the heads of all the great public libraries in Europe.

Reviews.

Reminiscences. By Justin McCarthy, M.P. In Two Volumes. 9 x 6 in., xii. + 444 + 489 pp. London, 1899. Chatto & Windus. 24/-

It is not true of all men—perhaps it is only true of a highly favoured few—that their reminiscences form their best autobiography. There are those who can compile a volume or two of personal recollections which may be read with more or less interest, but which leave behind them either no very distinct idea of the writer's personality or else an impression of it which is the reverse of agreeable. Mr. Justin McCarthy's case is one of the opposite kind. In his Preface, he modestly disclaims the attempt at an autobiography, on the ground that "his life in its own course has been uneventful," and that he has no story to tell about it "which could have any claim to public interest." Another reason adduced by him is that it has been one of the happiest fortunes of his life to meet with a great many distinguished men and women about whom readers in general would be glad to hear anything new; and he has therefore preferred to make these volumes "strictly reminiscences, recollections of the eminent persons with whom he has been brought into association," and not as he insists on putting it, "a record of my own otherwise unimportant doings." Nevertheless we rise from a perusal of these two volumes—and they deserve a much more continuous study than most works of the same nominal description—with a pretty complete and a distinctly engaging conception of the reminiscent, who therein reveals himself to all to whom such revelation was necessary, as a shrewd and humorous observer of men, and what is better, perhaps, a thoroughly genial and generous critic of their characters and actions. There is probably no living practitioner of the two essentially contentious callings of journalist and politician—certainly none who has practised both so long and during periods of such storm and stress—whose record in what Mr. Whistler has sardonically called "the gentle art of making enemies" is one of such absolute and unbroken failure. When we say that we can hardly recall a single really severe or wounding thing having been said of him, even by one of his own closest colleagues, we feel that eulogy can go no further. It is significant that even in the heat of the great Parnellite quarrel, when epithets like "gutter-sparrow" and "little scoundrel" were hurtling through the air, the one and only missile which was levelled at, though it can hardly be said to have hit, or at any rate hurt, Mr. McCarthy was a half affectionate gibe at his excessive gentleness of disposition.

Few writers of reminiscences can boast of the exceptional advantages enjoyed by the author of these volumes throughout his long journalistic career and his twenty years of Parliamentary life. In one or other of these spheres of activity he has made the acquaintance, and in not a few instances won the friendship, of nearly every Englishman of eminence in politics and literature, from Lord Brougham at one end of the political list to Lord Randolph Churchill at the other, and from the Dickens and Thackeray of the fifties to the Rudyard Kipling of to-day. Of most of these he has some characteristic anecdote to tell; and of many he has given us a spirited and vigorous pen-portrait. Indeed, in the art of literary portraiture he is rarely at fault—his one noticeable failure, though that, it is true, is an astonishing one, being his sketch of the late Charles Reade. "One group comes back to my memory," he writes, à propos of a caricature cartoon in a comic periodical long extinct:—

It was made up of a heavy, bulky, grey-headed figure of remarkably ungainly appearance, whom a companion is pushing off the plank into the water. These two were Charles Reade and Dion Boucicault. . . . The portrait of Charles Reade was undoubtedly a caricature, and had an unmistakable quality of spitefulness in it. Reade was, in his way, a fine looking man, big and heavy, to be sure, but with a commanding forehead and clearly cut, although heavy features—a sort of Walt Whitman put into training for the part of a robust English Vestryman.

We wonder how many of those who were familiar with the original would recognize this extraordinary portrait of him. Certainly, to the recollection of most of those who knew him, this "bulky, ungainly" figure survives, for some inexplicable reason, as that of a man of middle height and average bulk, and of, if anything, rather distinguished carriage than otherwise, while the "heavy features" again have, by some mysterious mental freak, impressed upon their memories the image of a countenance of distinct refinement and of a singularly winning charm of expression. Indeed, it was amusing to watch a stranger's introduction to Charles Reade, and to note his blank surprise at finding that one of the most arrogant and truculent controversialists who ever wielded a pen like a bludgeon was an elderly gentleman, with a pleasing voice, an old-fashioned courtliness of manner, and a pair of eyes that looked out with an expression of almost gazelle-like mildness upon mankind.

Another portrait which, though not so wholly unrecognizable as the above, yet approaches too closely to caricature, is that of Charles Kingsley. Here is the description of the impression produced by his appearance at a public meeting in London, where hitherto he had been personally little known:—

Therefore, when he began to speak, there was quite a little thrill of wonder and something like incredulity through the listening benches. Could that really be Charles Kingsley the novelist—I heard people ask—the poet, the scholar, the aristocrat, the gentleman, the pulpit orator, the "soldier-priest," the apostle of muscular Christianity? Yes, that was indeed he. Rather tall, very angular, surprisingly awkward, with thin, staggering legs, a hatchet face adorned with scraggy grey whiskers, a faculty for falling into the most ungainly attitudes and making the most hideous contortions of visage and frame, with a rough provincial accent and an uncouth way of speaking which would be set down for caricature on the boards of a theatre: such was the appearance which the author of "Glaucus" and "Hypatia" presented to his startled audience. Since Brougham's time nothing so ungainly and eccentric had been displayed on an English platform.

We almost wonder that Mr. McCarthy did not credit Kingsley with a nose as abnormal as Brougham's. Surely this portrait, founded on correct observation though it be, must strike most of those who remember its original as overdrawn. But curiously enough the entire sketch of Kingsley, the account of his mental characteristics no less than of his physical appearance, forms the sole exception to the general amiability of Mr. McCarthy's appreciations. His criticisms are more often captious and carping in this chapter than anywhere else. Speaking of one of Kingsley's lectures on History, he writes:—

He flatly denied that there is any such thing as an inexorable law in nature. He proved that even the supposed law of gravitation is not by any means the rigid and universal sort of thing that Newton and such like persons have supposed. How, it may be asked, did he prove this? In the following words:—"If I choose to catch a stone I can hold it in my hands: it has not fallen to the ground, and will not till I let it. So much for the inevitable action of the laws of gravity." This way of dealing with the question may seem to many readers nothing better than downright buffoonery. But Kingsley was as grave as a church and as earnest as an owl.

He felt quite certain that he was refuting the pedants who believe in the inevitable action of the law of gravitation when he talked of holding a stone in his hand.

Here, surely, it must be Mr. McCarthy who has mistaken the object of Kingsley's illustration, and is himself confounding the effective operation of a physical force with the uniformity of the law by which it operates. That Kingsley could have imagined himself to have discredited the validity of the law of gravitation by catching a stone is of course incredible; but, as an example of the way in which the so-called "inevitable action" of an external and impersonal force of nature may be annulled by the intervention of the human personality and the exertion of muscular energy, his illustration—assuming that anything so obvious needed illustrating—is sound enough.

This, however, as we have said, is a solitary instance of Mr. McCarthy's prepossessions having affected, however slightly, the fairness of his judgment. The little biographical sketches with which the second volume in particular of these reminiscences abounds are for the most part models of dispassionate criticism, besides being singularly fresh and original in point of observation. Even the concluding chapters on Mr. Gladstone, a subject to which it might seem beyond the power of man to lend the faintest touch of novelty, can be read with interest; and the hardly less "be-studied" figure of Parnell is set before us in a more vivid and life-like guise than much longer and more ambitious efforts at biography have succeeded in imparting to it. The catholicity of his appreciative powers is nowhere, perhaps, more strikingly attested than in the chapter entitled "After Achilles," where he successively passes in review the characters and individualities of three eminent public men as widely differing from each other as do Lord Rosebery, Sir William Harcourt, and Mr. John Morley; and though, of course, there are in each portrait strokes here and there on the accuracy of which not all critics would agree, it would be impossible to deny that each is in the main a speaking likeness, done with a free and spirited hand. Spirited, indeed, would be no bad description of the whole book, which, long as it is, has been written throughout with a sustained animation which carries a reader unwearied to the end.

LADY HAMILTON.

Nelson's Friendships. By Mrs. Hilda Gamlin. 8½ x 6 in., xvi. + 368 + x. + 383 pp. London, 1899. Hutchinson. 28/-

The importance of this book depends on its containing materials not ordinarily accessible. With much industry Mrs. Gamlin has obtained letters and portraits from the various people mentioned in the preface, and in the course of the work she publishes so many letters from the collection of Mr. J. C. Holding, of Southsea, as to lead her to say that "the documents he gradually became possessed of have formed the basis of this present work on Nelson's Friendships." But when we turn from the materials to the subject we find to our disappointment that, instead of illustrating the bright side of Nelson's character by the many friendships he formed from his youth upwards, the authoress is so possessed by the monomania of glorifying the notorious Lady Hamilton that she says very little about Nelson until he was nearly forty and began to be more intimate with the Hamiltons, while most of the second volume is taken up with Lady Hamilton's troubles after Nelson's death.

Taking the book for what it is rather than for what it is called, we agree with its estimate of Sir William Hamilton, who has in the past hardly received the justice which his talents, his taste, and his amiability deserved. The appendix containing his correspondence, especially with Lord Grenville, preserved in the collection of Mr. J. C. Holding, is the most valuable part of the book, and should be compared with the contemporary documents in the Record Office by all who are interested in clearing up the history of Nelson's command in the Mediterranean at the time of the Battle of the Nile, and its sequel. In dealing with this period from 1798 to 1800 Mrs. Gamlin rightly concludes that the Government in England misunderstood the situation in the Mediterranean, and was unwise, as well as ungrateful, in superseding Hamilton by Paget.

Lady Hamilton's political services also receive ample justice, or rather exaggerated praise. On the well-known topic of the orders to supply Nelson's fleet in Sicilian ports in defiance of the treaty between the Two Sicilies and France, Mrs. Gamlin takes Lady Hamilton's own version of her services in preference to the views of Mr. Jeaffreson, Professor Laughton, and Captain Mahan. But in order to vindicate the Memorial of Emma, Lady Hamilton, to his Royal Highness the Prince Regent (1813), Mrs. Gamlin advances the eccentric hypothesis that Troubridge, who was sent by Nelson from the Ponza Islands to Naples to ensure the power of freely supplying the fleet, landed twice at Naples between June 15 and 17, 1798, and that on his first visit Lady Hamilton's influence with the Queen of Naples was exerted in the manner described by herself. The hypothesis that Troubridge landed twice is not proved; yet we are grateful to Mrs. Gamlin for quoting a contemporary letter of Lady Hamilton to Nelson from the Nelson Papers, 34,989, in the British Museum, although she has been forestalled by Professor Laughton in "The Nelson Memorial." The curious thing is that both writers fail to quote from the same source a far more important letter, which we now publish for the first time:—

Dear Sir,—I send you a letter I have received this moment from the Queen. Kiss it and send it me back by Bowen as I am bound not to give any of her letters.

Ever yours,

EMMA.

This letter from Lady Hamilton to Nelson, which could not have been sent to him before he approached Naples in June, nor after the news of his peerage reached Naples in November, 1798, must have been meanwhile delivered to him by Bowen, Captain of the Transfer sloop, on the occasion when both were in the Bay of Naples, June 17th, of that year. It shows that the reply beginning "I have kissed the Queen's letter," and signed "Horatio Nelson," is misdated by him May 17, and really belongs to June 17, 1798, and not, as Professor Laughton supposes, to May 17, 1799. It also shows that at that critical moment Lady Hamilton was exerting her influence with the Queen of Naples on Nelson's account. What was that influence? We agree with Mrs. Gamlin that in the famous codicil to his last will Nelson spoke of it from his own knowledge; but we all the more wonder that she does not distinguish Nelson's account from Lady Hamilton's. The truth lies between extremes, and is to be sought not in what Lady Hamilton said of herself, nor in what her detractors now say against her, but in what Nelson wrote at Trafalgar in the words "Lady Hamilton's influence with the Queen of Naples caused letters to be wrote to the Governor of Syracuse that he was to encourage the fleet being supplied with everything should they put into any port in Sicily." This guarded statement, far from being inconsistent with the rest of the evidence, at once explains why it was easy for Hamilton, on June 17, 1798, when he carried Troubridge to General Acton, to prevail upon that Minister, who was the Queen's favourite, to write an order in the name of his Sicilian Majesty, which Troubridge conveyed to Nelson, and Nelson, on arriving at Syracuse, July 19, sent to the Governor, Don Guiseppe delle Torre; whereupon the Governor, protesting all the while, much to Nelson's annoyance, that the treaty with France only empowered him to admit four ships, nevertheless obeyed the order, which practically enabled Nelson to supply his whole fleet at once in the harbour of Syracuse, and sail off in a few days in time to win the Battle of the Nile.

On the unpleasant subject of the private relations between Nelson and Lady Hamilton, and the parentage of Horatia, we do not agree with Mrs. Gamlin at all. Her love of eccentric hypothesis suggests to her that Captain Parker was the father of Horatia by a mother unknown. It is true that Parker was constantly with Nelson at the time when "Thomson" so often appears as the father in Nelson's letters to Lady Hamilton; but such circumstantial evidence hardly proves that Thomson is Parker—a conclusion which reminds one of the lecturer's correction that "whenever he had mentioned Alcibiades he meant St. Paul." Moreover, such arguments cannot stand against documents, and it is astonishing that Mrs. Gamlin, having used the Morrison manuscripts, takes not the slightest notice in them of the famous "Now, my own dear Wife" letter, in which, on March 1st, 1801, Nelson, dropping the mystery of Thomson, in his own name addresses Lady Hamilton as his wife, and calls Horatia their child.

It is natural for one woman to protect another; but it is a new and strange portent to find one assailing Nelson's wife in order to glorify his mistress. We do not mean that Mrs. Gamlin's account of Lady Nelson and her son Josiah Nisbet has no merits. She has discovered a water-colour drawing which gives a far more favourable, and, probably, more faithful, picture of Lady Nelson than the miniature discovered by Captain Mahan. She has unearthed two letters of Lady Nelson. Her remarks on Josiah's conduct to his step-father and his share in producing the quarrel between husband and wife are well worth reading. Nevertheless, we are compelled to call this, what Professor Laughton called her previous book on Emma, Lady Hamilton, "a handsome book, beautifully illustrated, but of no authority." She falls into the extraordinary blunder of making Josiah save Nelson's life at the Battle of Cape St. Vincent. She says that Mr. Herbert made no provision for his niece on her marrying Nelson, whereas we know from his will that he allowed her £100 a year. About Lady Nelson she copies the untrustworthy statements in the Life of Nelson, by Harrison—how Lady Nelson made such disagreeable remarks about Nelson's presents to his family out of the £10,000 given him by the East India Company that his father refused to take his share; how uncivil and ungenerous Lady Nelson was to Nelson's brothers and sisters, and unsympathetic to their children, during his absence in the Mediterranean; how, when he returned, she annoyed him so much that one night he left the house, wandered about the streets, and, finally, took refuge, according to Mrs. Gamlin, on the Hamiltons' sofa, but, according to Harrison himself, on their bed. In order to prove that Lady Nelson was "cold, easy-going, and selfish," all these uncorroborated assertions are repeated by Mrs. Gamlin, although she knows that Harrison lived under Lady Hamilton's roof to compile a Life of Nelson under her directions, "in the delightful retreat of Merton Place," as he says in his own preface. What could be more uncritical than to accept an account of a man's wife from his mistress or female friend?

We give the fullest credit to Mrs. Gamlin for her assiduity and zeal, and deeply regret that, dying at the beginning of April last year, she was unable to see her book through the press. The friend on whom this duty devolved remarks in her preface that "Mrs. Gamlin did not see the Nelson MSS. published in Literature, as they did not come to light until too late." Hence we have altogether refrained from criticizing her by their light. But had she seen them she would have seen that she was incorrect in blaming Lady Nelson for not meeting Nelson at Yarmouth, but waiting with his aged father till her husband arrived in London: in asserting that Lady Nelson did not reply to the letter her husband wrote from Southampton after their quarrel; and in supposing that Lady Nelson in the sequel received no sympathy from her husband's relations. We feel sure that, had Mrs. Gamlin lived to read Lady Nelson's repeated and repeated appeals for reconciliation, which we published for the first time on April 23, 1898, she would have reconsidered her whole estimate of Nelson's wife and of Nelson's conduct as a husband.

THE ENGLISH REFORMATION.

1. The Reformation Settlement, examined in the Light of History and Law. By the Rev. Malcolm MacColl, D.D. With an Introductory Letter to the Right Hon. Sir William Vernon Harcourt, M.P. 7½ x 5¼ in., lxxviii. + 515 pp. London, 1896. Longmans. 7/6 n.

2. The English Reformation. What it was, and What it has done. By James Gairdner, LL.D. Macmillan. 6d.

Canon MacColl is a practised and energetic controversialist, and it is impossible to read his new volume without admiration for his skill of fence and his sturdy adroitness of attack. It is no minute historical investigation in which he is engaged; the book, indeed, is not in any strict sense a history at all. It is a clever and penetrating criticism of many modern fallacies, political, historical, religious, and it is a criticism which boldly carries the war into the enemies' country. It is written with terse directness and it is clearly the result of considerable, though by no means exhaustive, study. The writer is a learned man who has based his conclusions on a sound foundation; but the learning is rather handy than extensive, and the polemic interest is apt to disturb the balance of historic impartiality. A book for the times it undoubtedly is, though much of it reads as if it were an adaptation of earlier work; a book to be read and taken count of, but not by any means a final pronouncement on difficult points of historical controversy.

The book clearly divides itself into three parts, not in its arrangement, but as the contents after they are read sort themselves in the reader's mind. First there is the political part. This begins with an amusing letter to Sir William Harcourt, which may well be commended to politicians who somewhat hastily take up a "cry" before they are sure what it may be worth at the polls. Certainly Canon MacColl shows good reason for us to think that there is a warning in the fate of those statesmen who in this century have taken up warm theological questions and burned their fingers. But whatever may be said about the elaborate and sarcastic argument that the "Squire of Malwood" obviously cannot have had any private ends to serve in his recent campaign, it is undeniable that the main thesis of the "letter" is set forth trenchantly and with a very pretty wit. As the voice of a Broad Church Liberal it is worth listening to. Besides this letter, the last chapter is mainly concerned with ecclesiastical politics. Canon MacColl calls it "The Prisoner of the Vatican: a Chapter of Secret History." The Pope is represented to be the prisoner of his entourage, and chiefly of the Jesuits. The unhappy story of Tosti's recantation is told again, and his pathetic letter is given in full. There are dark hints (we do not suppose the Canon means them, though he does protest too much) of poisonings. Both the intrigues which led to the last Papal election and the history of the apparent desire for rapprochement with the Quirinal are discussed, as a prelude, it would seem, to the explanation of the decision of Leo XIII. on Anglican orders. The second division of the book is that in which the leading matters of present controversy are examined in the light of the history of the Reformation settlement. Under this head fall the chapters on doctrines such as the Real Presence, the Eucharistic Sacrifice, Confession, Sacerdotalism, the Intermediate State, and chapters of criticism such as those on the judgments of the Judicial Committee and the validity of Roman orders—this last a very neat example of the "counter-check quarrelsome." Historically, it is not difficult for Dr. MacColl to prove, as Dr. Pusey with massive learning proved years ago, that the doctrines now so keenly attacked have always been held by prominent members of the English Church. By the way, the author hints at what has not been unperceived by theologians—that the Archbishop of Canterbury, in his reference to the Lutheran doctrine of "Consubstantiation" in a recent charge, was not very well aware of what that doctrine was, or is. As to the Real Presence and Confession, the points have long ago been proved nauseam; none the less Canon MacColl is well worth reading on them, and there is one illustration of his view, at least, which is worth noting. He quotes, from Phillimore's

Ecclesiastical Law, a canon of the Irish Church, inculcating the doctrine of the "ministry of reconciliation," which might serve to quiet the fears of some Protestants. The catena of historical instances of confession in the reformed Church of England is interesting, but far from complete; it might have been visibly strengthened by mention of the comparatively recent cases of Lord Selborne and Bishop Walsham How. Dr. MacColl's conclusion is, judged by a purely historical standard, unassailable. "At all events, let it be clearly understood that what the agitators are really demanding, though they do not seem to know it, is a revision of the Prayer-book and a new Reformation in harmony with the opinions and aspirations of Lord Grimthorpe and Mr. Kensit."

Dr. MacColl's criticism, too, of the "ecclesiastical courts and the Ornaments rubric" question will be found almost conclusive. Historically, he claims to prove (1) that the English Reformation was much more a political than a theological movement; (2) that neither Crown nor Parliament has ever claimed or exercised the right of determining the doctrine, discipline, or ceremonial of the Church without the Church's own sanction; (3) that this implies no derogation from the constitutional supremacy of the Crown in matters ecclesiastical. Of the Reformation in Elizabeth's days there is much said in one of the earlier chapters of the book, where the Papal policy is criticized on the lines of Father Knox's publication of the letters of Cardinal Allen. Father Knox, of course, took up a bold defence of the lawfulness of assassinating Elizabeth. Dr. MacColl might have strengthened his point by reference to Mr. Ethelred Taunton's recent book on the Benedictines, one of the most severe criticisms of the Jesuits ever published by a Roman Catholic writer. If, on the one hand, Dr. MacColl has ignored this valuable book, he seems to have laid far too much stress on the gossip collected by Mr. White in his "Lives of Elizabethan Bishops."

The third part of the book may be best described as autobiographical. We hear of the author's visit to Constantinople "on board Lord Waterford's yacht," of his interviews with Döllinger, Strossmayer, Dean Stanley, Canon Liddon, Bishops Roman Catholic and otherwise, the Abbé Duchesne, Mr. Justice Stephen; of his honorary degree at Edinburgh; of how he gave up parish work and earned £800 a year by his pen while devoting his chief time to study, and other matters of personal interest. Perhaps the most attractive statement in this section is this about Mr. Gladstone. "He asked me, more than once, to send him a list of Evangelicals deserving of promotion and who would be fair to their clergy of all schools. I did my best, and the present Bishop of Exeter is one of the names which I sent." Apart from the somewhat remote interest of this last section, the book is one which well deserves perusal, especially by those who disagree with its author's conclusions.

Dr. Gairdner's pamphlet is of quite a different sort. It is almost entirely historical; and it is the work of the unquestioned master of English sixteenth century history. Dr. Gairdner's thesis is that the Reformation was a good thing, but that the English people did not want it. The Reformation was due to Henry VIII.'s desire to put away Katherine of Arragon and to marry Anne Bullen. Dr. Gairdner thinks that much harm has been done to the Protestant cause because many eloquent writers have failed to look this fact in the face. We have no space to criticize Dr. Gairdner's own view, but we confess we cannot forget that a great body of evidence has been put forward for the view which he rejects. Of this Dr. Gairdner is not ignorant; it would tend to the discovery of truth if he would not brush it aside but deal with it exhaustively. This he obviously cannot do in a pamphlet or a newspaper controversy; we hope he will in a book. Till he does so we must confess to a belief that the balance of evidence is on the side of those historians who have asserted that the national irritation against Rome was so strong and the national interest in the theological development of the Renaissance so vigorous that a national and theological reformation must have come, and that all that Henry did was (in a phrase which Dr. Gairdner in a recent letter to the Guardian has accepted) to "open the flood-gates."

A NOTABLE JOURNALIST.

Richard Holt Hutton of the "Spectator." A Monograph. 7½ x 5¼ in., 112 pp. Edinburgh, 1890.

Oliver & Boyd. 2/-

In a passage which reads curiously like a rebuke—and, if so, surely, without fuller explanation, rather an ungracious rebuke—of the late Mr. Hutton's colleague of many years in the editorship of the Spectator, the author of this monograph seems to hint a complaint that it has been left to him to write it. Despite the announcement made in that journal at the time of Mr. Hutton's death by the surviving co-editor to the effect that at the express desire of his departed comrade no formal obituary memoir of him would appear in its columns, "Mr. Townsend," we read, "can never have thought for a moment that what is more or less public property already would fail to come forth some time or other, although he, of all men the one who could have told the most, holds his peace." As the reader cannot possibly know Mr. Townsend's reasons for his silence, and is therefore quite unable to say whether he or his censor best interprets the wishes of their departed friend, we cannot but think that it would have been better for the censor either to have said more or to have said nothing. His own qualifications for the task which, he appears to suggest, should have been performed by another, are, at any rate, or so far as information qualifies, adequate. Of his critical judgment, and of a literary style in which infinitives are occasionally split and events "transpire" instead of "happening," there may be more question. But he has made a careful and sympathetic study of Mr. Hutton's individuality and work as journalist and critic, and by those who are able to make the occasional deductions which are necessary on the score of extravagant eulogy his monograph may be read with profit.

This, however, applies with a good deal more exactitude to the chapters on Mr. Hutton's achievements in criticism and theological speculation than to others. To his work as critic and essayist we endeavoured to do justice the other day in our review of the selection from her uncle's papers edited by Miss Roscoe, under the title of "Aspects of Religious and Scientific Thought." Mr. Hutton was undoubtedly a most able and thoughtful contributor to the perpetual controversy between faith and science; and he was also a literary critic of much subtlety of insight and delicacy of discrimination. The author of this memoir discusses him with sympathy and knowledge in both capacities, if now and then with a slight tendency to rhetorical gush in his manner of expressing himself; and his chapter headed "Religion," which shows signs of intimate personal acquaintance with Mr. Hutton's exact beliefs in regard to certain theological dogmas on which his convictions are not to be gathered with absolute certainty from his writings, is distinctly valuable and informing.

But the chapter on Mr. Hutton "As Journalist" is, in the inoffensive sense of the word, more or less of an impertinence. Among those who, if the writer will forgive our saying so, are more competent judges than any of the authorities he quotes, Mr. Hutton's true position as a journalist was long ago fixed and recognized. The estimate formed by his professional brethren of his powers as a political critic and controversialist was a very high one, and by none, probably, was he more highly rated than by those who, in the stormy days of 1876-1880 and of 1881-1885, were accustomed to cross swords with him weekly in the Press. Hence it is a little ridiculous to find the conclusion that "his was the ablest pen that was constantly employed in British journalism for the last thirty years" solemnly commended to us on the authority of Mr. Stead, and to be told that that eminent person, though "confessing with evident sincerity that many would say he had less in common with the editor of the Spectator than with any other editor," yet, nevertheless, "owed more as a journalist to Mr. Hutton than to any other of his craft." Nor do we exactly need the testimony to the same effect which may be deduced from the interesting circumstance that "a literary lady" once "said to Dr. Robertson Nicoll that the only two journalists of genius in the London Press were Mr. Townsend and Mr. Hutton," and that "the editor of the British Weekly did not see his way to disagree." Again, the author wholly mistakes the nature and extent of the Spectator's influence in quoting the ludicrous remark of "a journal not given to exaggeration" (but apparently not incapable of it on occasion) that if "Mr. Hutton's paper had supported Home Rule, or had even observed a benevolent neutrality, it is probable that Mr. Gladstone's Bill of 1886 would have passed the House of Commons." As a matter of fact, Mr. Hutton's repudiation of the Home Rule policy—though a step eminently indicative of his political honesty—amounted to a confession on his part of so long and so serious a misjudgment of Mr. Gladstone's qualities as a statesman that it was less likely to impress the world than almost any other act of his journalistic life. His previous devotion to Mr. Gladstone had been so profound, not to say superstitious, that the pathetic state of bewilderment in which he was left by the gran rifiuto of 1885 was described with equal truth and humour by a distinguished man of letters as only comparable to the mental state of Tom Pinch when his eyes are at last opened to the true character of Mr. Pecksniff. We sympathise with Tom and applaud his renunciation of allegiance; but we cannot say that the whole history of his relations with his patron intellectually impresses us in his favour. The story of Mr. Hutton's Gladstonian discipleship and subsequent defection reveals a side of his character which it needs a fuller and more judicious memoir than this to bring out.

CAMBRIDGE SCHOLARSHIP.

Cambridge Compositions: Greek and Latin. Edited by R. D. Archer-Hind, M.A., and R. D. Hicks, M.A., Fellows of Trinity College, Cambridge. 7½ x 5¼ in., 408 pp. Cambridge, 1890.

University Press. 10/-

Composition is often spoken of as an elegant but useless accomplishment. As a fact, it is at the same time one of the most effective kinds of mental gymnastic, and the surest test of scholarship. Training as long and careful lies behind a good set of Greek verses, and as much brain power goes to the making of it, as is needed by a student of natural science for what he calls original work. To judge from the volume before us, fine scholarship is not yet on the decline in Cambridge. There are fewer, perhaps, of those tours de force which Dublin delights us with (though Dr. Postgate and Mr. Spratt have the trick); but all the work in this book keeps on a high level, and many of the versions are brilliant. Charlotte Brontë, R. L. Stevenson, and Jane Austen are new-comers in the classical lecture-room; for the rest, the range is from John Bunyan to Queen Elizabeth, from Fielding to the Monk of Evesham, from Shakespeare to a stockbroker's circular. One class of writers, however, has been unduly neglected. Berkeley is inevitable, of course; but why is there no Jeremy Taylor? His noble cadences might have inspired Mr. Archer-Hind to write many a fine piece of Platonic Greek.

The Latin hexameters are perhaps a trifle monotonous, though all are good in workmanship. One of the most successful seems to us Mr. Verrall's version of the scene betwixt Lorenzo and Jessica, which he has made into a graceful Idyllion. There are some strong versions of Milton, who translates so well into this measure that he often looks as familiar in Latin as in English. Mr. Graves has a clever piece of Horatian criticism, done from Byron. But where are H. A. J. Munro's hexameters? Here he is seen as an elegiac writer, but his style is too rugged for that sort. The prettiest elegiacs here are after the manner of Propertius. Dr. Reid surprises us with a graceful rendering of "Jockey's ta'en the parting kiss," and Dr. Postgate with "Here's to the maiden of bashful fifteen."

Vasta sit an gracilis, nullo discrimine ponam,
Nec sit anus faciam sitne tenella pili.
Quare agite, o socii, baccho cumulate trientes,
Et "bene femineum" vox sonet una "genus."

We wish room could have been found for Mr. Vansittart's brilliant translation of " 'Twas brillig, and the slithy toves did gyre and gimble in the wabe." Most of the Horatian lyric metres are represented; Mr. Moule gives one fine copy of Alcaics and some others more commonplace, and Dr. Postgate makes Saba into a perfect "epode."

Nos tu reversos num paves? Sors debita
Stat una mors mortalibus.

Orti tenebris quam tenebrarum cito
Oblivionem ducimus!

There are a number of graceful hendecasyllables, and Mr. Archer-Hind converts Rossetti's Lilith into a passionate poem in the metre of Catullus's Epithalamium.

The Latin prose is remarkably good all through. Mr. Spratt and Professor Jebb appear in the character of Tacitus, Dr. Reid as Cicero the orator, Mr. Heitland plays Julius Caesar, and several of the letters would have delighted Pliny or Tully himself. It would take too long to mention all the good things in this part; but we cannot forbear calling attention to Mr. Spratt's "Broker's Circular," and Dr. Postgate's "Jane Austen." The last paragraph of the Circular with Mr. Spratt's rendering is as follows:—

We can deal with you for prompt cash; for settlement on the next settling day; or for the purpose of carrying on from account to account:—whichever way suits best the requirements of clients who favour us with their orders. Do not delay: buy now whilst the shares are cheap: do not wait till they are £10 each.

We wish we had space to quote the whole of Mr. Postgate's delightfully humorous version; but here is a part:—

Mrs. Bennet rang the bell, and Miss Elizabeth was summoned to the library. "Come here, child," cried her father, as she appeared; "I have sent for you on an affair of importance. I understand that Mr. Collins has made you an offer of marriage. Is it true?" Elizabeth replied that it was. "Very well—and this offer of marriage you have refused?" "I have, sir," "Very well; we now come to the point. Your mother insists upon your accepting it. Is it not so, Mrs. Bennet?" "Yes, or I will never see her again." "An unhappy alternative is before you, Elizabeth. From this day you must be a stranger to one of your parents. Your mother will never see you again if you do not marry Mr. Collins, and I will never see you again if you do."

How poor Elizabeth was extricated from her dilemma we must leave for those to see who shall buy the book.

A remarkable success is scored by the Greek Verse pieces. Here Mr. Archer-Hind shows astonishing versatility in the lyric metres; and he furnishes what appears to be the only piece of comic verse in the book, a kind of Bird's parabasis. Mr. Headlam makes Shelley's skylark warble in Sapphics:—

χαῖρέ μοι, ψυχὰ μάκαρ· οὐ γὰρ ὄρνιν ἔστ' ὅπως σ' ἐγὼ ποτὰ φῶ πέφυκην, ἀτὶς ὠρᾶνω πέλας ἐν νόμοισιν αὐτοδάεσιν

ἐκ φρενὸς μέλπει, ἀπὸ γᾶς δὲ πῆδαις ἴψος ἐξ ἴψους, νεφέλα πυρωθεῖσα οἶον, οὐπὲρ ἄλλοις· ἀμα καὶ αἰδοῖσθαι αἰθέρ' ὄν' ὕγρον.

The same writer gives us a bit of Anacreon and a dainty scholium. Some pieces of rhythmic prose, out of Sir Walter Scott, the Cid, and others, are rendered into Greek hexameters. There are a number of graceful epigrams in elegiacs; one by the hand of the only lady contributor, Miss Stawell. Mr. Spratt gives some excellent iambs; while Mr. Archer-Hind—a te principium, tibi desinet—has several with the true Aeschylean ring. A few of the contributors follow Euripides too closely in their style; his ear was not a safe guide in rhythm, and many scholars do not realize how very rare trisyllabic feet are in the iambs of Sophocles. We are greatly disappointed, however, to find practically no comic verse either in Greek or Latin. The Greek prose calls for no special remark: it offers less variety, but is all good.

Cambridge is to be congratulated on this proof of learning and taste; and be it observed that the veterans hardly figure in the book. Even Professor Jebb is scantily represented; and as for Shilleto and Paley, they are not here at all. When will some discipulus pius collect the floating works of these two?

SIR EDWARD GREY ON ANGLING.

Fly Fishing. By Sir Edward Grey. (The Haddon Hall Library.) 8x5½ in., xiii. + 276 pp. London, 1890.

Dent, 7/6 n.

Judging from the number of works on angling which are appearing at present, the British public does not echo the sentiment of Porthos—La pêche est un plaisir roturier: je le laisse à Mousqueton. Neither, certainly, does Sir Edward Grey, whose proficiency in the higher branches of the art is pretty widely known; and Lord Granby, who edits this new sporting series, could not have made a better choice of a writer to lead the way. We opened the book with a little doubt and with no little curiosity, inasmuch as it does not follow because a man is an expert sportsman and because, as is the case of Sir Edward Grey, he is also a lucid and agreeable speaker, that he is able to produce good literature. But the doubts were dispelled and the curiosity gratified by the discovery of something far better than a dry treatise or a mere compilation of "wrinkles." Wrinkles there are, by which the faternity will doubtless profit in the season which has lately opened; but treatise there is none in the forbidding sense. The book is just a collection of notes, disciplined under various headings, and of autobiographical reminiscences told with unaffected and wholly inoffensive egoism by one whose eyes and ears are quick to observe rural sights and sounds. We forgive Lord Granby for splitting his infinitive in the preface (page v.); we wink hard when Sir Edward writes of a trout as weighing "one-and-a-half pounds" (page 266); we can even endure when he does violence to Gaelic orthography by writing "ghillie" (which represents the sound "hillie" in that language) instead of "gillie"; and we conscientiously pronounce the first volume of the Haddon Hall Library to be delightful.

There is plenty in these pages to charm readers who have never known a fisherman's joys—joys, which, as they testify who know, come parlously near pain in their intenser passages. For such the chapter entitled "Memories of Early Days" will perhaps have most attraction, especially the description of the author's schooldays at Winchester; the excitement of the north country boy at beholding trout of a stature unknown in Northumberland burns, sailing about in the limpid medium of the Itchen; his despair at their unparalleled wariness, and his gradual acquirement of the mystery of the dry fly. Very nearly, too, does Sir Edward touch the lover of the country as he describes the ardent, almost irresistible, longing to flee from London in June when "no coolness comes with the evening air, and bed-room windows seem to open into ovens." Happy he who can look forward to spending his week-ends among the water-meadows of Hampshire. The knowledge that we can so escape "is borne about with us like a happy secret; it draws the thoughts towards it continually, as Ruskin says that the luminous distance in a picture attracts the eye, or as the gleam of water attracts it in a landscape."

Keen fisher though he be, Sir Edward Grey is constantly interrupting his discourse on the craft to take note of the things among which that craft leads him. There is no laboured word-painting; just such natural expression of delight in natural beauty which might arise between two companions in a country stroll:—

May is the month of fresh leaves and bright shrubs, but June is the month in which the water-meadows themselves are brightest. The common yellow iris, ragged robin, and forget-me-not make rough damp places gay, and the clear water in the little runnels amongst the grass sparkle in the sun. Of wild shrubs which flower in June, there are two so common that they seem to possess the month and meet the eye everywhere. One is the wild rose, and the other is the elder. The commonest sort of wild rose is surely the most delicate of all shrubs in spite of its thorns. It is exquisitely delicate in the scent, colour, form, and character of its flowers, and there is nothing more graceful in nature than the way in which a long spray of wild rose in full blossom offers its beauty to be admired. I am not so fond of the elder; when one is close to it there is a certain stiff thickness about the bush, and a deadness of colour both of leaves and flowers, and the scent is heavy and spiritless. But masses of elder flower at a distance have a fine foamy appearance, and I always feel that they are doing their best to honour the season.

We have left scant space to notice the chief matter in the book—the precepts of fly-fishing. It is excellent, both in manner and substance. There is an enchanting description of a certain Irish river (the author is too wise to name it) where the trout were of great size, and for several days defied the art of Sir Edward, even with dry fly. At last he got hold of a monster, which straightway bolted into the heart of a waving tangle of weeds.

Into this one hand carefully felt its way along the casting line, and touched at last the side of the great fish. Nothing could be seen, for it was getting dark, and the weeds were too thick for a landing net to be used in them. I tried with one hand to arrange a grip on the trout, and very broad and hard he felt; but at the critical moment he made the most violent commotion in the weeds, and dashed off somewhere. When all was still I felt again, and found in the weeds only the end of broken gut. . . . On the whole, I think that was the bitterest moment I have ever known in angling.

The plates are worthy of the text; the photogravures of Hampshire rivers are exquisite; Mr. Rackham's delicate head and tail pieces are quaint and appropriate, and we note, with approval, that the binder has reverted to the old and excellent fashion of providing a ribbon marker.

THE ART OF DESIGN.

Arbor Vitæ: a Book on the Nature and Development of Imaginative Design, for the use of Teachers, Handicraftsmen, and Others. By Godfrey Blount. 11½ x 9 in., viii. + 240 pp. London, 1899. Dent. 12/6 n.

This book is important, not only for the craftsman, who will find in its pages an intelligible basis of conventionalized art, but also for all who realize the direct connexion between art and life. Handicraft is a domain of art which seems peculiarly capable of reflecting the experience of the modern world, the necessity for law and tradition, and the union of convention with freedom and progress. This dependence upon tradition is found in every period of great art, and is to be discerned on hundreds of carved ornaments of capital and doorway, when great artistic conceptions were the possession of no single artist. The function of tradition is to define the limitations under which the artist works, and to show that the material of each art involves a special quality of beauty.

To this philosophy, often lost sight of, this volume is an important contribution. It sets forth a system of design which has the elements in it of growth, variety, and progress, and which shows every phase of modern life to be as capable of expression in the ornamentation of house, street, and vase, as the beautiful processions of the Panathenaic frieze. A tradition based upon this motive must, of necessity, depend mainly, if not wholly, upon symbolism—not a symbolism which has ceased to clothe intelligible truths, but a living symbolism, created by new wants and passions. The influence of Blake, of Ruskin, of the early Christian painters, of Ludwig Richter, and others is visible in these pages; but in its wholeness and unity the gospel of "Arbor Vitæ" is original and peculiar to the writer, whose distinction consists in an effort to solve the problem of combining modern progressiveness and freedom with the preservation of the eternal verities. The motive of the book is, in fact, the establishment of tradition based upon evolutionary types, combining within themselves permanent laws, and yet capable of infinite variety, and of being modified by individual temperament.

The author begins with the simple spirals which occur in the oldest form of ornamentation. These reflect facts of nature, and can be woven into complex linear designs in combination with leaves, flowers, and archaic animals. The treatment of space and the meaning of the arcade and frieze are detailed with much insight and beauty of expression. The necessity for enforcing this central truth of vitality and feeling is, no doubt, responsible for a rather dangerous insistence upon expression as the single essential quality. Expression is, no doubt, the final quality which makes imaginative works really worth having, but the expression of the most beautiful thought in the world, conveyed by bad execution or vague symbolism, is imperfect art, struggling, like the art of the Christian middle ages, to express ideas beyond its technical capacity. Yet Mr. Blount constantly implies that correct draughtsmanship means a sacrifice of those qualities upon which he rightly insists; and he maintains, without any corrective or caution, that "we cannot learn to draw till we have learned to feel," which is as if a man should not learn speech until he felt he were a poet. This is allied to the only less dangerous theory embodying his protest against the claims of the intelligence in imaginative art. "Art," he says, "is the language and expression of the heart as opposed to the intellect," and he opposes the simple qualities of spontaneity and directness to the intellectual and lifeless "tricks" of the classical painters with their anatomy and perspective, and the light and shade of the chiaroscuroists. How this antagonism can be maintained we are unable to understand, or how a line can be drawn between the "emotional" imagination of the painter and the "imaginative reason" which assists, selects, directs, and controls. Yet there is so much of value in this book that its services can hardly be over-estimated, and its revelations, of a nature steeped in artistic and poetic feeling, will do something to strike light and heat in the minds of other men.

Mr. Lewis F. Day has added to the list of text books of ornamental design a highly useful work, entitled ALPHABETS, OLD AND NEW (Batsford, 3s. 6d. n.), with an introductory essay on "Art in the Alphabet." The book deals entirely with the forms of letters, and it should do much to deliver us from the tyranny of "fancy types" and make for the virtue of simplicity. Mr. Day writes:—

There are two conditions on which the artist may be permitted to tamper with the Alphabet: whatever he does ought, in the first place, to make reading smoother, and, in the second, to make writing satisfactory to the eye. Neither of these desirable ends should, however, be sought at the expense of the other.

With so just a creed as his basis Mr. Day has been able to produce a book of real value. When he says, in effect, that beauty does not imply elaboration or ornament, but that, on the contrary, simplicity and character, and the dignity which comes of them, are demanded in the interests of both utility and of art, he may be restating an obvious truth, but it is one which a glance at current journals will show to be not yet generally accepted. Many artists are great sinners in the matter of the lettering employed in their designs. Mr. Carruthers Gould's admirable caricatures are frequently marred by this defect, and many other black and white men fail in the same direction. Mr. Day's book should be of value to them, for it contains over one hundred and fifty alphabets of all periods from the Greek B.C. 394 to the very latest designs. As one turns the pages which give examples of all periods, one sees that from the Greeks, from the Romans, from the Italians of the sixteenth century, from the Louis XV. period we have been evolving more and more interesting styles. Among the many new types given in Mr. Day's book. Mr. Patten Wilson, whose lettering in his illustrations to books has always been good, supplies perhaps the most satisfactory alphabet; some of those by Mr. Day himself and Mr. Walter Crane are in excellent good taste. A study of this carefully prepared text-book by designers and printers will do much to cultivate the eye of all intelligent readers of books and papers.

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

The literary diversions of a London police magistrate are pretty sure to show, at any rate, common sense; and Mr. Horace Smith's INTERLUDES (Third Series, Macmillan, 5s.) will be welcomed by all who found in the first and second series not only common sense, but humour, good taste, and a knowledge of literature. They contain two essays, a ghost story, and some verses, the latter reviving, to some extent, the almost lost fashion of vers de société.

The "English Citizen" Series (Macmillan), one of the most successful among the multitudes of series, has had such a prolonged existence that the course of events has necessitated two contributions to it on the same subject. Mr. W. Blake Odger's new book on LOCAL GOVERNMENT (3s. 6d.) bears the same title as Mr. M. D. Chalmers' book in the same series, published in 1883. Since then Local Government has been entirely reorganized. At the present rate of progress it is impossible to say how soon yet a third such book may be required, and indeed Mr. Odger's chapter on the Metropolis was written before the introduction of the present London Government Bill. But Mr. Odger's book, if not exactly light reading, is a thoroughly sound historical and explanatory review of the present condition of our Local Government system, and affords a much needed guide to a very complex subject.

OLD CLOCKS AND WATCHES AND THEIR MAKERS (Batsford, 10s.) is an exhaustive and admirably illustrated account, by Mr. F. J. Britten, the secretary of the Horological Institute, of the development of timekeepers, founded on a former book by the same writer. It is purely historical, and not too technical in style.

RAMBLES WITH NATURE STUDENTS, by Mrs. Brightwen (Religious Tract Society, 5s.), is one of that already large class of books which tell the young naturalist what to look at month by month. The number of them, however, need not be regretted. Mrs. Brightwen's little book is quite elementary, but it is well written, well printed, and capitally illustrated.

For that apparently large class of persons who are docile enough to accept the guidance of others as to what they ought to read, Mr. F. W. Rafferty's BOOKS WORTH READING (Sampson Low, 3s. 6d.) contains some sensible chapters on the choice of books and a list of famous books with a few notes about them. Mr. Rafferty, among other things, has compiled a list of "books on the choice of books," including Mr. A. H. D. Acland's "Guide to the Choice of Books," which is too little used.

ESSAYS IN PSYCHICAL RESEARCH (Redway, 7s. 6d. n.), by Miss X. (A Goodrich Freer), is worth reading by all who interest themselves in "occult" phenomena, since the author writes well, does not theorize, is ready to divest the strange phenomena which she or others have experienced as far as possible of anything sensational or mysterious, and throws much new light on such subjects as crystal gazing, which the non-psychical person is too apt to dismiss with contempt.

The system of self-hypnotism explained by Mr. C. G. Leland (Hans Breitmann) in HAVE YOU A STRONG WILL? (Redway, 3s. 6d. n.) is so extremely simple that the book sometimes reminds one of a mountain in labour. But simplicity is, after all, one of the chief requirements for all prescriptions, medical and moral. A steady forethought and exercise of the will before going to sleep at night, directed to any temper we wish to induce, any action we wish to perform well, or anything we wish particularly to remember, is Mr. Leland's prescription—and by no means a bad one either, as any one who peruses his interesting little book will certainly become convinced.

In THE GREEN WINDOW, by Vincent O'Sullivan (Smithers, 3s. 6d. n.), we have the exhilarating spectacle of a decadent essayist dashing his angry heart against the desolations of the world. The author represents that it is better to die than live, that the wise man will love no one but himself, that "to help a man is like reviving an assassin who has designs on your life," that "it is well to shape yourself to an impassive mien, so that you present the same front at a bridal and at a funeral," and more to similar effect. The essays are sufficiently well written to entertain those whose mental balance they do not disturb, and we have little doubt that when Mr. Vincent O'Sullivan gets away from certain contemporary French influences he will do good work.

Dr. S. Monckton Copeman's work in connexion with the scientific problems of vaccination is of European reputation, and the Milroy lectures which he delivered last year before the Royal College of Physicians are well worth publication in volume form. VACCINATION: ITS NATURAL HISTORY AND PATHOLOGY (Macmillan, 6s. n.) deals, for the most part, with technical matters which cannot be expected to interest the general reader, but the historical portions will appeal to every one. The introductory chapter, giving an account of smallpox in pre-vaccination days and describing the nature of Jenner's discovery, is a most convincing piece of evidence, all the more impressive because of the perfectly dispassionate and scientific tone in which it is written. The whole book, indeed, will be something of a revelation to the ordinary vaccination controversialist, who is entirely occupied with the manipulation of statistics and apt to forget that there is a scientific side to the question, from which some light may be gleaned. Dr. Copeman successfully disposes of the argument that there is no relation between vaccinia and variola, or cowpox and smallpox; and he fairly proves that vaccinia is, in fact, variola modified by transmission through the bovine animal. The chapter on "Glycerinated Lymph" has a special interest, for Dr. Copeman was himself the first to discover and point out the effect of glycerine in freeing lymph from extraneous organisms. His book should be read by every one who wishes to have a thorough grasp of the subject in the light of modern knowledge.

SHAKESPEARE.

To put forward, as Mr. Cuming Walters does in THE MYSTERY OF SHAKESPEARE'S SONNETS (New Century Press, 3s. 6d. n.), a new "attempted elucidation" of the Sonnets must imply one of three things—the possession of fresh or neglected facts bearing on the question, a consciousness of unusual critical powers, or—well, extreme hardihood. Mr. Cuming Walters has no fresh facts, nor can we find that he has placed any of the old facts in a light not already familiar to every scholar who is acquainted with the literature of the subject. His erudition is mainly devoted to the quite superfluous task of castigating the moribund "Pembroke theory." He does not appear to have in any way realized the complexity of the problem which he so rashly handles. To force these most enigmatic of poems to render up any portion of their secret on internal examination demands capacities for psychological and literary investigation of no mean order. The temperament of a poet does not submit itself to easy canons. And, unfortunately, Mr. Cuming Walters' scalpel is a blunt instrument. He hacks and slashes the sonnets to a carbonade, and those who cannot watch the mutilation of the fair limbs of a work of genius without a tear had better give his book the go-by. Two examples shall suffice to illustrate, the one Mr. Cuming Walters' psychology, the other his sense of the meaning of words. His attitude to the "autobiographic" explanation of the Sonnets is determined by an a priori objection to any theory which implies that Shakespeare may have had a mistress. It is, he says, "a loathsome assumption that Shakespeare ever had a mistress at all," and the Pembroke-Fytton conjecture is a "pernicious," "defective and despicable," "nauseous, squalid, and pitiful" theory, which he seeks to demolish "for the love of Shakespeare's good name." "It is a pleasure to help to demolish a case which is established upon meanness, depravity, and abominations." That, as a matter of fact, many poets who have similarly erred have written poetry which has had ethical as well as imaginative greatness is a paradox which does not give Mr. Walters pause. Surely you do not so peer into Hamlet's soul.

This is one point; the other is, if possible, more amazing still. "Do not so much as my poor name rehearse," says Shakespeare to his friend, quite literally, brooding upon death:—

No longer mourn for me when I am dead.
Than you shall hear the early, sullen bell
Give warning to the world that I am fled
From this vile world, with vilest worms to dwell;
Nay, if you read this line, remember not
The hand that writ it; for I love you so,
That I in your sweet thoughts would be forgot,
If thinking on me then should make you woe.
O, if I say, you look upon this verse
When I, perhaps, compounded am with clay,
Do not so much as my poor name rehearse,
But let your love even with my life decay.

And then Mr. Cuming Walters:—

We can now understand why Shakespeare did not wish his name to be revealed as the author of the Sonnets—

"Do not so much as my poor name rehearse."

We have quite forgotten to mention what is Mr. Cuming Walters' "elucidation" of the Sonnets. It really does not matter; but if any one wants to know, Mr. Cuming Walters has summed it up for him thus:—

In the Sonnets we may read of the poet's intense hopes and fears regarding his fate, and we learn of his all-consuming desire for immortality. Begin as he may with his theme, he almost invariably merges into allegory, and represents himself as the contestant—"contestant" is good—of death. Bodily death he does not fear; oblivion he dreads. He therefore argues incessantly on the course he shall pursue to defy the ravages of time and prevent the loss of reputation. He may have the applause of the day (on the stage), or he may command lasting renown (by his pen). His "fair friend," his "better angel" bids him to seek immortality; his "dark" mistress, the alluring woman with the "mourning" eyes, tempts him to delights of the present. The two series of poems are almost wholly allegorical and antithetical.

The "Chiswick Shakespeare" leads off with two tastefully bound little volumes containing HAMLET and THE MERCHANT OF VENICE (Bell, 1s. 6d. n. each vol.). The Cambridge text is used, and each play is preceded by an introduction, short and to the point, by Mr. John Dennis. The feature of the edition, however, is Mr. Byam Shaw's illustrations. These are cleverly conceived and the subjects well chosen, though we are not sure that the illustration of a chance metaphor, as that of the horses making "a mutual stand" at the sound of the trumpet in The Merchant of Venice, is a quite legitimate illustration of the play. The characterization, as of Shylock, and of the grave-diggers in Hamlet, is also good. Hamlet himself, we notice, is given light hair. What we are afraid will not please most readers is the extremely heavy touch which is in vogue for book illustration among some younger artists. We are at a loss to see what is gained by following the methods of stained glass. In most cases the backgrounds and the individual figures are as flat as they can be made: the dense black outlines buffet the eyes mercilessly, and when combined with the heavy masses of unrelieved black they kill all suggestion of anatomy and all delicacy of drawing and not unfrequently obscure entirely the meaning of the artist. We would willingly keep the originality of Mr. Byam Shaw's conceptions if they were worked in the method of Mr. Gordon Browne.

BIOGRAPHY.

The Bishop of Salisbury's life of his uncle the late Bishop of St. Andrews in THE EPISCOPATE OF CHARLES WORDSWORTH (Longmans) is hardly likely to appeal to the ordinary public who like biographies, still less to those persons who think of the Scotch Bishop only as one of those select Oxonians who represented the University both on the river and in the cricketfield. The latter fact, indeed, is not even recorded in the present work, which is strictly confined to a history of Charles Wordsworth's episcopate. His life with all its varied energies has been sufficiently depicted in the two volumes of his own autobiography, the latter of which appeared shortly after his death. To all, however, who take a serious interest either in the Eucharistic controversy, or in the question of Scotch reunion, in both of which Charles Wordsworth took a prominent part, the Bishop of Salisbury's book will be of great interest, and its value is increased by the comments of the author himself—one of the most learned Bishops on the bench—on these subjects, which form a substantial part of the volume.

Mr. C. J. Vignole has, we think, been a little too thorough in his exhaustive MEMOIR OF SIR ROBERT P. STEWART (Simpkin, Marshall, 7s. 6d. n.). The late Professor of Music at Dublin University was one of the best organists of his day, and a refined though scarcely an original composer, who, in connexion with the Irish Choral Society, did much to raise the standard of Irish music. But—though in compiling a faithful biography of Sir Robert's career Mr. Vignole has achieved his own end in a workmanlike way—we think a shorter memoir would have been of greater service to his hero's fame.

FAMOUS LADIES OF THE ENGLISH COURT, by Mrs. Aubrey Robinson (Hutchinson, 7s. 6d.). In a book of this sort, written by a lady, we must not expect an index nor excessive accuracy, but, in compensation, we are given over eighty portraits, mostly very well reproduced, and a letterpress which tells in a desultory way of some women who were famous for any but feminine qualities, and of others who were hardly famous at all, or, at least, whose claims to fame could be packed with ease into one line. Thus, of the subject of the second article in the volume, the Lady Mary Sidney, it were enough to say she was the mother of Sir Philip Sidney; her futile endeavours to get suitable accommodation allotted to her husband during his attendance on the Queen at Hampton Court, the pleading letters which she penned on the subject to this upper servant and the other, do not make for fame, and are really rather tedious reading. From "Bess of Hardwicke," Countess of Shrewsbury, who might well be termed the Countess of Shrews, Mrs. Robinson leads us by the hand across two centuries, down to the Lady Sarah Lennox, an early flame of George III., and the Marchioness of Hertford, a friend of George IV. And she lingers by the way to tell us of Penelope Lady Rich, the "Stella" of Sidney, of Stafford's Lady Carlisle, of "la belle Stuart," and of those fascinating maids-of-honour Molly Lepell, Henrietta Howard, and Mary Bellenden, who rendered Hampton Court, in the days of George II., so desirable a place.

THE LIFE OF PRINCE BISMARCK, by William Jacks (MacLehose, 10s. 6d. n.). When a writer claims to have produced "the first consecutive life of the Chancellor written in the English language," and jauntily brushes aside two such remarkable contributions to his subject as Busch's "Memoirs" and Bismarck's own "Reminiscences," one expects from him something more than a piece of commonplace and often inaccurate compilation. It is difficult to treat Mr. Jacks' work seriously. The "large amount of material" which he has gathered seems to consist chiefly of well-known quotations from the Chancellor's speeches and letters, selected with little judgment and translated with indifferent skill, while the text with which the quotations are woven together into what the author calls "a completed web" is merely an indiscriminating panegyric of his hero in the familiar style of the old Chancellor's Reptile Press. Never a question is raised as to the wisdom of Bismarck's domestic policy, though the failure of his two great campaigns against Ultramontanism and Social Democracy is at the bottom of the internal difficulties with which the rulers of Germany still have to contend. The author's version of the Culturkampf, for instance, has long since been abandoned, even by Prince Bismarck's apologists in Germany, and by the Prince himself in his autobiography. In the domain of international policy Mr. Jacks simply ignores the broader knowledge of Bismarckian statecraft, for which we have in so many cases to thank the Chancellor's own revelations. Such significant incidents as the Gablenz mission before the final breach with Austria in 1866, Lothar Bucher's secret mission to Madrid in the spring of 1870, Bismarck's urgency at St. Petersburg to induce Gortchakoff to denounce the Black Sea clauses of the Treaty of Paris during the Franco-Prussian war, the war-alarm of 1874, the Austro-Russian agreement with regard to Bosnia and Herzegovina, which for the first time caught Bismarck's diplomacy napping, are entirely passed over. Possibly they did not fit in with the author's theories, more probably, we imagine, he had no knowledge of them. For his admiration of the old Chancellor's methods is as uncompromising as that of Dr. Busch himself, and even such embarrassing incidents as the editing of the Ems telegram and the secret "re-insurance" treaty with Russia never disturb his attitude of worship. That Mr. Jacks has absolutely no sense of proportion; that whereas he devotes fifty-five pages out of 500 to the sterile years of Bismarck's early Parliamentary career as a reactionary Juncker, he dismisses in fourteen pages the most fruitful and instructive period, perhaps, in the whole of his hero's life—viz., the eight years he spent at Frankfurt as Prussian representative in the old Germanic Diet (his "materials," by the way, do not seem to include Bismarck's correspondence during that period with General von Gerlach, as brilliant and fascinating a piece of autobiography as has ever been written); that he considers, apparently, as beneath his notice such aspects of Bismarck's work as his organization of the Press into one of the most powerful weapons wielded by a modern State—these are, perhaps, matters of minor moment. But a writer who professes to make a serious contribution to the history of the maker of modern Germany should, at any rate, be careful to avoid betraying his ignorance either of the German language or of German politics by egregious blunders. He should not, for instance, mix up in hopeless confusion the Elector of Hesse Cassel with the Grand Duke of Hesse Darmstadt, nor should he describe as the firm opponents of the Chancellor the National Liberals in the Imperial Diet of 1871, who were the thick-and-thin supporters of both his domestic and foreign policy from the day the first Imperial Diet assembled at Berlin until he turned his back upon them in 1879. Some elementary knowledge is required even for the use of scissors and paste.

HISTORY.

Miss Yonge has so familiarized us with the title she gave to her well-known series of historical studies that one forgets to question its appropriateness. In the case of her new COMES FROM ENGLISH HISTORY (Macmillan, 5s.), which deal with the eighteenth century, it does not strike us as particularly apposite. A Comeo is a small work of art, containing but few figures which are highly finished in all their details. This is certainly not the case with the present pleasantly written but rather elementary essays, fourteen or fifteen of which are almost exclusively occupied with the history of France. Far from each being complete in itself, these "Comeos" would often be rendered more intelligible by more introductory matter. For instance, the first Comeo is an interesting account of the rise and growth of Methodism, but John Wesley, the great founder of that sect, is suddenly introduced without any account of his previous history, education, or religious opinions, all of which must be considered before we can get a true conception of his career. The second, "The Peace of Aix La Chapelle," plunges straight into the middle of the War of the Austrian Succession with no previous account of the causes of the war, or of the opposing parties. The most successful of the Comeos are those dealing with India and America, where the course of events is related in a clear and interesting manner; and there is also a good account of the Siege of Gibraltar. Those on home affairs are not so good. Miss Yonge seems to take no interest in Constitutional History, and allows her admiration for the morals and religious character of George III. to blind her to his persistent efforts to get the supreme power into his own hands by questionable means, and to the short-sighted views which impelled him to oppose reforms, every mitigation of the penal laws, and largely contributed to the loss of the American Colonies, and the alienation of Ireland. The questions of real importance in the conflicts between the Crown and Wilkes—namely, the illegality of General Warrants, and the illegal action of the House of Commons in declaring him ineligible to sit, and declaring his opponent Colonel Luttrell returned—are not brought out; nor is there any mention of the still more important dispute which arose subsequently over the publication of the reports of debates, and in which Wilkes played an important part. It is curious that there is practically no mention of Ireland.

There are a few inaccuracies contained in the present series, of which one or two are important. The penal laws against Roman Catholics were not only not done away with at the Revolution, but one of the most severe was passed in 1699. At the battle of Rossbach, Frederick the Great did not defeat Prince Charles of Lorraine and the Austrians, but defeated the combined French and Imperial Army under Soubise and Hildburghausen. Lord George Germaine was not tried by Court-martial for his conduct at the Battle of Fontenoy, but for his conduct at the Battle of Minden, as indeed is mentioned earlier in the book. The Parliamentary proceedings against Wilkes are also incorrectly given in more than one particular.

We have received from Messrs. Macmillan four more volumes of the library edition of the works of Francis Parkman: THE OLD RÉGIME IN CANADA, COUNT FRONTENAC AND NEW FRANCE UNDER LOUIS XIV. (8s. 6d. n. each), and A HALF CENTURY OF CONFLICT (17s. n.). The first volume, it should be noted, contains a certain amount of information about La Tour and D'Aunay—the rival claimants to Acadia—which was only added to the 1893 edition, and is not to be found in that of 1874. "A Half Century of Conflict" covers the history of France and England in the New World during the first half of the eighteenth century, stopping just before the eventful struggle between Wolfe and Montcalm. It was prepared, we are informed, from no less than 70 folio volumes of MS. material supplied to the author by the Massachusetts Historical Society, and not, at the time of writing, open to the inspection of the general public.

QUAKER CAMPAIGNS IN PEACE AND WAR (Headley, 6s.) consists of the reminiscences of Mr. William Jones, who was honorary commissioner of the Society of Friends' War Victims Fund in France in 1870-71, and in Bulgaria in 1876-77. He had many opportunities of studying history from behind the scenes, and has many striking stories to tell. The following statement concerning Thiers' conduct during the Commune ought certainly to be contradicted, if it can be—

As none of the chiefs of the Commune durst to make their appearance at Versailles, they availed themselves of Dr. Norcott's services as an intermediary between themselves and the Government. Norcott gave to Whitwell and myself an interesting account of one of the most delicate of his missions to Versailles. It was to endeavour to induce President Thiers to agree to an exchange of a leading Communeard named Blanqui for the Archbishop of Paris, Monseigneur Darboy, who had been captured and detained as hostage in the fortress of Mazas.

Norcott pleaded in vain for this exchange of prisoners. Thiers was obstinate, and when Norcott assured him that the life of the Archbishop was at stake, he shrugged his shoulders and cynically remarked, "The old fellow has lived long enough."

This is not the authorized version of Thiers' behaviour in the matter, but if it be the true one it certainly does something towards whitewashing the Communists at his expense. Another story narrates how the same Dr. Norcott was the last man on the Vendôme Column—

He observed ropes attached to the summit and hanging down into the hands of the crowd bent upon the work of destruction in the square below. He hastened to descend the steps, but had not proceeded far down before he felt the whole structure swaying and rocking from side to side in an alarming manner. Rushing with difficulty down the remaining steps, he just succeeded in clearing the foot of the column when it fell with a tremendous crash.

The last volume of the ACTS OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL (Eyre and Spottiswoode), like many of the others, owes its value in great part to Mr. Dasent's admirable preface. The medley of affairs brought before the Council in a single year (1588-9) is so large and so confused that, without the preface, the reader would have extreme difficulty in utilising these minute records. Many of them are only isolated illustrations of Elizabethan law and manners, but the more important part relates to the fortunes of what may be called the English Armada, the retaliatory expedition under Drake and Norris which started for the coast of Spain early in 1589. Mr. Dasent's detailed account of this adventure leaves nothing to be desired. Financially, the expedition was a failure to all concerned, from the Queen herself to the common seamen and soldiers, who received only five shillings apiece. But, in other respects, it was a considerable success, seeing that it inflicted great losses on the Spaniards, while the infinitely larger Spanish Armada of the previous year had been driven round our coasts without doing us any damage at all. Mr. Dasent notes how potent a factor in English maritime history was the south-west wind, which allowed the Spanish Armada of 1588 to enter the Channel, but made it difficult for Drake and Norris to reach Spain in 1589. Perhaps we may draw from these records the further conclusion that sea-power has been indefinitely increased in modern times by everything that tends to render our ships indifferent to weather. These Elizabethan fleets, liable as they were to be dispersed or wrecked by every gale, were comparatively puny weapons of offence. Their success, even when they were well equipped—which was not always the case—depended on luck almost as much as on good management. The majority of the papers refer to Ireland, Wales, recusancy, and piracy, but are not, during this particular year, of exceptional interest.

A NARRATIVE OF THE CHANGES IN THE MINISTRY, 1765-1767, told by the Duke of Newcastle in a series of letters to John White, M.P., which Miss Mary Bateson has edited for the Royal Historical Society (Longmans, 10s.), relates to a period of our political history which is amply covered by other authorities, and on which Sir William Anson's researches have recently thrown so much new light. They were written by Newcastle, then an old man, to his friend, John White, member for East Retford, and they form a narrative, "very secret" at the time, but probably designed for ultimate publication, of the events which led to these ministerial changes. It may be said briefly, that the King, finding Grenville unendurable and Pitt impracticable, had recourse to Rockingham, who took office in 1765 and, after repealing the Stamp Act, was dismissed in 1766 and made way for Grafton and Pitt. Pitt, now Lord Chatham, resigned in 1768, and the ministry dragged on, completely under the King's thumb, until the still more compliant Lord North took office in 1770. The most important part of this narrative is that which describes the endeavour of the weak Grafton ministry to secure the support of both Rockingham and the Bedfords, and so to form a combination of the most powerful of the Whig factions. These negotiations were eagerly promoted by Newcastle, but fell through, greatly to his vexation; in consequence of the dissensions between the Whigs themselves. The letters present us with the usual picture of the King, restive in his constitutional position; of "the King's friends," a mere gang of hireling members of Parliament; of Pitt, difficult but indispensable; of Rockingham, honest and capable; and of groups of mutually jealous Whig noblemen.

The difficulty is to draw a correct portrait of Newcastle, the rather unworthy Nestor of all the Whigs. He had held high office, and had been for about half a century in public life. Yet hardly any one has written of him without a sneer. He was an insatiable borough-monger and a jobber, and fend of place and power. Yet, so far from enriching himself, he died, it is said, £300,000 the poorer for his political career. Perhaps we may conclude that he had moderate ability, honesty according to the standard of his time, and, certainly, an unvarying sense of his own importance. It is clear from many passages in the letters that it was intolerable to him that any Whig Government should be formed without him. But Pitt, though Newcastle did not know it at first, made it a condition that he should be excluded, and declared that he would not sit with him at the council-table. Newcastle's own desire, at the end of his public life, seems to have been that he should have power and patronage, the two things he loved best, without the fatigue and responsibility of more than nominal duties. He constantly complained of slights; grumbled that Rockingham snubbed him or acted without his advice; and, when Chatham and Grafton succeeded Rockingham, he repeatedly wrote that he was the "first sacrifice to Lord Chatham's boundless ambition." In short, to himself he was one of the two or three most important men in the Kingdom; to others he appeared as an exalted but superannuated politician, whose services, never very brilliant, were no longer in demand. All things considered, he cannot be taken at his own valuation.

NEW FRENCH BOOKS.

MM. Colin et Cie. have just brought out the fourth series of the PORTRAITS INTIMES, which is the general title for the collection of essays in the "interview" form which we owe to M. Adolphe Brisson, and an excellent example of which we gave last week in connexion with Balzac. In the chapter on "La Vie Intime de Michelet" M. Brisson has preserved the extraordinary correspondence which passed in 1847 between Michelet and the enthusiastic girl Mlle. Athenais Mialaret, then exiled in Vienna as institutrice in an Austrian family. He also gives us, in his "interview" at Nice with Mme. de Maupassant, a series of hitherto unknown poems of de Maupassant, together with comments by the mother on the early years of Flaubert's little literary ward. There is not a page in it which has not its importance pour servir à l'histoire littéraire de notre temps.

There is a delightful new book of Pierre Loti's to record. The very title, REFLETS SUR LA SOMBRE ROUTE (Calmann-Lévy, 3f. 50c.), itself puts the reader into the proper mood. Criticism halts abashed before such sentences as this, which introduces a little essay here on "Dogs and Cats":—

Les Chats ont des petites âmes ombrageuses, des petites âmes de calinerie, de fierté et de caprice, difficilement pénétrables, ne se révélant qu'à certains privilèges et que rebute le moindre outrage, ou quelquefois la déception la plus légère.

M. Loti, however, is one of the initiated. Such little purring creole souls as these are what his fine Röntgen vision penetrates with ease. An artist of this kind must be allowed to record his thoughts just as he likes; to go off "at half-cock" as often and as frankly as he likes. At Madrid, at the outbreak of the Spanish-American war, he falls into an infantile state of commiseration, but his tears are so touching that you have not the heart to scold; you almost cry yourself. Loti is a thing to be "felt," not to be commented on. And it is enough to state that a new volume bearing his name has now for a week been accessible, and that it has on every page the same old mysterious delicacy.

THEOLOGY.

A most welcome sign of the times is the growing production of cheap and sound religious books. Such are the shilling "Oxford Church Text Books" (Rivingtons), of which we have received THE HEBREW PROPHECIES, by Rev. R. L. Ottley, and EARLY CHRISTIAN DOCTRINE, by Rev. Leighton Pullan; they are just the sort of book which every educated man ought to read who takes the slightest interest in religious thought, but has not time to specialize. Mr. Ottley does not shrink the results of modern criticism; Mr. Pullan's subject makes his book even more interesting, dealing as it does with the phases of Christian thought from St. Paul to St. Augustine, and supplying a concise answer to the question, What is Christianity? The S.P.C.K. are giving us another series, "Early Church Classics," for the same modest sum of one shilling; THE DOCTRINE OF THE TWELVE APOSTLES, that remarkable document of (it would seem) the fourth century which was only discovered sixteen years ago, is here translated and edited for us by Dr. Charles Bigg. Professor Richard G. Moulton's admirable "Modern Readers' Bible" has received a further addition in BIBLE STORIES (OLD TESTAMENT) (Macmillan, 2s. 6d.), which edits the more exciting parts of the Old Testament for the benefit of children and of those happy people who have childlike minds. Dr. Moulton's method is to give the books of the Bible in their proper literary form; and the extraordinary increase both in charm and intelligibility can only be realized by those who have seen the books of this series. We only wish he would crown his work by publishing the Bible in one volume. Meanwhile parents should not miss this new Biblia Innocentium.

Another and more expensive series is the "Oxford Library of Practical Theology," which is being edited by Canon Newbolt and Rev. F. E. Brightman. In their preface the editors declare their object to be "to translate the solid theological learning, of which there is no lack, into the vernacular of everyday practical religion." In this it will not be denied that Canon Newbolt has succeeded in his opening volume, RELIGION (Longmans, 5s.). It attacks its vast subject within, of course, well-defined limitations, being essentially a practical treatise for the enlightenment and assistance of Anglican laymen; it is rather an explanation of Anglicanism as it is most generally accepted than a contribution to original thought. It approaches sometimes too near to the sermon, but it does not cease to be readable; and it bears the mark of a man who has lectured as well as preached, who can make a subject intelligible without making it too loose.

Yet another series is "The English Theological Library," which is edited by Rev. Frederic Relton, and has a general introduction by the Bishop of London. The general editor has given us Bishop Wilson's MAXIMS OF PIETY AND OF CHRISTIANITY (Macmillan, 5s. 6d. n.), that collection of shrewd and profound thoughts which was almost forgotten till Matthew Arnold rescued it from oblivion in "Culture and Anarchy." Perhaps its arrangement in the alphabetical order of the subjects considered made English people forget it, for Thomas Wilson did not write his maxims for publication, and the editor, Cruttwell, had to do as best he could; perhaps its epigrams were above the heads of an age that liked obvious sentiment in its religious literature. Be that as it may, its practical wisdom and its lively turns of thought make it one of the most delightful as well as useful of religious classics.

Professor Harnack's THOUGHTS ON THE PRESENT POSITION OF PROTESTANTISM (translated by Mr. T. Bailey Saunders) (A. and C. Black, 1s. 6d. n.) will prove a disappointment to those who delight in polemics, many of whom, we fear, must have already puzzled their brains over this little book without discovering anything except that Protestantism in Germany is a very different thing from Protestantism in England. It has given up "theology," but yet is troubled by a mild form of the ritualistic epidemic, and Dr. Harnack detects a growing fondness for creeds, which fondness he declares to be essentially Catholic. At the same time he sees much to give him a firm hope in a great future for Protestantism as "a Church of faith, freedom, and patience."

In Messrs. Methuen's very attractive "Library of Devotion" the "Christian Year," on which we commented at length some time ago, is followed by the LYRA INNOCENTII (2s.), also edited, with scholarly care, by Dr. Lock, Warden of Keble.

The recent preparation of a Scotch "Church Hymnary" by the four Presbyterian Committees has suggested to the Rev. John Brownlie the idea of a book on THE HYMNS AND HYMN WRITERS OF THE CHURCH HYMNARY (Frowde). It includes a general sketch of Hymnology in its different epochs, but is not, as he confesses, a book for hymnologists. This appears, to take one instance, from the account of the Rhyme of Bernard of Cluny, where the author points out the difficulty of the monk's task in composing a long poem in "dactylic hexameters," but says nothing of the complicated system of rhyme which he imposed on himself. Mr. Brownlie's theological point of view may be gathered from the truly remarkable statement:—"This, then, was the aim which the leaders in the Oxford movement set before themselves in the Tracts for the Times—to approximate the creed and practice of the Church of England to that of the Church of Rome." But there is a good deal of useful information given in a popular way, and an interesting appendix collates the chief hymnals in use to see which hymns they have in common. One only appears in all the twenty-four collated, viz., "Sun of my soul, thou Saviour dear."

MISSIONS.

The two portly volumes containing THE HISTORY OF THE LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY (Frowde, 30s. n., and 21s. n.) since its foundation in 1785 follow closely on a similar work (of which the third volume has yet to appear) giving the history of the Church Missionary Society. Together they form a most important contribution to the history of nineteenth-century mission work. The Church Missionary Society volumes contain a good deal of general matter about the Evangelical movement. Mr. Richard Lovett, who has spent nearly six years in preparing the present work, confines himself more strictly to the mission work of his society, its most important spheres being Africa, where Livingstone worked for it; India, where it opened the campaign before the end of the last century; China, with the remarkable pioneer work done there by Morrison; Polynesia and Madagascar, in both of which the society came into contact with French influence. The volumes are carefully indexed, admirably printed, and contain many maps and portraits.

All who take an interest in the affairs of the Universities Mission to Central Africa will be glad to read the LIFE OF BISHOP SMYTHIES (Office of the Universities Mission to Central Africa, 4s.), which Miss Gertrude Ward has written under the editorial direction of Mr. Edward Francis Russell. The book has no great literary merit, but the life of the Bishop deserved such a careful and appreciative record as is here given it.

GOD FIRST; OR, HESTER NEEDHAM'S WORK IN SUMATRA (Religious Tract Society, 3s. 6d.), gives the diary of a lady, well known as a philanthropic worker in London, who at the age of forty-six took up missionary work in Sumatra. It is edited by Mary Enfield.

THE ANNUAL REGISTER FOR 1898 (Longmans, 18s.) comes, as usual, as a welcome summary of the events of the year in all the various departments of human activity.

DURHAM (1s. 6d.), by J. E. Bygate, A.R.C.A., is the latest addition to Bell's Cathedral Series. It furnishes all the information, both architectural and historical, that the average intelligent visitor is likely to require.

Messrs. Cassell now conclude with a second volume their wonderful "pictorial and descriptive record" of THE QUEEN'S EMPIRE (9s.). The work consists, as is well known, of large, admirably reproduced photographs illustrating every quarter of the Empire, and all phases of Imperial life, with short notes on each photograph. The selection and arrangement deserve all praise.

Messrs. Ward, Lock have published a new and revised edition of their pictorial and descriptive GUIDE TO LONDON (1s.). The fact that it is in its 72nd thousand sufficiently attests its popularity. The arrangement is lucid, and the maps are numerous and excellent. It is a cheap and commendable shillings-worth.

THE ILLUSTRATED OFFICIAL GUIDE published by the New Palace Steamers Company (2d.) is edited by Mr. Austin Brereton, and contains a mass of archaeological information concerning the buildings on the banks of the Thames and the sights to be seen at Southend, Ramsgate, Margate, and Ostend.

Helen Milman (Mrs. Caldwell Crofton) is a pleasant writer on garden subjects, and her little book on MY ROSES (Lane, 1s. 6d.) will certainly help those who want some simple rules of practice in rose-growing.

Under the playful title of THE BARONET AND THE BUTTERFLY (May: Paris) Mr. Whistler publishes a number of documents setting forth the story of his notorious quarrel with Sir William Eden about Lady Eden's portrait. It is, perhaps, not for us to decide whether the memory of that quarrel was worth reviving, but in the interest of fair play we must protest that Mr. Whistler ought not to have suppressed the most interesting pièces bearing on the controversy. He attacks Mr. George Moore with wearisome iteration; but he does not allow us to read the letter in which Mr. George Moore defended himself in the Pall Mall Gazette, and to which Mr. Whistler found himself unable to reply otherwise than by challenging that eminent art critic to mortal combat on the field of honour.

TO A SILVER BIRCH TREE AT SUNRISE.

What strange, translucent star do you enshrine?
Or does the moon come from her throne divine
High on the azure peaks of night to be
All day on earth the dryad of a tree?

O, first sweet wonder of the adventurous fawn!
Now from the settled palanquin of dawn
The bearers have withdrawn

Their dusky faces and their sable wings,
Hiding behind the hills in eastern fear
As through the golden-rifted purple springs
The sylph whose royal pleasure shatters here
Red roses of Cashmere.

Fair vestal in the sylvan choir of day!
The sun for your dear ministry would stay
From his ascending way:
How graciously his stirrup-cup is raised
To you, the flowerless flower of all the trees;
To you he drinks, and you alone are praised
When from the down-turned cup the crimson lees
Flush deep the sparkling seas!

The kine of snow, the milch kine of St. Bride,
Come from their heavenly pastures to abide
Their milking by your side;
O, sweet to hear, around your silver stem,
The Christ Child's gentle foster mother sing
And croon her morning milking song to them,
"White grow the birch trees; white the lilies spring:
White milk, white milk you bring!"

What strange, translucent star do you enshrine?
Or does the moon come from her throne divine
High on the azure peaks of night to be
All day on earth the dryad of a tree?

CHAUS DALMON.

Among my Books.

NOTES ON SIR GEORGE TREVELYAN'S "AMERICAN REVOLUTION."

By way of an episode in his highly interesting and sparkling "Life of Fox," Sir George Trevelyan gives us another history of the American Revolution. His work comes out at a curious juncture, when the American rebels, who are the objects of his unbounded sympathy and admiration, are themselves, in the fourth generation, crushing what they call the rebellion of people who are fighting for their independence, to whom they are totally alien, and to whose allegiance they have morally not a shadow of a claim. If Sir George Trevelyan reads American journals, he finds in them language of domination not less imperious than was the language of George the Third, the Bedfords, or Hillsborough.

I cannot help being rather sorry that Sir George Trevelyan should have turned aside from a theme by his treatment of which, whether we could entirely agree with him or not, he was giving us great pleasure, to one of which we are rather weary. After all, to tell the truth, this American Revolution was limited in its significance and importance. Separation was sure to come.

Nobody can imagine the perpetual retention of the United States as dependencies by Great Britain. The connexion had already existed far too long. There was no rational ground for it except the need which the Colonies might have of the Imperial power to protect them against French aggression, and even against that there is to be set the tendency of reliance on the Imperial arm to prevent the Colonies from vigorously combining among themselves for their own defence. The Colonies were already in fact Republics, although they received Royal governors with whom they were always bickering, and who did no good unless it were by sometimes repressing a juvenile tendency to the issue of paper money. The social structure of aristocratic England differed fundamentally alike from that of the community of freehold farmers in the northern States and from that of the slave-owning south. Differences of social structure called for a corresponding difference in political organization. The quarrel might have been avoided, and instead of the war and the bitterness which ensued, the daughters might have left the parental home with the parental blessing, and with filial affection unimpaired. So we fondly think. But statesmen, however sensible of the wisdom of emancipation, might have found it difficult to take the step, especially with a George the Third upon the Throne.

The effect of the revolt of the Colonies upon British politics was surely not so great as is commonly supposed, and as Sir George Trevelyan seems to assume. The Crown would probably have gained power by the subjugation of the Colonies. So at least thought George the Third, whose instincts, though not sublime, were pretty sure. Chatham said, in his oratorical way, that three millions of British in America, if they were enslaved, would be fit instruments to make slaves of the rest. Nobody thought of making them slaves, nor was it possible while Great Britain was under parliamentary government. But prerogative, or, to speak more exactly, the influence of the Crown, would have been strengthened. Yet it was not much weakened by defeat. The sympathies of the people were at first, and for some time continued, with the King. The Colonies were far away, and a successful resistance had nothing like the effect of a successful resistance to the Crown at home. Upon the failure of the war and the fall of North, the King was forced for a time to bow his neck to the yoke of the detested Whigs. But he soon succeeded in breaking that yoke, putting Pitt, the Minister of his choice, at the head of the Government, and excluding the Whigs from power, with the brief interlude of the Grenville Ministry, to the end of his life. Nor was the British system of colonial government much changed. Colonial self-government was the product of the Liberal movement, which carried the Reform Bill, and it had its immediate origin in the Canadian Rebellion. The politics of France were more affected by the American Revolution than those of Great Britain.

The war was not fruitful of military genius or great exploits. Washington's moral leadership was superb, but he won no battle. The endurance of his army at Valley Forge is the most heroic incident in the history, and against it have to be set many incidents far from heroic. The Royal generals were about the worst ever sent out by England, and their army was largely composed of German hirelings. In the open field the Hessians won; in bush fighting the Americans. The patriots, according to the express statement of Washington, were reduced to extremity when France threw her weight into the scale. The savagery on both sides, especially in the Carolinas, was revolting.

Sir George Trevelyan's history is in the highest degree panegyric, and in that respect resembles the American histories of former days, though it escapes their grandiloquence. American historians have greatly advanced in impartiality as well as in research. They now admit that there were two sides to the question, and endeavour to do justice to the Royalists. The change is marked in the school histories, which are still supposed to be the great source of American feeling against England. In reading Sir George Trevelyan's panegyric, and comparing it with recent treatment of the subject, we have a certain sense of relapse.

That George the Third was the originator of the fatal policy of taxing the Colonies seems hardly probable. There was no sympathy, there was, on the contrary, strong antipathy, between him and George Grenville. The policy was exactly in Grenville's line, as was the kindred mistake of tightening the pressure of the revenue restrictions and stopping the safety valve of smuggling. Franklin certainly did not think that the King had been the source of mischief, for he speaks of him in the most loyal and loving terms. When the struggle had begun the King's arbitrary temper was aroused, and to his charge must be laid the obstinate persistence in the war of coercion when his best advisers, and even North himself, were for making peace, and only persisted in the hopeless conflict from a mistaken sense of duty to the King. Nothing can be worse than personal government without personal responsibility, such as George the Third had succeeded in bringing about, and the consequences are a perpetual warning to constitutional statesmen.

New England character is painted by Sir George Trevelyan in the most flattering hues. It had, besides the somewhat narrow and unattractive virtue of the Puritan, the good qualities natural to a people whom opulence disposed to hospitality, and whose manners equality preserved alike from arrogance and servility. But New Englanders were disputatious and litigious—both in a high degree. Lawyers were the leaders, and by them the public mind was formed. Every tavern was the constant scene of political debate. Slave owners, who formed the other section of the Revolutionists, are proverbially violent and overbearing. As Sir George Trevelyan advances he will find how human some of his patriot saints are. He has occasion to allude to the cabals against Washington. He will find judgment passed on the character and conduct of the members of Congress by one at least of their number in very decisive terms.

Sir George Trevelyan glorifies—almost deifies—

Franklin. There was much in Franklin that was most admirable as well as very characteristic of those communities, and it was the climax of misfortune when his mediation was withdrawn. But there was also in him an element of New England wiliness and a lack of the strictest sense of honour. It is difficult to understand how he can have believed himself to be rightfully possessed of Hutchinson's letters, or how he could have failed to foresee that they would be divulged by those to whom he betrayed them and work the mischief which they wrought. Hutchinson, it may be remarked in passing, is an injured man. He meant well to Massachusetts.

When all the taxes except that on tea had been repealed, and a fiscal arrangement had been made in favour of the Americans by which even that tax was more than countervailed, the tendency of the Imperial Government to redress of all practical grievances was placed beyond doubt. There might still have been a reason for insisting on the principle, but there was no good reason or excuse for the commission of the outrages which followed, and which Sir George Trevelyan admits could not fail to be felt as insults by the British nation. Too little is said by Sir George Trevelyan, or had been said by other panegyric historians, on this point. Chatham did rebuke colonial outrage, though hardly with sufficient force. Fox and Burke, so far as we know, did not rebuke it, and the omission is a flaw in Burke's otherwise most admirable treatment of the American question.

When the Royal army vacated Boston, it carried with it eleven hundred fugitive Loyalists, who dared not trust themselves to the mercy of their political opponents. "These people," Sir George Trevelyan says, "formed the aristocracy of the province by virtue of their official rank, of their dignified callings and professions, of their hereditary wealth, and of their culture, except so far as it partook of the self-education which was open to all." No fact surely could be more decisive, either as to the respectability of the cause for which the refugees suffered, or as to the temper of those from whom they had to fly.

GOLDWIN SMITH.

Notes.

In next week's Literature under the heading "Among my Books" M. Joseph Texte will contribute a study of Sir Thomas Browne.

* * * * *

Mr. George Moore's denunciation of the works of Mr. Kipling, at Dublin, reminds one of a great pulpit orator's recent denunciation of the works of Abdul Hamid. Mr. Kipling, he observed, "would not have written the most hideous verses ever written in a beautiful language if he had not lived in a specially hideous moment—the moment of the African millionaire"; and he added that the verses to which he referred were "a disgraceful blot on the most beautiful poetic record in the world." It is strong language; but the millionaire who is persuaded by it that his prosperous existence has assisted, if only by "contributory negligence," in the composition of the "Recessional" will hardly take offence. Mr. Moore's attack on Mr. Kipling, however, was only introduced as a foil to equally violent praise of Mr. W. B. Yeats. "In the art of writing a blank verse play," he declared, "none except Shakespeare and Mr. Yeats had succeeded." Why drag in Shakespeare? is the question which this panegyric inevitably suggests; and Mr. Yeats will, perhaps, be something less than grateful to the zealous champion of his genius for having brought it so pointedly to the front.

Since Mr. Kipling entrusted his literary affairs to the house of Macure and Doubleday, rumour has constantly credited him with the intention of prosecuting some one or other with the utmost rigour of the law. First of all, one heard that the parodists of "The White Man's Burden"—whose name was legion—were to be sued for damages, wherever they could be run to earth. Now there comes a circumstantial story that an action is to be brought against Messrs. Putnam's Sons because they have bought up sheets of Mr. Kipling's books from various publishers, and issued them in a "harmonious binding" together with "an informing guide to the Kipling writings" from the pen of Mr. W. M. Clemens. This proceeding, it is said, "seems to raise an entirely new question in copyright law." We should have supposed that the point had nothing to do with copyright, and that it was only open to Mr. Kipling to claim damages on the ground that the so-called "informing guide" was calculated to injure his reputation. However, as the damages claimed are no less than £5,000, and as the house of Putnam's Sons is indignant at the suggestion that it has treated Mr. Kipling badly, the case is likely to be lively and protracted, and "Kipling Limited"—if such a joint stock company is really being formed—will have the fullest opportunity of employing its working capital to the advantage of the lawyers of the United States.

The popular fallacy that there is copyright in titles was exposed at Monday's session of the Select Committee of the House of Lords, when it was pointed out that such protection as is accorded to titles belongs to them under the common law. A man whose name is Pickwick—and the name exists—would have no more right to publish his collected writings under the title of "The Pickwick Papers" than a man of the name of Bass would have to brew beer and sell it as Bass's beer. An attempt to give more specific protection under the Copyright Law would hardly succeed; for it would be ridiculous to give any one a vested interest in such a title as "The History of England," "The Elements of Trigonometry," "Algebra for Beginners," or "The Life of Napoleon Bonaparte." Moreover, as Mr. Cutler, Q.C., pointed out, the Courts already have all the power they need for dealing with any fraud that is likely to occur.

The Anglican clergy do not appear to take a commercial view of the subject of copyright so far as their sermons are concerned. Canon Newbolt, in his evidence before the Copyright Committee, has simply expressed his desire that, quo cunque modo, his sermons should reach as large a public as possible; and Canon Liddon is said to have objected to the reporting of his sermons only on the ground that the reports misrepresented them. Where there is a small or no endowment, however, a minister may get very substantial gain from selling his sermons in pamphlet form, as many Congregational and other ministers have discovered. It is a perfectly legitimate source of income.

Canon Newbolt's patience, however, goes much farther, and endures not only pirating without his consent, but the publication of his sermons, from the pulpit, as if they were the work of some one else—an excellent practice, many people will think who suffer from the crude or prolix discourses of preachers who are "not eloquent as Brutus is." There need be no question of honesty or dishonesty if the practice were recognized, even though all borrowers were not as frank as the clergyman whom a friend congratulated on the excellence of a sermon just delivered. "It was as good," said the friend, "as the best of Dr. South's." "It was the best of Dr. South's" was the reply.

The Religious Tract Society, which has attained its centenary, is nowadays an important publishing house, and issues many works of more interest and importance than tracts; but a hundred years ago its founders—the most notable of whom was the preacher, Rowland Hill—regarded the publication of tracts as the most promising measure that could be taken for the amelioration of the world. In an "Address to Christians" on the various ways by which divine truth may attain access to the human mind the committee of the society makes the following observations:—

Among many others, none of which should be neglected, there is one which merits peculiar notice, and which we would earnestly recommend to the serious attention of the disciples of Jesus, as calculated to be of eminent and extensive benefit—namely, THE DISTRIBUTION OF RELIGIOUS TRACTS.

The distribution of tracts was an easy way of doing good, and also a cheap way—statements which indicate that the committee had an instinctive perception of what was the line of least resistance in philanthropic enterprise. As for the distributor of tracts, an early report of the committee, subscribed, among others, by the father of Lord Macaulay, describes his happiness in glowing terms:—

His piety may be compared to the small rain which, with silent efficacy, revives the hope of a fainting empire. He unites in a plan, whose influence is far felt in every direction; hence he becomes the joyful expectant of good intelligence from all parts, or if the thousands and tens of thousands of tracts which he has assisted to circulate produce no effect with which he is made acquainted, still may he hope that the great and last day will make a glorious development.

This was written in 1801. The religious periodical has, to some extent, now taken the place of the tract. A glance at the latest catalogue of the Tract Society, with its forty-eight pages, shows how far the society has travelled since those simple evangelical days.

The proposal to connect by new buildings on each side of it the main front of "St. Dunstan's in the West" to the other structures in Fleet-street will effectually obliterate the last vestige of a spot which has always been remembered in connexion with the history of printing in London. It was to "The George" in St. Dunstan's Churchyard that Richard Pynson, about 1500, transferred his business as a printer which he had previously started at Temple-Bar in 1493. At "The George" he was followed by Redman and Tottell, while, within a few yards of this place, Wynkyn de Worde settled at "The Sun." These men were succeeded by Robert Copland, Marsha, William Rastell, Berthelet, and other well-known craftsmen who helped to make St. Dunstan's Churchyard, as a printing centre, as famous in the west as St. Paul's Churchyard was in the east.

The reappearance of Mr. Benson upon the London stage next winter will be looked forward to with interest by all theatre-goers. Those who recall his scholarly reproduction of The Midsummer Night's Dream at the Globe some years ago, the careful attention which he then bestowed upon every detail of the text, upon the mise en scène and upon the Mendelssohn music, will be glad to find that this play will be once more in his repertoire. In choosing his plays Mr. Benson has evidently intended to strike a mean between the "safe draw"—The Tempest, The Merry Wives of Windsor, and She Stoops to Conquer—and the scholarly experiment—Richard II., Henry V., Antony and Cleopatra, and Hamlet, to be given in its entirety, as at Stratford the other day. Mrs. Langtry was, we think, the last actress who has taken the part of Cleopatra, with Mr. Coghlan as Antony.

From the point of view of the manager, Mr. Benson is no doubt right not to give too many "interesting revivals," but one or two more experiments would not be without their attraction. As he intends to perform Richard II., would it not be worth while to revive Marlowe's Edward II. at the same time? The similarity as well as the points of difference in the two plays, especially in the famous death scenes of the two Kings, would give great interest to the successive performances of the two plays. Timon of Athens, too, is in Mr. Benson's provincial repertoire, and might well be included in his London programme. There is no doubt some difficulty connected with the performance of this play similar to that experienced by Miss Wallis the other day in reproducing Measure for Measure—viz., that of expurgation, which would be needed, at any rate, in one of the finest scenes. But is Timon of Athens to be for ever lost to the London stage for such a reason? We are stricter with Shakespeare than with our modern playwrights.

The proprietors of the Sunday Daily Mail announce that they have stopped the publication of that paper as a "frank concession to the religious feeling of the public." As they simultaneously announce that the enterprise which they have decided to abandon was a "big success," it is difficult to understand how the "religious feeling" referred to proved its sincerity. One would have expected that it would express itself in a refusal to buy the paper or subscribe to it. That is a point, however, which it would be unfair to press too hard. In any case, Mr. Harmsworth is to be congratulated on his determination to produce another new paper—the Illustrated Mail—to take the place of the one he has withdrawn. By this means he will be able to find employment for a good many deserving people who would otherwise have been thrown out of work. We wish the Illustrated Mail the success which we have no doubt that it will deserve.

A correspondent suggests the following Latin version of Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman's quotation in the House last week :—

Firm and erect the Caledonian stood ;
Prime was his mutton, and his claret good ;
" Let him drink port," the Southern statesman cried ;
He drank the poison, and his spirit died.

Carne ovium solita et leui nutritus Iaccho,
Scotus erat forti pectore ; quid melius ?
Combibit imprudens Anglo suadente Falernum ;
Deperiit Scotus ; quid miserabilius ?

We comment elsewhere on the opportunities of usefulness open to the new department of the New York State Library, which is to answer questions put to it by correspondents at a distance. But if the letter-bag of the British Museum officials is any guide it will offer an unique field of activity for cranks of one sort or another. These persons hold that the librarian and his assistants at the Museum are omniscient, and from time to time they put them the most astounding posers. Here, for example, is a letter addressed to the principal librarian, asking for particulars of moneys believed to be in the custody of the Court of Chancery :—

Sir,—I beg to write to you respecting Cash and Baul I have been told that their is property belonging to this family in Chancery they came from Staffordshire the name appeared in the Lloyd's newspaper 20 or 22 years back I did not see it myself but I have been told will you kindly forward me an answer to this as soon as you can.

So the letter runs, without a stop from the beginning to the end of it. Genealogical research is another topic which brings many applications to the Museum—mainly from American correspondents. The following letter, which is too long to be printed at length, may not be typical, but it is none the less interesting on that account :—

Dry Goods and Notions.
Groceries and Provisions.

Michigan, U.S.A.

Gentlemen of the British Museum,

Dear Sirs,—I have been industriously hunting up my ancestors lately, and, by switching off from the Watson family with my great grandmother I have been enabled to trace them back, through Edward I., to the line of Swedish Kings: the author says they were descendants of one family from father to son, that being the case, Odin was my 60th grandfather, and he reigned 70 years before Christ. . . . So, if I can trace his tribe back, and find who was King of it, it is altogether likely that I can trace him back to Adam. Anyhow, I would like you to give me a hoist, just at this point, and help me over into Asia Minor.

It occurred to me that, after reading all this, you would feel awful bad if you could not do something for me.

In an article on Miss Wilkins in the Atlantic Monthly, Mr. Charles Miner Thompson draws an interesting literary parallel :—

Miss Wilkins' stories have [says Mr. Thompson] a certain rare quality which always gives strength to fiction. It is the air on the part of the author of being exterior to his story and irresponsible for it, of seeming to say, "I do not explain, I do not justify, I find no fault, I neither laugh over them nor grieve; these events are not my invention—they happened. I report them, and allege nothing about them except that they are true." It is this quality, as much as any, which gives a peculiar impressiveness to the tales of Guy de Maupassant. So far as method is concerned, his story called in its English version "A Bit of String" might have been written by Miss Wilkins.

Indebtedness to the French master would probably be repudiated by Miss Wilkins herself; but it is interesting to speculate on what books that might have been written if the author of "A New England Nun" had been born a Frenchwoman and the author of "Boule de Suif" a New Englander.

Apropos of Balzac, a correspondent writes :—

Léon Gozlan used to relate how he met Balzac one day, on the Boulevard des Capucines, "dying with hunger." The novelist insisted on taking Gozlan to a confectioner, who sold macaroni patties. Forgetting his hunger, Balzac plunged into an appreciation of Cooper's "Lake Ontario" (newly published). Gozlan noticed that the shop attendant, an English girl, had heard him address Balzac by name, and was gazing at the author as though fascinated. She was astounded presently by the appetite of genius for macaroni patties, which disappeared by couples. "How much do I owe you?" asked Balzac. "Nothing, M. Balzac," said the English girl firmly. Balzac was nonplussed for a moment; then he pushed his precious copy of "Lake Ontario" into the girl's hands, saying, "I can never sufficiently regret, mademoiselle, that I did not write that book."

Book-collecting is becoming daily everywhere more fashionable. Especially is this the case in America, a fact to which we referred the other day in discussing the continued drain of the Shakespeare folios from this country. In the British Colonies the same movement is observable. In the older Colonies civilization is largely "settled," and, as a consequence, the pursuit of wealth is giving way a little to the desire for culture. Fairly good private libraries are therefore now to be found in places where, ten years ago, such things would have been sought in vain. The real value of books is thus becoming rapidly known, and the fiasco that occurred at the sale of the library of Sir Harry Parkes is a story that will not be retold, for the number of collectors in Australia is not only growing apace, but many commissions are now coming to England for rare and valuable works. Much the same state of things exists in South Africa, where every bit of old Dutch furniture or china, the only things previously regarded as choice, has drifted into the hands of wealthy families who appear disposed to hoard their possessions. People with leisure and means are therefore turning to book-collecting and to building up private libraries, and a curious illustration of this is afforded by the request for a new bibliography of the works of Matthew Arnold which lately came to a London publisher from Johannesburg.

A little volume sold last week at Sotheby's recalled Carlyle's grim remark that, although the aristocrats of France thought they could laugh at the theories which actuated the revolutionaries, yet their skins went to bind some of the books used to disseminate those theories. The volume was a duodecimo entitled "List Générale des Contre-Révolutionnaires mis à mort à Commune-affranchie." The list extended "depuis le 21 Vendémiaire jusqu'au 17 Germinal de l'an deuxième de la République," and it contained some 1,800 names. The book was bound in crimson morocco, with tooled skulls and crossbones and inlays of "peau humaine."

This gruesome method of binding books has only occasionally been resorted to in England. One of the earliest instances was the binding of two books belonging to the Mexborough Library in a piece of the skin of Mary Bateman, a Yorkshire woman who was hanged as a witch at the beginning of the present century. The skins of criminals have also been used for the same purpose. A copy of the life of Cordier, the murderer of Maria Martin at the Red Barn, was bound in a piece of his own skin, and at Exeter there is a book covered with the skin of a man named Cudmore, who was executed there in 1830 for poisoning his wife.

During the first week in June Messrs. Sotheby will be engaged in selling a further instalment of the MSS. and autograph letters collected by the late Sir Thomas Phillipps. There are many interesting letters relating to statesmen and public events in England during the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. Among the MSS. on vellum are the cartularies of Byland and Fountains Abbeys. There is also a long series of domestic papers beginning with the household roll of Anne, Duchess of Buckingham, dated 1463, and including such interesting papers as the journal kept by Sir Henry Wotton when he was in the suite of the Earl of Essex sent by Elizabeth to assist Henry IV. against the League; the original vellum Wardrobe Roll of the ninth year of the reign of Elizabeth, with a fine signature of the Queen; and a large collection of letters addressed to and from Sir Robert Walpole. The extensive MSS. collected by Cardinal Giuseppe Renato Imparali illustrate the private history of the Papal Court during the latter half of the seventeenth century. There are also documents relating to the affairs of the Protestants in Germany and the Low Countries during the period of 1611-1630, and a large collection of papers signed by Napoleon and his generals and statesmen.

American Letter.

AN OPPORTUNITY FOR AMERICAN FICTION. FIRST PAPER.

One of the most interesting books which has fallen in my way since I read "The Workers" of Mr. Wyckoff is Mr. Thorstein Veblen's "Theory of a Leisure Class" (Macmillan's). It does for the idlers in terms of cold, scientific analysis the office which Mr. Wyckoff's book dramatically performs for the workers; and I think that it is all the more important because it deals, like that book, with a class newly circumstanced rather than newly conditioned. The workers and the idlers of America are essentially the same as the workers and the idlers of Occidental civilization everywhere; but there is a novelty in their environment peculiarly piquant to the imagination. In the sociological region the spectacle has for the witness some such fascination as geological stratification would have for the inquirer if he could look on at its processes; and it is apparently with as strong a zest as this would inspire that Mr. Veblen considers the nature and the growth of the leisure class among us.

His name is newer to me than it should be, or than it will hereafter be to any student of our status; but it must be already well known to those whose interests or pleasures have led them into the same field of inquiry. To others, like myself, the clear method, the graphic and easy style, and the delightful accuracy of characterization will be part of the surprise which the book has to offer. In the passionless calm with which the author pursues his investigation there is apparently no animus for or against a leisure class. It is his affair simply to find out how and why and what it is. If the result is to leave the reader with a feeling which the author never shows, that seems to be solely the effect of the facts. But I have no purpose, as I doubt if I have the qualification, to criticize the book, and it is only with one of its manifold suggestions that this notice will concern itself.

The suggestion, which is rather a conclusion, is the curious fact, noted less securely and less scientifically before, that the flower of the American leisure class does not fruit in its native air, and perhaps cannot yet perpetuate itself on our soil. In other words, the words of Mr. Veblen, "the English leisure class being, for purposes of reputable usage, the upper leisure class of this country," the extraordinary impulse among us toward the aristocratization of society can as yet fulfil itself only in monarchical conditions. A conspicuous proof of this is the frequent intermarriage of our moneyed bourgeoisie with the English aristocracy, and another proof, less conspicuous, is the frequent absenteeism of our rich people. The newspapers from time to time make a foolish and futile clamour about both these things, as if they were abnormal, or as if they were not the necessary logic of great wealth and leisure in a democracy. Such things result as infallibly from wealth and leisure as indigence and servility, and are in no wise to be deprecated. They are only representations on a wider stage of the perpetual and universal drama of our daily life. The man who makes money in a small town goes into the nearest large town to spend it, that is, to waste it—waste in some form or other being the corollary of wealth—and he seeks to marry his children there into rich and old families. He does this from the instinct of self-preservation, which is as strong in classes as in individuals; if he has made his money in a large town, he goes to some such inland metropolis as Chicago to waste his wealth and to marry his children above him. The Chicago, and San Francisco, and St. Louis, and Cleveland millionaires come to New York with the same ambitions and purposes. But these are all intermediate stages in the evolution of the American magnate. At every step he discovers that he is less and less in his own country, that he is living in a provisional exile, and that his true home is in monarchical conditions, where his future establishes itself often without his willing it, and sometimes against his willing it. The American life is the life of labour, and he is now of the life of leisure, or if he is not, his wife is, his daughters and his sons are. The logic of their existence, which they cannot struggle against, and on which all the fatuous invective of pseudo public spirit launches itself effectlessly, is intermarriage with the European aristocracies, and residence abroad. Short of this there is no rest, and can be none for the American leisure class. This may not be its ideal, but it is its destiny.

It is far the most dramatic social fact of our time, and if some man of creative imagination were to seize upon it, he would find in it the material of that great American novel which, after so much travail, has not yet seen the light. It is, above all our other facts, synthetic; it sums up and includes in itself the whole American story; the relentless will, the tireless force, the vague ideal, the inexorable destiny, the often bewildered acquiescence. If the novelist were a man of very great imagination indeed, he might forecast a future in which the cycle would round itself, and our wealth would return from European sojourn, and dwell among us again, bringing its upper class with it, so that we should have a leisure class ultimated and established on our own ground. But for my part I should prefer the novel which kept itself entirely to the actualities, and studied in them the most profoundly interesting spectacle which life has ever offered to the art of fiction, with elements of equal tragedy and comedy, and a pathos through all which must be expressed, if the full significance of the spectacle were to be felt.

ROSENFELD'S SONGS FROM THE GHETTO.

Yiddish, in its gaberdine of right-to-left-reading Hebrew characters, had seemed to me such an impenetrable mystery as I sometimes confronted it in the Socialist papers of the East Side, that it was with a joyful surprise I found myself quite able to read it when I came to it in the German print which it wears in Mr. Rosenfeld's very notable volume of poems. It is as easy to read as our Pennsylvania Dutch, and the number of Hebrew words in it is not greater than the number of English words in that dialect, which is as far from the parent German in accent and structure. There are a few Polish words and a very few French words in the Yiddish, and for these, as well as the Hebrew words, Professor Leo Wiener, who writes an introduction to Mr. Rosenfeld's poems, supplies a glossary. It was at first, as he tells us, a Lower Rhine dialect, and it has taken up the various outlandish vocables in becoming the common parlance of the Austrian, Polish, and Russian Jews; and perhaps it has unconsciously freed itself from many of these in reaching its highest poetical development in Mr. Rosenfeld's verse. In the superior interest of this one may well leave all philological questions to Professor Wiener, who necessarily knows immeasurably more about them, and whom I hope I am not disputing in my effort to persuade even slightly Germaned readers that they may hope to know Mr. Rosenfeld in his native tongue. In any event, they will have the help of Professor Wiener's very faithful prose translation, which accompanies the original from page to page throughout the book.

They will have to thank the editor also for the biographical note, which is almost as essential to a full appreciation of Mr. Rosenfeld's poetry; for it is very important, as well as very interesting, to realize that these passionate laments of overwork and poverty come from the heart of a man who has known both. He was born of poor fisherfolk in Poland thirty-six years ago, and fled to England to escape the Russian conscription. There he learned tailoring, and when he came to America he slaved at his trade in the sweat-shops of New York till his health broke, and he was forced into the yet more precarious career of a writer for the Yiddish papers. It is the hopeless misery, the furious despair, of the sweat-shop which cries from his verse "in parole e sangue." Here is the Song of the Shirt from one who made the shirt, and not merely from the pitying witness who looked on while it was making. The opening poem, and perhaps the best, "In Schap" (In the Sweat-Shop), expresses the stupefaction and the loss of self which comes from killing toil, and the mad rebellion against the loss, and then the hopeless grovelling back into the conditions, as these common facts of the sweat-shop life have never been expressed before, possibly because they have never been expressed at first hand before. The strain repeats itself more plaintively in "A Trähr auf'n Eisen" and "Der Bleiche Arpreter" (A Tear on the Iron, and The Pale Operative), and yet again with piercing stress in "Mein Jüngele" (My Boy). This last seems to me one of the most affecting pieces in the book, but it may be only the most universally appealing. It comes from the deeply wounded heart of love in such prayer, such protest, to the human instinct in all, that even those so happily placed in life as to be able to leave their children altogether to servants and governesses must feel for the father who goes to work too early and comes home too late to see his boy awake, and can only hear him babbling of him in dreams.

It is very simple; Mr. Rosenfeld's work is always simple, but it seems the greater on that account, and it is not the less subtle. What the poet's economic creed is may be inferred from the fact that he holds the conditions to blame, and not the greed and cruelty of certain bad men. It is on the "system" that he invokes the curse, and not on the boss, or the capitalist, or the judge. The whole anguish of society-made misery is poured out in the powerful poem of "Das Areme Gesind" (The Beggar Family), which ends with such a malediction. "Varzweifung" (Despair) is the hopeless wail of all the generations of toilers; and such a poem as "Was is' die Welt?" (What is the World?) seems to image the new man standing up in the ruin of the immemorial slave. It is by no means the best in the book; and yet it has certain qualities which have tempted me to put it into English rhythm for such readers as have not the original at hand. I have kept the measure and movement of the Yiddish, but I have sacrificed the rhyme to the greater literalness of the version.

WHAT IS THE WORLD?

And if our world is but a sleeping room,
And if our life is but a dreaming:
Then I wish it to happen that my few years, too,
Shall pass in agreeable visions.

I want my own visions of freedom and joy,
Like those of the fine people yonder;
I want in my slumber one glimpse of delight;
Of tears I am tired of dreaming.

And if our world is a fair banquet, a ball,
Where we all as guests are invited,
Then I wish to sit, too, at my ease in the hall,
And have my own share in the feasting.

I too can digest a thing that is good,
I can very well manage a dainty;
I have in my body the very same blood
As those who have treasure uncounted.

And if our world is but a garden fair,
Where roses on all sides are blooming,
Then I wish to stray through its paths as I please,
And not as the rich shall allow me.

I wish to wear, I too, my garland of flowers,
I seek not for thorns to adorn me;
I want to roam there with my love at my side
In the glow of the myrtles and laurels.

And now if our world is a red battle-field,
Where the strong with the weak are contending,
Then I care not for storm, for wife or for child,
I stand not aloof from the struggle.

I plunge under fire; a hero I grow;
Like a lion I fight for the weaker;
And if a ball strike, and I fall on the field,
I also can greet death with laughter.

Besides the Songs of Labour, there are some National Songs and Miscellaneous Pieces. Through all runs a strain of unfathomable sadness, which never rises to gaiety and rarely to hope, but which pleases as the constant melancholy of Leopardi pleases. Now and then there is something that recalls the weird charm of the German romantic poets, but in this new singer of the underworld of overwork there is a richer pathos, a keener passion than their medievalized dreamery ever knew. It is his sufficient glory to speak to whoever reads him, for all those crushed by the "system" which once threatened to grind out his own being. When they think, they think such thoughts as his; he is their misery uttering itself in music; he is their voice.

It is not so strange that this voice should first make itself heard among us if, as the people of that sort of thinking believe, the "system" has its way here less trammelled by legislation and opinion than anywhere else. Amid their economic slavery our incongruous political liberty invites those suffering from the "system" to the revolt and protest which are of the heart of Mr. Rosenfeld's poetry. These are the social reasons why the speech of an oppressed people should flower here in a beauty unknown to it before; but this development of the dialect may be in the process of evolution from sources not so palpable. I find a certain pathos in the conjecture that this outcast parlance is probably reaching its supreme effect in the moment before it is lost in the world of American-English about it.

W. D. HOWELLS.

(Copyright, 1899, in the United States of America, by Harper and Brothers.)

FICTION.

On the Edge of the Empire. By Edgar Jepson and Captain D. Beames. 7½ x 5 in., 276 pp. London, 1899. Heinemann. 6/-

Mr. Edgar Jepson's humour, familiar to most of us through his "Passion for Romance" and its sequel, is of so essentially modern a type that the background of unrelieved Orientalism of the present book hardly sets it off to advantage. He has wisely chosen a soldier as his collaborator. The sketches of pure Indian life show observation of no common quality and, occasionally, a tragic power that is unexpected. But the undiluted native will not hold the interest of English readers much longer without plenty of the British element thrown in. In "On the Edge of the Empire" an occasional colonel, or even Mem Sahib, does play a part; but the sketches, for the most part, keep to the native point of view. There is much that will probably be new to English readers. For example, the idyllic vision of the Babu shown in "The Regimental Babu" certainly throws a new light upon his uses.

In a corps in which the men are of one race, the officers of another, there must needs be many points of friction. With the best will in the world it is impossible to learn of oneself what the native soldier really wants. He is too stupid to see that the Sahibs cannot possibly know what they have never learned or seen, and he will always believe that they know the ins and outs of his life as intimately as he does himself. Consequently, in making his requests, he leaves out nearly everything which would make his meaning plain; he is generally incapable of expressing his ideas even to himself; and, lastly, he suffers from a total want of mental perspective and an extremely limited vocabulary. . . . Here is where the Babu comes in. He has acquired an intimate knowledge of each sepoy's private affairs; he can understand all their dialects after a fashion of his own; and he also knows all about the Sahibs and understands very well their difficulties, though his knowledge of English is often scanty. . . . Though an Indian, he lacks the utter selfishness of his race. He will attend to the affairs of strangers even when his own affairs claim his time, and for the most part out of pure benevolence.

We are tempted to wish for a separate novel, on different lines, from both Mr. Jepson and Captain Beames. The former can hardly do much better than give us another cheerfully cynical novel like "The Passion for Romance"; while Captain Beames has probably plenty of knowledge left of Indian life, both white and dusky.

In THE PHILOSOPHY OF THE MARQUISE (Grant Richards, 3s. 6d.) Mrs. Belloc-Lowndes has done an exceedingly clever thing. She has attempted the task, as unusual as it is difficult, of telling a story by means of dialogue only. In the airiest way, and by means of the sketchiest conversations of the always sketchy society set, she presents us with a large number of uncommonly well-individualized characters, and sufficient material for the making of dozens of novels. There is laughter in these interwoven life-stories, and tears, comedy, and tragedy—tragedy, indeed, of the very grimmest sort. Yet you must dig to find it and to realize its grimness to the fullest extent, and if you dislike tragedy you can refrain from digging and keep to the smiling surface of things, as do the persons most nearly concerned. For nothing is definitely stated; all remains mere suggestion, mere inference, the unformulated suspicions which gather round the crisis being transmitted almost without formulation to the mind of the reader in singularly skilful fashion. The Marquise of the title, a French visitor at an English country house, is a delightful creature, well-bred, witty, warm-hearted; and the chapters given to the newspaper offices of "The Trafalgar Flag" and "The Daily Copybook" are among the best in the book. Here the author has her foot upon her native heath, so to speak, and the result is hugely entertaining.

THE UNCALLED, by Paul Laurence Dunbar (Service and Paton, 5s.), marks something of a new departure in the author, whose negro-sketches are fairly well known in this country. The plot has more of grimness in it than of humour, though there is plenty of incidental fun, and the talk is as racy as anything in "Folks from Dixie." The poor little waif who becomes the "mission" of a maiden lady in a prim little village, which never allows him to forget his parentage eventually works his way to happiness in a manner which is well described and convincing. We could wish that all publishers would follow the courteous example of Messrs. Service and Paton, who cut the leaves of their books "for the convenience of reviewers."

GREY WEATHER is the title, and Moorland Tales of My Own People is the subtitle, of a volume of short stories by Mr. John Buchan (Lane, 6s.). Readers who insist upon action and movement will not care for them; but readers who are content with atmosphere will be satisfied—provided always that Scotch atmosphere appeals to them. It is seldom that anything happens in any of Mr. Buchan's stories. Or, rather, what happens is usually nothing more than that the narrator loses his way on the hill-side, or among the peat-bogs, and meets a shepherd or other solitary, of whom a character sketch is given. The thing is well done; the impression intended seldom fails to be conveyed. But the stories are too much alike; the impression is too frequently repeated; with the result that the reader, after a while, is overtaken by fatigue. All the stories but one are written in the difficult Caledonian tongue.

A TRIP TO PARADOXIA (Greening, 5s. n.) is the title Mr. T. H. S. Escott gives to his collection of some dozen social and political sketches, and is also the name of the first and longest of them. Mr. Escott's style when in lighter vein is well known, and this book, which is rather flamboyantly dedicated to the Earl of Rosebery, to the house of Stanhope, to Sir William and Lady Priestley, &c., will, without adding greatly to his reputation, provide an hour or two of amusing reading. Many of the characters could, no doubt, be traced to originals, but the note of "actuality" which the sub-title "Humours of the Hour" suggests is hardly sustained throughout the volume.

ANNE MAULEVERER (Methuen, 6s.), the latest novel by Mrs. Mannington Caffyn ("Iota"), the author of "The Yellow Aster," is intensely interesting, and the humour and irony not far to seek, but the writing itself is often poor. Here and there colloquialism is carried to the point of slang and commonplace. The story is the development of the character of Anne Mauleverer, who interests one from the very beginning of the book. She is an artist and half Irish, and in the course of her work and studies in Italy she interests herself in the Royal stables, and, believing that by right of being an Irishwoman she understands more about horses than all the stud grooms in Italy, she by accident impresses that idea upon the King, the result being a series of amusing incidents. Anne is closely and vividly portrayed. Father Butler, an excellently-drawn priest, gives a clear picture of her nature:—

However things had gone [he says] you could never have been a really happy woman. You feel too much. You're too honest. You're rather too elemental. You have the imagination of a primitive people, and pain haunts you. It will take a life or so before you accept frankly the ultimate justice of God. Perhaps even longer before you become meek.

"Anne Mauleverer" deserves, we think, as wide a popularity as "The Yellow Aster."

MISS CAYLEY'S ADVENTURES, by Grant Allen (Grant Richards, 6s.), is a set of short stories which have already appeared serially. The "series of short stories" is a comparatively new development of the literary craft; and in a good series, such as this is, one may examine the rules that have to be followed. The first rule seems to be that, instead of a plot out of which incidents arise, the storyteller must start with a central theme on which incidents can be hung, as clothes are hung upon a peg; by this means the instalments acquire a certain independence of each other, and no reader need shrink from reading No. 3 because he has missed Nos. 1 and 2, and does not expect to be able to buy No. 4. The second rule has to do with the choice of a hero or heroine. The field of selection is wide; so far as we can see it is only limited by one condition. The hero, or heroine, may be handsome or ugly, virtuous or vicious, but he, or she, must be sufficiently a fool to be always getting into a mess, and sufficiently nimble-witted (or lucky) to get out of it successfully. In each instalment the hero, or heroine, gets into, and out of, one definite quandary. That was the plan on which Mr. Cutcliffe Hyne wrote "Captain Kettle" and Mr. Conan Doyle "Brigadier Gerard" and Mr. Marriott Watson "The Skirts of Chance;" that is also the plan on which Mr. Grant Allen has written "Miss Cayley's Adventures." They are good enough in their way, and there is only a small dose of improbability in each of them. Improbability, however, is a literary medicine with cumulative effects; and twelve doses of it taken in rapid succession are calculated to leave the patient's nerves rather shattered.

STORIES OF REBEL IRELAND.

The policy of writing such stories as THE REBELS (Ward, Lock, 6s.) may be questioned, for they must help to keep alive animosities which were much better allowed to die, but after making that protest we can congratulate Mr. McDonnell Bodkin, Q.C., on the ability with which he has performed his task.

He, at any rate, is not one "who fears to speak of Ninety Eight." He sides uncompromisingly with the rebels, and the picture which he draws of English cruelty would be terrible indeed if we could believe in its accuracy. Some truth there is in it no doubt—far too much, we are afraid—but Mr. Bodkin gives us no relief. According to him, every English soldier who set foot in Ireland during this disastrous period of its history was an utter savage, without a particle of humanity in his nature. He seems, also, to have been a thorough coward, ready to run at the sight of a pike or of a French uniform, and successful in the end only by reason of overwhelming numbers and with the aid of Irish treachery. It is quite possible to regret much that was done during the rebellion, and yet to be unable to think so badly of one's fellow-countrymen. Certainly cowardice has never been one of their faults. To say that the story is based on facts will not help it here; Mr. Bodkin knows the meaning of "special pleading" better than most of us. It is unfortunate for him that his chief character, Lord Edward Fitzgerald, should have died in Newgate before the rebellion began, for after that event his story flags. But in Christy Culkin he has depicted an admirable specimen of the better sort of Irish peasant—one who had no taste for the hideous reprisals in which his comrades indulged—and every reader will rejoice when he and Maurice Blake and his wife get safely on board the schooner which is to carry them to a happier home in America. In many respects "The Rebels" is a better book than any other that its author has yet written. It shows a surer touch, and will be read with interest even by many who disapprove of its sentiments.

The sympathies of Mr. Rupert Alexander, the author of MAUREEN MOORE (Burligh, 6s.), are, like Mr. Bodkin's, with the rebels. It is a curiously formless story, yet it has a value which many infinitely better stories lack. For the author writes of Ireland as only a close observer could, and of the condition of the country at the time of the abortive rising in '98 he has given a fairly faithful picture. When he attempts to draw an English officer he is apt to fall into caricature. But he does not spare the other side. He depicts with grim fidelity the brutal cruelty of the Whiteboys, and yet shows, in one instance, the softer qualities of which they were capable. If Mr. Alexander will only study the technique of his art as carefully as he has studied the Irish peasant he may write an excellent novel.

THE MARBLE KING, by Lilian Quiller-Couch (Arrowsmith, 6d.), is hardly more than a short story, though it would be ungracious to expect a larger sixpennyworth where the quality is so good. The little tale has originality and imagination. That it is impossible hardly tells against it. The author rightly calls it a "mystery."

Melodrama, but this time of the music-halls rather than of the mess-room, is the rock on which HOYA CORNEY, by Mrs. Bertram Tanqueray (Digby, Long, 6s.), splits and sinks. One records this with regret, for the description of Fenland scenery and the account of the boyhood of Hoya Corney—a modern Cimabue, a genius in corduroy—are well done and give promise of better and maturer work, when the authoress will be able to resist the temptation of drawing so lurid an absurdity as Lottie Lepla.

PRIESTESS AND QUEEN, by E. E. Reader (Longmans, 6s.), has a touch of "the high romance" about it, and would be graceful and sympathetic enough but for one almost fatal error of style, which will irritate any reader with an ear for rhythm. This error is that the book is largely written in a kind of anæmic blank verse. Thus:—"I'll to the bath, good prince; use no delay. See that the bodies are disposed of straight, or fever else will breed among our men and throw us down like corn upon a scythe." This trick would spoil a stronger book. The illustrations, by the author, are charming.

A FAIR FRAUD, by Mrs. Lovett Cameron (John Long, 6s.), is what its title suggests—the story of a comely young woman who was hardly all that she appeared to be. In spite of a mother with carmine lips and an alias, and a convict father, who commits the incredible plagiarism of getting himself mistaken for her lover, the fair fraud is not so very fraudulent after all, and meets with an honourable and matrimonial climax to her adventure; though what the county subsequently remarked of her is not recorded. The secondary love interest of the book is fresher.

We found the courtship of the busy barrister and the little "companion" the most pleasing thing in a not particularly entertaining novel. The Messrs. Grigson, local bankers, who are received by the county, are quite impossible in speech and manners. The author's own speech is not always above reproach; nor is "any one who deludes themselves" strictly grammatical.

THE CRUISE OF THE GOLDEN WAVE (Innes, 6s.), by W. N. Oscar, opens weakly. The first hundred pages are confined to commonplace incidents described in a commonplace manner. Many readers, we fear, will not get any further, yet beyond lies a fairly well-told story of adventure. There is a mutiny, of course, and much strenuous fighting, in which one or two of the ladies on board take a hand. With a desert island, a wonderful cave, and hidden treasure great things may be done, and some of them are not badly done. The climax is disconcerting. All the men and women who are still left alive on the stage fall into one another's arms and there are weddings galore. Only the doctor stands out, but he has a girl waiting for him in England. We would suggest to Mr. Oscar that his work would gain in raison d'être if in future he were to exercise a little moderation in pairing off his characters.

Obituary.

FRANCISQUE SARCEY.

Our Paris Correspondent writes:—

Last Sunday night, for the first time in thirty years, the readers of the Temps were deprived of that inimitable little essay on the dramatic news of the week which had given the name of Francisque Sarcey a world-wide authority. The death of Becque had been an event of ill-omen. Years ago a sinister utterance of this terrible inventor of bon mots had shocked the boulevard; "Sarcey," he was reported to have said, "Sarcey wished to bury my Parisienne alive; I, dead, will bury him within forty-eight hours." Becque was carried to his grave on Monday afternoon. On the following night the master-critic died in the arms of his son-in-law, M. Adolphe Brisson, at 2 o'clock in the morning. On the Wednesday previous he had lunched with M. Claretie, and two hours later the Emir Emin Arslan, who had been present, repeated to me many of the jests of this delightful old man, who seemed then so full of vigour and gaiety. Sarcey was born at Douardan on October 8, 1828. He was a Normalien of 1848, a comrade of About and of Taine; and, like them, he began life as a professor. He entered journalism in the columns of the Figaro, to which he contributed a series of critical articles over the signature of Satané Binet. A year later, in 1889, he commenced dramatic critic in the Opinion Nationale, which he quitted in 1867 to enter the Temps, where he has remained ever since. But the Temps was only his point d'appui. As a conférencier, a lyceum lecturer, he had no equal, even in the Paris of Brunetière and Larroumet and Faguet. Inveterately amusing, and instructive as well, he had that irrepressible "gift of the gab" which M. Gaston Paris in his "Lectures on the Poetry of the Middle Age" (Hachette) notes as the most pleasing characteristic of the French in their châteaux of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries; "quand les comtes ont fini de gaber, ils s'endorment." M. Sarcey, alas, s'endort before he had finished his gab. There is no one to take up the tale. As a dramatic critic he had probably the largest and most varied circle of readers of any writer in the world. He had good sense, a clear style, a profound acquaintance with the French classics. He had, too, an intimate knowledge of every manifestation of the modern French mind—save one. He was a bourgeois and a professor, and as such he was inflexible as to the tendencies of some younger writers. He was a lover of honest prose, he detested "symbolism." Ibsen he did not understand, and he insisted on a play being "well-made," being du théâtre. His taste was that of the eighteenth century, and he believed in "canons of criticism." But his bonhomie saved him from pedantry. He was a happy composite portrait of the Frenchman, as representative as any creation of Balzac; and this is what so endeared him to Frenchmen that for years he has been known throughout France as "Uncle Sarcey." We look in vain for any one to fill his place.

HENRI BECQUE, the author of Les Corbeaux and La Parisienne, died last Friday at the age of 62. Becque never attained popularity, but his reputation bids fair to grow with the years, and a century hence, when Sardou and, possibly, even Augier are no longer staged, the two great plays just mentioned will perhaps hold the boards and enjoy the same sort of glory as Le Mariage de Figaro—namely, that of being the most representative dramas of the end of the nineteenth century in France. Becque himself put nine-tenths of the critics against him. He was crusty, sharp-tongued, caustic, and uncompromising. He lived apart, poor, proud, distinguished, viewing life from afar and crystallizing his impressions of it in two masterpieces which won him the admiration of thinkers and of all critics who were not the mere spokesmen of a coterie. "La Parisienne," said a great French novelist the other day, "est une comédie un peu dure. Tout de même, de toutes nos œuvres à tous, cest peut-être la seule qui restera." La Parisienne was at first refused by the committee of the Théâtre Français, though it has now become definitively a portion of the classical repertoire of that company. Becque's death is not a "Parisian event" like that of Pailleton; it is a date, however, in French literary history. One thinks of him rather as a great writer than as a great playwright. The irony of his product, its want of Parisianism and of the facile gaiety of classical French comedy, account for its failure to obtain the favour of bourgeois opinion. In Les Corbeaux he relentlessly satirized types in which a middle-class audience recognized themselves; and he paid for his audacity. Yet this piece will, in all probability, give its author his title to immortality. To English readers, as yet unfamiliar with Becque, we recommend its perusal in the "complete works" of this writer published in 1890. He leaves an unfinished play entitled Polichinelles, which, we are told, is as full of sarcasm and irony as anything he had ever written.

Correspondence.

ILLICIT COMMISSIONS. TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—On May 8 there appeared in The Times a letter from Mr. John Murray, the essential passages of which ran thus :—

The Lord Chief Justice, in introducing the Illicit Commissions Bill in the House of Lords on April 20, is reported to have said :—"Again, in the publishing trade and also the printing trade I am sorry to say the evil is growing worst of all."

As this charge came upon my colleagues and myself as a complete surprise and caused some consternation among us, I ventured to write to the Lord Chief Justice and ask for such further particulars as would enable the council of our association to investigate the case.

In reply, I have just received a very courteous intimation from his Lordship that his "remarks were about the printing, not the publishing trade," accompanied by a permission to make that intimation public.

My gratification at the line taken by Mr. Murray in this important matter is only equalled by my fear that he has been lulled into a false sense of security by Lord Russell's courteous and comforting assurances. For, curiously enough—though the Lord Chief Justice and Mr. Murray are apparently unaware of the fact—two publishers who reviewed Sir Walter Besant's "The Pen and the Book" have publicly admitted that it is their habit to take those "illicit commissions" for the suppression of which the Lord Chief Justice is endeavouring to strengthen the hands of the Criminal Law. One of these publishers made his confession in your own columns on January 21, saying, among other things :—

Now, because I, as a publisher of good standing and capital, can obtain certain allowances on the material I buy, should it follow that I should make the author a present of them? By no means. The author is not my partner. . . . If he desire that I should publish his book on commission, I furnish him with an estimate that he can refuse or accept as he pleases, and the details of this estimate are made up of what I may make in commission on the sales of the book. . . . Whatever "extra" terms I obtain are legally and morally mine.

The other publisher wrote in the Outlook on January 14. What he said was :—

My commissions will barely recompense me, but I shall realize on the cost of production. Why not? . . . Sir Walter Besant calls me a thief because I estimate on gross prices instead of net prices. He does not apprehend. The printers, the binders, and the advertisement agents recognize my claim as a good customer to a rebatement of a published charge. Why should I give the author, an amateur, a gentleman, the advantage of the rebatement which, in my capacity as an ungentle professed tradesman and wholesale buyer, I receive on my purchases?

Here, then, we have two publishers claiming secret commissions, one of them on the ground that he is a man of good standing, and the other on the ground that he is not a gentleman. Neither plea, I fear, would be a good answer to a charge under Clause 9 of the Prevention of Corruption Bill, which runs as follows :—

If any person shall give to any agent any receipt, account, or other document in respect of which the principal is interested which (a) shall contain any statement which is to the knowledge of the said person false, or erroneous, or defective in any important particular, or is in any way calculated or intended to mislead the principal, or (b) shall, otherwise than by mistake or inadvertence, omit to state explicitly and fully the fact of any discount, rebate, repayment, gratuity, or deduction having been made, given, or allowed, or agreed to be made, given, or allowed, or any other fact in relation to the transaction which it shall be for the interest of the principal to know, shall be guilty of a misdemeanour, and in Scotland of an offence punishable by fine and imprisonment.

Subject to correction, I submit that the acts defended by your publisher and by the Outlook's publisher do not differ in any essential respect from the acts which the Lord Chief Justice proposes to make punishable by two years' imprisonment and a fine of £500; and I further submit that Mr. John Murray and the Publishers' Association could perform no more useful service than that of publicly formulating their well-considered opinion of the publishers who, by conducting their business on the lines indicated in their communications to Literature and the Outlook, compete unfairly with publishers who conduct their business upon other lines.

I am, Sir, yours obediently,

AMICUS CURIAE.

"ENGLISH AS SHE IS SPOKE." TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—In his entertaining article upon the "Humours of Dictionaries" Mr. Cecil Headlam refers to the unconsciously comic Portuguese Guide to the English language which, says he, "set us laughing a few years ago." He is referring, manifestly, to the little shilling books which were published by Messrs. Field and Tuer, with introductions by Mr. James Millington.

I have always thought it hard upon those who first discovered and introduced to English readers this "New Guide of the Conversation in Portuguese and English" that no credit was allowed them in the Field and Tuer books, and that during the extraordinary vogue which the work enjoyed—the first volume rapidly running through eight editions—no one drew attention to the publication of 1863.

In September, 1860, the excellent magazine, known as "Browne's Register of Facts and Occurrences relating to Literature, the Sciences and the Arts," was first issued, and was generally spoken of as "The Register." To the March number of 1863, Thomas Hood contributed an article entitled "Portuguese English" in which he reviewed the famous work : "O Novo Guia em Portuguez e Inglez, Par Jose de Fonseca e Pedro Carolina, Paris, 1862." He had come across it when seeking for a trustworthy guide to the Portuguese language which he was desirous of acquiring, and when he opened the "small square volume in boards of sea-green colour, printed on what seems a superior sort of cigarette paper," he had no notion of the treat that was in store for him. He dealt with the matter in three columns and a half, and among the numerous examples he gave he seems to have included some tit-bits that escaped the later editor. "If they [my readers] want a hearty laugh," he concludes, "and a good deal of harmless fun, I recommend them to purchase forthwith a copy of the amusing, diverting, entertaining, and instructive publication, from which I have culled them." The world has certainly been the merrier for Mr. Millington having taken this advice, or having independently happened upon this book of DIALOGUES AND IDIOTISMS.

M. H. SPIELMANN.

21, Cadogan-gardens, May 13, 1899.

THE HEXAMETER.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—I have been much interested in your "Notes" and "Correspondence," to-day and last week, respecting the English hexameter. Some 15 years since, I attempted to give variety to my blank verse narration entitled "Three Sheikhs" by writing the introduction, interludes, and conclusion in that measure; but I found reviewers in general of opinion that it is unsuited to our language. For this judgment there exist, I imagine, more reasons than one.

The first usually named is the lack of spondees in English, or the necessity, as a rule, of using two distinct words to gain the desired end. This is almost inevitable, if the spondee is to be a true one. For instance, the dissyllable "midnight" is usually accounted a trochee, as in Longfellow's

I stood on the bridge at midnight,
As the clocks were striking the hour.

In Southey's

Midnight, and yet no eye

Through all the Imperial City closed in sleep!

it might be read as either a trochee or a spondee. But the only case I can call to mind where the general reader would be pretty sure to make it a spondee is in one of the snatches sung in Scene 8, Act 2, of "The Knight of the Burning Pestle"—

When it was grown to dark midnight,
And all were fast asleep,
In came Margaret's grimly ghost,
And stood at William's feet.

Next, whether from the natural genius of our tongue, or from custom, the most favoured forms of verse in our literature are based on iambs. Dactyls or anapæsts would not be tolerated in any but short compositions.

But chiefly, I believe, it is the length of the verse that is disliked. Drayton's "Polyolbion" would probably still find readers but for its being written in Alexandrines. It is true we have verses of as many as seven feet, but these are usually printed in the form of stanzas, with lines of four and three feet alternating. The quotation from Beaumont and Fletcher given above, for example, though so presented, is really a couplet of seven feet—or, rather, would be so were the rhyme true.

To show how easily this measure can be written in English perhaps I may quote from "Three Sheikhs" the following:—

Ending a wearisome day's march spent in a desert of hot sand,
Gladly the caravan took rest, covered by shadows of tall palms;
Great stars glowed, and the moon, clear white in a sky of intense blue,
Mingled a light like silver with ruddier beams from the camp-fires.
Soothed by the charm of the soft hour, three grave men at a tent-door
Seated together, began to recount their adventures of past years.
Round them were camels reposing, and horses that fed on the fresh grass:
Bright in the moon's full splendour a fountain was splashing, and clear streams
Glided away to the darkness and bubbled and gurgled their soft songs.

I think these verses will be found correct as to metre; but, for the reasons already indicated, I do not suppose hexameters will ever be popular in our literature, even though, as in the case of blank verse, much variety might be introduced later on by skilled hands.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

HENRY ROSE.

Dalebury, Elmbourne-road, Tooting Bec Common, S.W.

ROUSSEAU AND "HUDIBRAS"

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—You quote, in your issue of May 13th, as an apparent proof of Rousseau's knowledge of Butler, six lines from the former's poem "L'Allée de Sylvie":—

On verra la Philosophie
Naitre de la nécessité;
On me verra par jalousie
Prêcher mes caduques vertus;
Et souvent blâmer par envie
Les plaisirs que je n'aurai plus.

Here, it is suggested, we have the well-known lines from "Hudibras":—

Compound for sins they are inclin'd to
By damning those they have no mind to.

The thought in the French, however, seems to me much nearer to that expressed in the Duc de la Rochefoucauld's epigram:—"Les vieillards aiment à donner de bons préceptes, pour se consoler de n'être plus en état de donner de mauvais exemples." These vieillards are the old gaffers of Catullus:—

Vivamus mea Lesbia atque amemus,
Rumoresque senum severiorum
Omnes unius aestimemus assis.

Yours faithfully,

OECIL HEADLAM.

4, Smith-square, Westminster, S.W., May 13.

Authors and Publishers.

Five thousand copies of the two-volume edition of Captain A. T. Mahan's "Life of Nelson" have been sold in this country, and now a cheaper issue in one volume is announced by Sampson Low. This will contain all the matter included in the original edition and has also had the advantage of having been revised throughout by the author.

We have already announced that Messrs. Constable's Library Edition of Fielding will be followed by a Library Edition of Smollett. The introduction to the Smollett Edition will be written by Mr. W. E. Henley.

The next volume in the English Public Schools Series will be "Eton," by Mr. Lionel Cust. That on Christ's Hospital is being written by the Rev. E. H. Pearce, vicar of Christ Church, Newgate-street, who was formerly a master at the school.

Next week will be published the new and enlarged edition of Mr. F. P. Dunne's "Mr. Dooley in Peace and War." In addition to a portrait of the author, it will contain five extra articles, including reflections by the Chicago philosopher-saloon-keeper on Mr. Rudyard Kipling and Lord Charles Beresford. Mr. Dunne is visiting England, and "Mr. Dooley" will, no doubt, soon be telling us how we and our institutions and manners strike him. The new book will, we believe, make its appearance first serially, in this country, in the columns of one of the London evening journals.

The enthusiastic Ruskinite will doubtless hail with enthusiasm the announcement that in Mr. Allen's forthcoming issue of "Proterita," a fragment of the master's writing will be included which has not hitherto seen the light.

Lever's posthumous novel, "Gerald Fitzgerald," is about to be published by Mr. Downey. It belongs to his later period, when Lever had a little lost the dare-devil and rollicking humour of "Charles O'Malley" and "Harry Lorrequer," but had gained in self-criticism. Like his earlier novels it appeared serially in the Dublin University Magazine, and his daughter, Mrs. Nevill, left it to Mr. Downey to decide whether he should republish it.

That prolific popular historian, Mr. Justin McCarthy, has not yet done with "our own times." He contributes to the "Story of the Nations" Series (Unwin) "Modern England from the Reform Bill to the Present Time." The book will be illustrated.

Mattias Zurbriggen, the famous Alpine guide who climbed Pioneer Peak with Sir William Conway, Mount Cook with Mr. Fitzgerald, and Aconcagua with Mr. Vines, has written a book called "From the Alps to the Andes," which will be published by Mr. Fisher Unwin. So far as we are aware, the only existing book by an Alpine guide is Michel Carrier's "Notice Biographique sur Jacques Balmat," Christian Almer's Führerbuch not being a book in the literary sense of the word.

Mrs. Coventry Patmore and several of her late husband's more intimate friends have been engaged for some time past on a memoir of the poet which will probably be ready before the end of this year. The poems of the author of "The Angel in the House" are at this moment as popular, both here and in America, as at any time during the last thirty years. It was only two weeks ago that we referred to Mr. Egan's illustrations from Coventry Patmore's rhythms in a new book on metre.

The sixth volume of the "Cambridge Natural History," which is now nearly ready, completes Dr. David Sharp's treatise on Insects, the first instalment of which is a valuable contribution to entomology. The new volume deals with Bees, Wasps, Ants, Beetles, Butterflies, and Moths, and will contain about 300 original illustrations.

A new volume of verse by Mr. Laurence Housman, entitled "The Little Land: With Songs from its Four Rivers," is being published by Mr. Grant Richards. It has four illustrations, which have been cut on wood by Miss Clemence Housman. Mr. Housman has himself designed the cover.

"In the Khalifa's Clutches," the first instalment of Mr. Neufeld's adventures in the hands of the Dervishes, which are to be published in the Wile World Magazine, appears in the June number.

Art, Literature, and Music have their respective Year Books, and Messrs. Greening and Co. are intending to follow suit with "The Year Book of the Stage," which will contain year by year, in a compact and handy form, a complete record of all the important productions of the English stage.

A book of cricketing reminiscences which will appear before Dr. W. G. Grace's (since Messrs. Blackwood have it almost ready for publication) is Mr. William Caffyn's "Seventy-one not out." Caffyn was a member of the Surrey eleven for many years and a fine all-round cricketer. He was one of the earliest English players to visit Australia where he bowled the first ball in the first match of the first tour. He went on the second tour also, and this time was persuaded to stay as instructor to the Melbourne Club. Caffyn also went with an English team to the United States and Canada in 1859. The volume will be edited by "Mid-on" and will have plenty of illustrations.

The Town Council of Perth has now definitely resolved to purchase the old building in North Port, Perth, known locally as "The Fair Maid's House." Scarcely a stranger, it is said, visits the city without inquiring about this house; nevertheless there are some of the citizens who have misgivings. Tradition, it is true, has long associated Scott's heroine with the building; but the evidence, so-called, as to its having been the residence of old Simon Glover, is by no means convincing. Perhaps a new book to be published shortly by Mr. Elliot Stock, under the title of "A Hypnotic Experience in the Fair Maid's House at Perth," will throw light on the subject. The author, Mr. Alfred Beauchamp, passed a night under the roof which is said to have sheltered the fair Catharina, and he has, it appears, a surprising tale to tell. The book is to be illustrated.

Mr. Sydney Young, Professor of Chemistry in University College, Bristol, the author of many memoirs on chemical subjects, is at present engaged in writing a paper on the relative efficiency and usefulness of various forms of still-head for fractional distillation. Some new still-heads, possessing special advantages, will be described in the paper. Dr. Young is also continuing his researches on the vapour pressures, specific volumes and critical constants of the paraffins and other hydrocarbons, and hopes to have some further data ready for publication before the end of the year.

A German work of some interest will make its appearance here towards the end of the summer. It is a translation of Frau Laura Marholm's "Zur Psychologie der Frau," with the title "The Psychology of Woman." Frau Marholm is no advocate for "women's rights." On the contrary, her work may best be described as an antidote to Mill's "Subjection of Women."

We are glad to learn of the successful arrangements made for the comparatively speedy conclusion of the Oxford English Dictionary. The publishers announce a new departure as to price. The arrangements they make as to subscription must not be confounded with that adopted by The Times in issuing The New Century Dictionary on the instalment system, though the one may have suggested the other. "Up to December 31st, 1899," Mr. Frowde's advertisement runs, "the delivery of the entire work, as and when published (i.e. the volumes published and those yet to come) . . . may be secured by the payment . . . of the sum of £17 (net cash)." Here the system by which the New Century Dictionary is issued is in reality bouleversé. Instead of paying a small part of his purchase money and receiving the whole dictionary at once under trust that he will pay the rest of his money in monthly instalments, as is the case with the purchaser of the New Century Dictionary, the purchaser of the Oxford Dictionary will at once pay all the sum required, and will not receive the whole dictionary until 1909. It is the dictionary and not the purchase money that is to appear in instalments. If, however, the purchaser is content to wait for the full value of his money for ten years, and no "Act of God," such as the burning of the Clarendon Press Buildings, should intervene, he will in the end have the dictionary at a smaller price under the new system. For, while the subscription price of the dictionary is £17 net cash, the published price for it, in the ordinary way, would be about £26.

Messrs. Archibald Constable have sent us for publication the following note, which has been addressed to them by Miss Fiona Macleod:—

Dear Sirs,—I am much annoyed at this continued identification of myself with this or that man or woman of letters—in one or two instances with people whom I have never seen and do not even know by correspondence. For what seem to myself not only good, but imperative, private reasons, I wish to preserve absolutely my privacy. It is not only that temperamentally I shrink from and dislike the publicity of reputation, but that my very writing depends upon this privacy.

But in one respect, to satisfy those who will not be content to take or leave, to read or ignore my writings, I give you authority to say definitely that "Fiona Macleod" is not any of those with whom she has been "identified"; that she writes only under the name of Fiona Macleod; that her name is her own; and that all she asks is the courtesy both of good breeding and common sense—a courtesy which is the right of all, and surely imperatively of a woman acting by and for herself.

Believe me sincerely yours,
FIONA MACLEOD.

Mr. Marion Crawford is engaged upon a novel dealing with the proceedings of Italian secret societies. "The Anarchists" is the title chosen.

A novel of stirring adventure, of which Prince Rupert is the hero, is about to be issued by Messrs. Macmillan, entitled "Rupert by the Grace of God." It is from the pen of Miss Dora M'Chesney.

Yorkshiresmen who have been interested in the sketches of country life which Mr. J. S. Fletcher has contributed to various journals (notably to the Leeds Mercury under his pseudonym "A Son of the Soil") will be glad to hear that Mr. Grant Richards proposes to publish towards the end of the month a new volume of his Yorkshire stories. It will be entitled "From the Broad Acres: Stories Illustrative of Rural Life in Yorkshire," and will contain over twenty characteristic tales of Yorkshire folk.

Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton announce a sixpenny edition of "Beside the Bonnie Brier Bush." In six-shilling form Ian Maclaren's most popular book has reached the 13th edition, completing 90,000 copies. The sixpenny issue will be illustrated by etchings by Mr. William Hole.

Baron Corvo, to whom we referred on May 6th, will publish with Mr. John Lane a second series of "Seventeen Stories Told Me" in the autumn, and is preparing a third. We understand that the other book which we mentioned as one on which the Baron is engaged is not a life of Pope Pius II., but a novel in which the Pope is the hero: and that he is also writing two more novels—"John Joseph Whimperd Thus" and "Nicholson's Prince Alexander."

Messrs. Ellis and Elvey announce another volume of the "Siddal Edition" of D. G. Rossetti's Poems, to be issued early in June. The new volume will be entitled "Ballads," and will contain the three poems "Rose Mary," "The White Ship," and "The King's Tragedy."

"Dinners and Diners: a Handbook to the Restaurants of London, with Recipes by chief and best Chefs," is the full title of a book by Lieut.-Colonel Newnham Davis which Mr. Grant Richards will shortly publish. The cover has been designed by Mr. Lewis Baumer.

Bell's Cathedral Series is not to be confined to Cathedrals, but will also contain monographs on notable churches. Volumes on Westminster Abbey and Tewkesbury Abbey are in preparation.

A new book on Embroidery is announced by Mr. B. T. Batsford. It will be the combined work of Mr. Lewis F. Day, who is just completing a course of lectures on the subject at the Royal Institution, and of Miss Mary Buckle.

Messrs. Kegan Paul are publishing a new work by Dr. Alfred Binet, entitled "The Psychology of Reasoning, based on Experimental Researches in Hypnotism," translated from the French by Adam Gouaux Whyte.

The first part of the work entitled "The Great Cylinder Inscriptions of Judea," by Professor Ira M. Price, of Chicago, is in preparation, and will be issued in the "Assyriologische Bibliothek," edited by Messrs. Delitzsch and Haupt. It will contain eighty-eight plates. The second part will shortly follow.

The Rev. Sir David Hunter Blair is writing the historical introduction to the final volume, to appear in the autumn, of the Ayrshire and Galloway Archaeological Association. The volume is on the "Five Great Churches of Galloway," including Dun-drennan, Sweetheart, Whithorn, Glenluce, and Linculn, and will be copiously illustrated.

LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

- ART.
The Illustrated Catalogue of the Paris Salon. 9x5 1/2 in., 192 pp. London, 1899. Chatto & Windus. 3s.
- BIOGRAPHY.
Henry George Liddell, D.D., Dean of Christ Church, Oxford. By Rev. H. L. Thompson. M.A. 9x6 in., 288 pp. London, 1899. Murray. 16s.
The Martyrdom of an Empress. With Portraits. 9 1/2 x 6 in., 287 pp. London, 1899. Harper. 7s. 6d.
Robespierre and the Red Terror. From the Dutch of Dr. Jan Ten Brink. By J. Hedeman. 8 1/2 x 5 1/2 in., 405 pp. London, 1899. Hutchinson. 12s.
Quaker Campaigns in Peace and War. By William Jones. 7 1/2 x 5 1/2 in., xiv.+412 pp. London, 1899. Headley. 6s.
History of St. Vincent de Paul. By M. Rougaud. Translated from the French 2nd Ed. by Rev. J. Brady, C.M. 2 vols. 9x6 in., xxi.+338+376 pp. London, 1899. Longmans. 16s. n.
Rudyard Kipling. An Attempt at Appreciation. By G. F. Monkshood (W. J. Clarke). 7 1/2 x 5 1/2 in., 236 pp. London, 1899. Greening. 5s. n.
- BOOKS FOR THE YOUNG.
Mr. Yates' Cricket Club. By E.D.H. 6 1/2 x 4 1/2 in., 80 pp. London, 1899. S.P.C.K. 6d.
Saints and Heroes of Our Own Days. By Mrs. T. R. Seddon. 7 1/2 x 5 in., 128 pp. London, 1899. S.P.C.K. 1s.
- CLASSICAL.
Homer's Odyssey. Book IX. (Black's Classical Series.) Ed. by A. D. Thomson, M.A., D.Litt. 6 1/2 x 4 in., 1+86 pp. London, 1899. Black. 1s.
- EDUCATIONAL.
Euripides: Hecuba. A Translation. By W. H. Balgarnie, M.A. (The University Tutorial Series.) Cr. 8vo., 37 pp. London, 1899. Clive. 1s. 6d.
Lucretius. Book V. A Translation, with Test Papers. By F. G. Plaistow, M.A. (The University Tutorial Series.) Cr. 8vo., iv.+44 pp. London, 1899. Clive. 2s. 6d.
- FICTION.
The Individualist. By W. H. Mallock. 7 1/2 x 5 1/2 in., 391 pp. London, 1899. Chapman & Hall. 6s.
A Cockney in Arcadia. By Harry A. Spurr. 7 1/2 x 5 in., 241 pp. London, 1899. G. Allen. 3s. 6d.
The Ivory Queen. By Norman Hurst. 7 1/2 x 5 in., 222 pp. London, 1899. Milne. 2s. 6d.
Mr. Passingham. By Thomas Cobb. 7 1/2 x 5 1/2 in., 220 pp. London, 1899. Lane. 3s. 6d.
Robespierre. The Story of M. V. Sardou's Play. By Ange Galdemar. 8x5 1/2 in., 327 pp. London, 1899. Pearson. 6s.
- The North Shore Mystery. By Henry Fletcher. 7 1/2 x 4 1/2 in., 270 pp. London, 1899. Sonnenschein.
Fortune's Tangled Skein. By Jeannette H. Walworth. 7 1/2 x 5 1/2 in., 286 pp. London, 1899. Warner. 3s. 6d.
The House of Rimmon. By Mrs. C. Kernahan. 7 1/2 x 5 1/2 in., 379 pp. London, 1899. Ward, Lock. 3s. 6d.
Hugh Gwyeth. A Roundhead Cavalier. By Beulah Marie Dix. 7 1/2 x 5 in., 376 pp. London, 1899. Macmillan. 6s.
The Queen of Night. By Headon Hill. 7 1/2 x 5 in., 252 pp. London, 1899. Ward, Lock. 2s.
The Sword of Allah. By T. R. Threlfall. 7 1/2 x 5 1/2 in., 309 pp. London, 1899. Ward, Lock. 3s. 6d.
An Old Regime's Tragedy. By "Rita." 7 1/2 x 5 1/2 in., 352 pp. London, 1899. Hutchinson. 6s.
"Ma Mère"; or, Sons and Daughters under the Second Empire. By Vicomte Jean de Luz. 7 1/2 x 5 1/2 in., 403 pp. London, 1899. Smith, Elder. 6s.
Meg. By Maud Crawford. 7 1/2 x 5 1/2 in., 418 pp. London, 1899. Macqueen. 6s.
Atheist Detective and other Stories. By Burford Delannoy. 6 1/2 x 3 1/2 in., 160 pp. Essex, 1899. Ellis. 6d.
Dead Men Tell No Tales. By E. W. Hornung. (The Novelist, No. 1.) 8 1/2 x 5 1/2 in., 123 pp. London, 1899. Methuen. 6d.
Tom—All Alone. By Amelia M. Barker. 7 1/2 x 5 in., 331 pp. London, 1899. Macqueen. 6s.
A Dash for a Throne. By A. W. Marchmont. 7 1/2 x 5 1/2 in., 373 pp. London, 1899. Hutchinson. 6s.
- LITERARY.
A History of Bohemian Literature. (Literatures of the World.) By Francis Count Lützow. 8x5 1/2 in., xii.+425 pp. London, 1899. Heinemann. 6s.
- MILITARY.
Cromwell as a Soldier. By Lieut.-Col. T. S. Baldock, P.S.C. (The Wolsey Series, Vol. V.) 9x6 in., xv.+538 pp. London, 1899. Kegan Paul.
The Second Afghan War, 1878-79-80. Its Causes, its Conduct, and its Consequences. Vol. I. By Col. H. B. Hanna. 9x6 in., x+386 pp. London, 1899. Constable. 10s. n.
Der Krieg. Von Johann von Bloch. Uebersetzung des russischen Werkes des Autors. Band II.: Der Landkrieg. ix.+751 pp. M. 8. Band IV.: Die ökonomischen Erschütterungen und materiellen Verluste des Zukunftskrieges. viii.+578 pp. M. 8. Berlin, 1899. Puttkammer & Mühlbrecht.
- MISCELLANEOUS.
The Solitary Summer. By the Author of "Elizabeth and Her German Garden." 8 1/2 x 5 1/2 in., 190 pp. London, 1899. Macmillan. 6s.
Yule and Christmas. The Place in the Germanic year. By Alexander Tille, Ph.D. 9x7 in., 218 pp. London, 1899. Nutt.
- Interludes. (Third Series.) Two Essays. A Ghost Story, and Some Verses. By Horace Smith. 7 1/2 x 4 1/2 in., viii.+114 pp. London, 1899. Macmillan. 5s.
My Roses and How I Grew Them. By Helen Milman. 7 1/2 x 5 1/2 in., 52 pp. London, 1899. Lane. 1s. 6d. n.
- MUSIC.
"Parsifal" and Wagner's Christianity. By David Irvine. 7 1/2 x 5 in., 418 pp. London, 1899. Grevel. 6s. n.
- NATURAL HISTORY.
Rambles with Nature Students. By Mrs. Brightwen, F.E.S. 7 1/2 x 5 1/2 in., 223 pp. London, 1899. R.T.S. 5s.
The Natural History of Selborne. Part IV. Ed. by Grant Allen. Lane. 1s. 6d. n.
- PAMPHLETS.
Man, the Microcosm. Part I. The Nature of Man. By Leonard Hall, M.A. Williams & Norgate. 1s. 6d.
On the Relations Between Church and State. By R. W. Church. Macmillan. 1s. n.
- PHILOSOPHY.
English Philosophical Styles. (Six Studies.) By Wilson Stuart. 9 1/2 x 7 1/2 in., 105 pp. Manchester, 1899. Cornish. 1s. 6d.
- POETRY.
Ballads and Poems. By Dora Sigerson (Mrs. Clement Shorter). 7 1/2 x 5 1/2 in., 123 pp. London, 1899. Bowden.
Selections from Our Earth—Night to Twilight. By George Ferguson. 7 1/2 x 5 in., 407 pp. London, 1899. Simpkin, Marshall. 1s. n.
The Scent of the Rose. By F. Phosyn Du. 6 1/2 x 4 1/2 in., 119 pp. London, 1899. Gay & Bird. 1s.
Poems and Verses. By G. H. Peters. 8 1/2 x 5 1/2 in., 50 pp. Kingston-on-Thames, 1899.
- POLITICAL.
The Break-up of China. By Lord Charles Beresford. 9x5 1/2 in., xviii.+500 pp. London, 1899. Harper. 12s.
- REPRINTS.
The Chiswick Shakespeare. Hamlet and The Merchant of Venice. With Introduction and Notes by John Dennis. Illustrated by Byam Shaw. 6x4 in., x+164+xii.+114 pp. London, 1899. G. Bell. 1s. 6d. n. each vol.
Woodstock. By Sir Walter Scott, Bt. (Border Ed.) 7 1/2 x 5 1/2 in., lxviii.+703 pp. London, 1899. Nimmo. 3s. 6d.
Roy's Wife. By C. J. Whyte-Melville. 8 1/2 x 5 1/2 in., 243 pp. London, 1899. Ward, Lock. 3s. 6d.
- SCIENCE.
Sewage Analysis. A Practical Treatise on the Examination of Sewage, &c. By J. Alfred Wanklyn and W. J. Cooper. 7 1/2 x 5 in., xvi.+220 pp. London, 1899. Kegan Paul. 7s. 6d.
- The Tides Simply Explained. By the Rev. J. H. S. Mosley, B.A. 7 1/2 x 5 1/2 in., 151 pp. London, 1899. Rivington. 5s.
The Secrets of the Hand, and How Scientific Palmistry reveals them. By Maud Harries. 7 1/2 x 5 in., 127 pp. London, 1899. Digby, Long. 2s. 6d.
- SOCIOLOGY.
Die Entstehung des Socialen Problems. Von Arnold Fischer. 8 1/2 x 5 1/2 in., xvi.+781 pp. Rostock, 1899. Volckmann. M.12.50.
- SPORT.
Our Lady of the Green (A Book of Ladies' Golf). Ed. by Louise Mackern. With Chapters by Islette Pearson and Others. 7 1/2 x 5 in., 233 pp. London, 1899. Lawrence & Bullen. 3s. 6d.
- THEOLOGY.
The Private Devotions of Lancelot Andrewes, Bishop of Winchester. By Peter G. Mead, M.A. 6 1/2 x 4 in., 196 pp. London, 1899. S.P.C.K. 1s.
Clement of Alexandria. (The Fathers for English Readers.) By F. R. M. Hitchcock, B.D. 6 1/2 x 4 1/2 in., 280 pp. London, 1899. S.P.C.K. 3s.
The Communion and Communionist. By the late Rev. E. Hoare, M.A. 7x4 1/2 in., 48 pp. London, 1899. R.T.S. 1s.
Unseen the Book. By Mrs. A. Carus-Wilson. 7 1/2 x 5 in., 160 pp. London, 1899. R.T.S. 2s.
God First; or, Hester Needham's Work in Sumatra. Her Letters and Diaries, arranged by Mary Enfield. 8x5 1/2 in., 320 pp. London, 1899. R.T.S. 3s. 6d.
The History of the London Missionary Society. 1795-1895. 2 vols. By Richmond Lovett, M.A. 9x5 1/2 in., xiv.+832+778 pp. London, 1899. Frowde. 21s. n.
Persian Women and Their Creed. By Mary R. S. Bird. 7 1/2 x 5 1/2 in., 104 pp. London, 1899. Church Miss. Soc. 1s.
The Epistle to the Galatians. An Essay on its Destination and Date. By E. H. Askwith. 7 1/2 x 5 in., xx.+153 pp. London, 1899. Macmillan. 3s. 6d. n.
- TRAVEL.
A Thousand Days in the Arctic. By Frederick T. Jackson. With a Preface by Admiral Sir F. L. McClintock, R.N. 2 vols. 9 1/2 x 6 1/2 in., xxi.+551+xv.+580 pp. London, 1899. Harper. 32s.
Asiatic Studies. By Sir Alfred C. Lyall, K.C.B., D.C.L. 2 vols. Religious and Social. 8 1/2 x 5 1/2 in., xx.+332+xiv.+385 pp. London, 1899. Murray. 9s. each vol.
Intimate China. The Chinese as I have seen them. By Mrs. A. Little. 10x6 1/2 in., xv.+615 pp. London, 1899. Hutchinson. 21s.
The Aborigines of Tasmania. By H. L. Roth, and Others. 2nd Ed., rev. and enl. 10 1/2 x 7 in., cxxi.+228 pp. Halifax (Eng.), 1899. King. 21s. n.

Literature

Edited by H. D. Traill.

Published by The Times.

No. 84. SATURDAY, MAY 27, 1899.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
Leading Article —The Uses of the Classics	533
"Among my Books," by M. Joseph Texte	548
Poem —"The Death of May," by Mr. H. De Vere Staupoole	548
"The New Land," by Mr. Edgar Jepson and Capt. D. Beames	550
Reviews —
The Break-up of China } [Mr. Henry Norman] 535, 536, 537
Intimate China.....
The New Thackeray—
Ballads, &c. [Mr. M. H. Spielmann]—Love the Widower, &c.	537, 538
Exotics and Retrospectives [Sir Edwin Arnold].....	539
Fifty Years of the History of the Republic in South Africa	540
A Short History of the Saracens	541
The War of the Future	541
Recent Verse, II.	542
Golf, Ancient and Modern—
The Book of Golf and Golfers—Our Lady of the Green.....	543, 544
The Use of Sarum.....	544
Byzantine Texts—
The Ecclesiastical History of Evagrius—The History of Psellus..	544
Other New Books —
The Martyrdom of an Empress—Companies in France—Emeralds Chased in Gold—The Burns Memorial Catalogue—Eugénie, Empress of the French—Piers Gaveston—Robespierre and the Red Terror—By Creek and Gully—The Martyrdom of Labour—The Annals of Toil—Paul, the Man, the Missionary, and the Teacher—The Life and Letters of Paul the Apostle—Outlines of Industrial Chemistry—Lectures on Chemistry.....	545, 546, 547
Fiction —
When the Sleeper Wakes.....	555
Rose à Charlotte—Fortune's my Foe—Calumnies—The Story of Old Fort Loudon—Pharos the Egyptian—An Opera and Lady Grassmere—Madame Izan—The Man and His Kingdom—The Newspaper Girl—The Game and the Candle—The Green Field—An Earthly Fulfilment—Dead Men Tell No Tales—Betty Mungrave—Depopulation—Dene Forest Sketches—Spies of the Wight—Gwen Penri—Selam—Through the Storm, &c....	555, 556, 557, 558
Foreign Letter —Germany	553
Correspondence —Mr. Justin McCarthy and Charles Kingsley (The Hon. L. A. Tollemache)—Illicit Commissions—"English As She Is Wrote"	550
Notes	534, 535, 551, 552, 553
Authors and Publishers	550, 560
List of New Books and Reprints	560

THE USES OF THE CLASSICS.

An academic anecdote—too often related to need retelling here—records the reasons once given by a certain high ecclesiastical dignitary and professor of Greek for the cultivation of the study of that language. Among these he is said to have included the consideration that this particular form of scholarship enriched its possessor with a sense of superiority to other people. To the uneasy conscience of the expiring century this circumstance is so far from recommending the study of Greek that it might actually operate as a deterrent. We have not forgotten the heart-searchings and head-shakings of M. Brunetière a year ago, and the impressive solemnity with which he propounded the question whether art, by reason of its tendency to estrange the artist from his human brethren unendowed with æsthetic sensibilities, is not essentially anti-social and, as such, immoral. Superiority to one's fellow creatures in any respect whatever is rapidly acquiring the character of a thing to be ashamed of, or at any rate to be apologized for; and it was therefore with some anxiety that we read the opening passages of the address delivered the other day by Dr. Hill to the students of the London Society for the Extension of University Teaching. To the question which he had proposed to himself as the subject of his discourse, namely, "What is the end we strive to gain by study and what the road by which we approach the goal," the Vice-Chancellor of Cambridge University answered that "the first object of the student was the cultivation of intellectual taste, the formation of sound judgment which would enable him to discriminate between what was deserving and what ought to be condemned, what was best worth knowing and what might be left in the division of the unknown."

VOL. IV. No. 21.

Such counsel as this appears at first sight to point distinctly in the anti-social direction. To a conscience-stricken disciple of M. Brunetière it might seem to suggest an elaborate scheme for the organized production of "superior persons"—of a minority (for of course it will not be possible for the University Extension system, even at its most successful, to reach more than a minority) who have cut themselves off from all sympathy and communion with their fellowmen by the deliberate cultivation of an abnormally correct "intellectual taste." Happily, however, it turned out, as Dr. Hill proceeded with his discourse, that although, as we have seen, he described this as the "first object of the student," it was not really one on which he proposed to lay any especial stress. Indeed, after propounding the question, "What is good taste in literature nowadays?" he continues in a semi-ironical strain which clearly suggests that discussion of the propounded question would be idle. Thirty years ago, he observes, there would have been no difficulty.

Milton, Pope, Johnson, Addison, and Macaulay—these were the masters of form. The highest eulogium on a man of letters then was to say, "He is a scholar." The reverence in which we held classic learning still led to ideal worship; pictures were prayed to, and not saints; books, rather than the ideas of the author, were studied; grammar, instead of speech. It used to be argued that the classics had set the standard in style. It was so no longer. At the Universities, however, one would still hear criticisms of Stevenson or of Kipling. "He is a clever writer," they would say, "but no scholar." But would any one read him if he were? Fancy "Treasure Island" or "Plain Tales from the Hills" done into Johnsonese. The end of this century had developed a style of its own, which bore very little relation to that of Demosthenes or Cicero.

Some of this, perhaps, is a little too broadly stated. "The end of this century" is made responsible as a period for certain phenomena and tendencies which in reality owe their existence to the commanding influence of a few writers of original genius and to the mimetic instinct of the "imitative herd." The "end of this century" only differs from former ages in that the influence above mentioned has never before been so powerfully operative or the instinct so inordinately strong. Writers of original genius have in all ages struck out styles of their own; but in former days the critic was in no such hurry to assume that long-established "standards of style" had become antiquated and discredited because a few great masters of language had chosen to disregard them and had been triumphantly justified by results. Nor, because—to take Dr. Hill's own illustration—Stevenson and Mr. Kipling, and, above all, Mr. Meredith could not be "done into Johnsonese" without the total destruction of all their individuality, whether of strength or charm, does it follow that the rabble of their imitators would not be all the better for the study of classical models. From these they might at least learn to express their thoughts with reasonable simplicity within the limits of their powers and be induced to desist from simulating the nodosities of the Kiplingian oak without its strength and the contortions of the Meredithian Sibyl without her inspiration. The established rules of all the arts are mainly designed for the guidance of those who are not great enough to be privileged to make rules for themselves; and it certainly seems undesirable to relax them at a time when so many untrained scribblers are asserting the privilege without possessing the qualification.

Nevertheless we have no doubt that Dr. Hill was right in laying little stress on the study of the classics, considered as a contributory to the formation of taste and style. Doubtless it can be more profitably treated in its character as "a mental discipline." It was indeed exclusively from this point of view that it was regarded and defended in former times, and it appears to us that little has been gained and much lost by seeking other and more ambitious justifications for it. Its disciplinary value was deemed quite sufficient to recommend it to our ancestors, and it would be difficult to justify its long established position in the curriculum of English education on any other ground. The generations of schoolboys who have been set down to tackle "Musa" and τύττω cannot by any stretch of imagination figure as so many small Sir Vistos to whom their parents and guardians have whispered "Have a taste." The earlier race of pedagogues cherished no dream of producing a race of accomplished stylists and critics who were to be taught, through a course of the Latin and Greek Accidence and so onward, to "discriminate between what was deserving" in all literature "and what ought to be condemned." They recognized that this result could only be attained in the case of a favoured few; but they held, and held rightly, that the discipline undergone by the mental faculties in the course of acquiring even a competent proficiency in these two model languages would more effectively equip the mind as an instrument for almost every purpose to which the human intelligence can apply itself than any other form of training that could be devised.

There was, of course, some exaggeration in this theory: there is in most theories which have long "held the field" in any department of human activity. Man is naturally a fetish-making animal, and there are many people whose only way of remaining constant to a conviction is to transform it into a superstition. If, however, the disciplinary advantages of a classical training were excessively insisted on by a former generation, assuredly the pendulum has now swung too far in the opposite direction. The idea that what is called the "acquisition of knowledge"—which means for the youthful student in too many cases the mere accumulation of undigested facts—is the first and most important thing in education; that it is a process which cannot be begun too early; and that young minds require no preliminary training to enable them to begin it with advantage—these are beliefs which, during the last quarter of a century, have been steadily superseding the older view on which the advocates of the classics relied, and are already, in some very "modern" minds, entering the superstitious stage. To such minds the study of Dr. Hill's testimony should certainly supply matter for thought. His life, he said, was spent in training medical students, and he proposed to consider the best way of turning them out as competent biologists. It might be thought that the answer would be "an early training in science"; but his experience, he tell us, gives an emphatic denial to that. Science scholars, often with abundance of knowledge but without any mental training, "were quickly hauled over by boys from public schools who, when they came up, did not know a test-tube from a barometer." And he goes on to add in another vigorous and picturesque sentence: "The science scholar as turned out by schools was a prodigy of information and difficult to beat on the earlier levels; but as soon as he reached a region where solid facts were left behind, he was like a clodhopper on a glacier without pick to grip, or head to dare." It is quite refreshing to hear the old theory of a "liberal education" championed with such frankness and courage as this. It will profit even those whose opposition it will most strongly arouse: for it may possibly suggest to them for the first time that there is something to be said for those who regard the human mind as primarily an instrument and only secondarily a receptacle.

The nature of Mr. Kipling's grievance against Messrs. Putnam's Sons is now disclosed. As we surmised, the complaint is principally directed against the so-called "informing guide" to the Kipling writings, which is included in the last volume of the unauthorized Brushwood edition. This "informing guide," which bears the ludicrously alliterative title "A Ken of Kipling," is described as the work of "a certain Mr. Clemens"; but it seems fair to add that Mr. Clemens is a nephew of the more famous Clemens who writes under the name of Mark Twain, and that his principal claim to literary distinction rests upon the compilation of a jest book. The situation, therefore, is much as though one were presented with an informing guide to the Shakespeare writings, or the Milton writings, by a certain Mr. Miller, who turned out, upon inquiry, to be our excellent friend, Joe Miller. It is certainly a state of things calculated to exasperate an author who takes himself seriously; but it remains to be seen whether a New York jury will take the view that it calls for damages to the tune of £5,000.

Another literary quarrel which is at present agitating men of taste in America is that between Count Tolstoi and the editor of the Cosmopolitan Magazine. Having accepted a serial story from the Count, this editor is alleged to have set one of his young men to work to expunge "realistic passages" and "extreme ideas." If these are not promptly restored, the author threatens to withhold further instalments; and the editor is said to be prepared, in that event, to sue for the early delivery of the copy in order that he may have time to excise or alter at will. We have not sufficient information to form an exact opinion as to the rights and wrongs of the quarrel. A compromise might possibly be formed by printing the "realistic passages" separately, and supplying them only to subscribers who make special application for them. This would, at any rate, enable the editor to take a moral census of the United States, which would help to guide his future policy; but it might not satisfy Count Tolstoi. A moralist who wishes to shock and is only allowed to shock those who enjoy the sensation is much in the position of a doctor forbidden to prescribe for any one who is not in perfect health, or a clergyman calling only the righteous to repentance.

Mr. Mark Twain is engaged upon a volume of reminiscences which is not to be published until one hundred years after his death. This is certainly writing for posterity, and the author thinks that the delay will remove difficulties which would otherwise hinder the telling of the truth about his contemporaries. Students of the Goncourt Diaries know that these difficulties are not found equally overwhelming by writers of all temperaments; but if Mark Twain is soaring to higher flights of candour than the De Goncourts, then he certainly is wise to let a century slip by before taking the world into his confidence. But we would much rather, after all, hear about himself than his friends. Judging from the leading cases of Pepys and Rousseau, one would say that it is self-revelation which makes volumes of memoirs immortal. One does not read Pepys mainly for what he has to say about his friends in high places, and still less Rousseau for his opinions of Diderot and Voltaire.

Reviews.

The Break-up of China, with an Account of its present Commerce, Currency, Waterways, Armies, Railways, Politics and Future Prospects. By Lord Charles Beresford. With maps. 9 x 5½ in., xviii. + 500 pp. London and New York, 1899.

Harper. 12/-

[By Mr. HENRY NORMAN.]

This volume presents a difficult problem to the reviewer in a literary journal. Four-fifths of it is a collection of facts and statistics—a Blue-book, in fact. The accuracy of these is hardly open to question, and if they had appeared between the familiar blue covers their appearance might merely have been chronicled for whom it concerned. The remainder is in great part an attack upon British policy in general, and upon recent policy in particular—not an attack in its form, which is always impersonal, modest and courteous, but assuredly an attack in its essence—and a discussion of this would lead beyond the proper sphere of these columns. The reviewer therefore approaches the book with both hands tied. Part of it belongs to the pigeon-holes of the statistician; part is the arena of the politician. Every reader, however, will demand a knowledge of its contents.

The style of the book is that of a man of action, and calls for no comment, but Lord Charles Beresford should have submitted his proof sheets to some one more familiar with the Far East in order to avoid eccentricities of spelling that disfigure his pages. We find "Habarovak" and "Habarosk," both standing, we presume, for Khabarovsk or Khabarovka; "Kansuh" for Kansu—also spelled correctly; the ridiculous Gallicism "Tonquin"; "Blagovensk" for Blagovyeshchensk or Blagovechensk; "Chung Chi Tung" many times for our old friend Chang Chih-tung (we rubbed our eyes, by the way, when we found this undoubtedly able, patriotic, and clean-handed Chinaman described as "celebrated for his friendly and courteous bearing to all foreigners"!); "Yingkau" (the port of Newchwang) for Yingtzu; "Fookien" for Fukien; and not a few others. The amiable junior Chinese member of the Legislative Council of Hongkong was Mr. Wei-yuk when the present reviewer knew him, not "Weityuk." Lord Charles apparently was not told that "E-wo" is the Chinese name in Shanghai of Messrs. Jardine, Matheson, and Co.; a fighting man should not have allowed the familiar new-fashioned and old-fashioned rifles to be called respectively "Mannlicker" and "Sneider"; and the Elswick-built cruiser which the Japanese Government placed at the author's disposition was surely the Takasako, and not the "Takasago." These inaccuracies, however, though they might easily have been avoided, are the merest trifles in comparison with the value—the momentous value—of the book. Particularly the industry of the author is to be commended. In an astonishingly short time he visited all the chief foci of foreign interest in China, and at every one he collected precisely the facts and opinions essential to a correct judgment. There is hardly a page of "padding" or an irrelevant reflection, and it is the duty of every Englishman who thinks, speaks, or writes about the Chinese problem to read the volume from beginning to end. With one possible exception I see no point at which Lord Charles has been misled by the remarks made to him—no small achievement when the complex and deceptive character of the Chinese is remembered. The exception—and I lay no stress upon it—is this: every official or influential Chinaman Lord Charles met proffered the assurance of his friendliest feelings toward England, and all these assurances are duly set down as if they meant something. They would have been expressed with identical cordiality and sincerity to an American, a Russian, or a German, of the author's position and rank.

So much—or rather, so little—for criticism. Of the results of Lord Charles Beresford's investigations it may be said at once that they are profoundly depressing. A foreigner might be excused for rising from the perusal of "The Break-up of China" with the comfortable conviction that England's star is setting, and I envy any Englishman who can lay it down without grave anxiety. It records failure after failure, shows point after point at which our policy has been at fault, describes incident after incident in which we have been worsted, narrates again and again how the rights of Englishmen have been deliberately ignored and sometimes even forcibly destroyed by foreign officials without a word of successful protest from us. The average Englishman thinks Civis Romanus sum, and is sure the might of Britain is behind him if he is wronged. Let him read the story of Messrs. Evans, Pugh, and Co., of Hankow, and drop his pleasant delusion. This firm bought land in Hankow in 1862 and registered it at the British Consulate in 1864. It was marked with boundary stones, and even the Chinese law itself gives a good title after ten years' ownership. In March, 1896, the French and Russian Governments secured new land concessions from China at Hankow. In these Messrs. Evans, Pugh, and Co.'s land was situated, and they immediately protested. Thereupon the Foreign Office telegraphed to the firm, through the British Minister, "British-owned land cannot be included in Russian concession without consent of owner." With admirable energy, and to make sure, the Foreign Office sent this telegram again in July. Between April, 1896, and December, 1898, Messrs. Evans, Pugh, and Co. forwarded nineteen protests, stating they would not consent to have their land included in the Russian concession. In July, 1898, they were warned by the Russian Consul that their business must be discontinued on January 1st, 1899, or it would be prohibited. Lord Charles continues:—

On January 2, 1899, Cossacks forcibly interfered to prevent hides being taken into Messrs. Evans and Pugh's establishment, and also seized the hides already in the store and threw them out. On Messrs. Evans and Pugh appealing to the British Consul and asking permission to enrol special constables for the protection of their property, the British Consul advised them to do nothing of the sort, as he (the British Consul) was afraid the firm would not be supported in such action by H.M.'s Government.

That is the end of the story. Civis Romanus sum is relegated to the copybook. It is not surprising that every Chinese official with whom Lord Charles discussed the future relations of Great Britain and China expressed the opinion that England will do nothing because she is afraid of Russia. Again, it is supposed by the Englishman at home that the British subject receives equal protection whatever be his race or colour. This is another delusion, and Lord Charles is the first to call attention prominently to the fact. In Hongkong and Singapore we have an enormous number of Chinese British subjects, men born of naturalized parents, under the British flag, often speaking English, imbued with Western ideas, admirable men of business, ideal forerunners of British trade in the interior of China. Naturally they are disliked by the Chinese for their foreign sympathies, and if left without protection in China they are subjected to every kind of annoyance and "squeeze." Our policy should obviously be to make these men as secure in China as while they are under the flag at home. Will it be credited that the primal condition of protection is that they should cut off their queues and thus make themselves objects of contempt and hatred to their fellow-countrymen in China, and that even then we do all we can to avoid taking any responsibility for their safety and well-being?

Our Consular system, again, is the subject of complaint from almost every Chamber of Commerce. The index contain references to no fewer than twelve pages under the heading, "Consuls, Complaints against," and, although Lord Charles thinks some of these unfair, the merchants living under the jurisdiction of these Consuls, who are also their personal friends, should be the best judges. "Throughout China," he says, "I was struck by the strong sentiments expressed by the British commercial community on the subject of the Consular body." The merchant, in fact, who ought to know, considers that the citizen of every other country is better looked after by his officials than he himself is. The charge of apathy and ignorance against the Home Government recurs again and again. The Shanghai Chamber of Commerce, the most important body of the kind in China, gave three reasons for the "limited expansion of trade with China," of which this was the third: "The general apathy and want of knowledge which have been displayed at home concerning Chinese affairs." By nobody in China, so far as this book shows, is the British Government believed to have any definite policy as regards China. Manchuria, of course, is looked upon as just about to become a Russian province. Troops are pouring into it, forts are being armed (seventy guns have been mounted at Port Arthur, while not a single one has been sent to Wei-hai-wei), and strategic railways built with "feverish haste"; the Chinese Maritime Customs and private Chinese rights are alike disregarded, Russian ships laden with railway material paying no duties, although these duties are allocated to the payment of interest on foreign loans, and Russian railway lines being run through standing crops on private land without compensation to the owners.

Upon one fatal mistake of British policy Lord Charles lays great and just emphasis—more emphasis than any previous writer. This is our custom of punishing China, when another nation has wrung an unjust or extravagant concession out of her, by wringing a similar one out of her ourselves, instead of taking the simpler and manlier course of facing the nation which has done her—and the trade of the world, including our own—wrong, and insisting upon respect for general treaty rights.

Lord Charles Beresford had opportunities greater than any previous investigator has enjoyed for seeing what China is really doing, and his facts about armies, arsenals, railways, and waterways, and the opinions expressed to him by influential Chinese, constitute a body of new and highly important information, while his summaries concerning currency, tariffs, and treaties are the most convenient form in which these subjects may be studied. When he comes to the general condition of China, however, and the prospects of reform, he is upon ground that has been traversed by many writers with more than his experience. There is not a single spot or direction in China to which one can point and say, "Here is improvement, promise, reform." The Emperor's hasty but well-meant edicts of reform cost him his influence. The progressive mandarins have all been thrust from office. Corruption is the atmosphere in which official China lives and moves. An interview with the Empress Dowager costs £1,000 for the chief eunuch—who is a sham eunuch. A degraded viceroy pays £20,000 for his reinstatement. The Chinaman in charge of the great arsenal at Tientsin receives a salary of £21 a month. The arsenals at Canton and Nanking are making gingalls—cannon nine feet long fired from men's shoulders. Everywhere "enormous sums of money are being expended upon war material that in most cases is absolutely useless." All executive and administrative posts are still given to men who pass examinations in the Chinese classics. Many troops are regularly drilled with bows and arrows. One general met by Lord Charles receives pay for 10,000 men. He has actually 800, and on inspection day he fills up his ranks with coolies hired at 5½d. a day, the inspector being, of course, bribed to say that he has found the army in good order. The Grand Canal is dry for many miles during four months of the year. Piracy is rampant and increasing. Whole districts—indeed, provinces—are devastated by rebellion, which the Imperial Government is utterly powerless to cope with.

The expansion of foreign trade is absolutely barred by two causes—first, the absence of any security for foreign capital invested, which may be endangered or lost at any moment by hostile Chinese official action, by successful rebellion, or by foreign aggression; secondly, the prohibitive likin, or inland dues, which are collected everywhere in spite of distinct treaty rights to the contrary. These two conditions, insecurity and illegal taxation, are what block the way, both for China and for foreign nations. It may be hoped that, owing to the great publicity given to Lord Charles' mission, and the lucid, condensed, and convincing shape in which the facts appear in his report, the British manufacturing and trading community will at last awake to the grave truth. It is surprising that the report is not issued by the Associated Chambers of Commerce, as was originally understood to be the intention. Assuredly they could not spend money with more advantage to British commercial interests than by arranging with Lord Charles to republish his report at threepence or sixpence.

Lord Charles' remedies fall under two heads—commercial and diplomatic, or British and international; the first being such as this country can execute independently for the benefit of her own trade, and the second being those wider steps for the reorganization of China which demand the concurrent and harmonious action of all the Great Powers. This division is hardly made clear enough by Lord Charles. Our Consular system, for example, no longer corresponds to our needs. British merchants in China earnestly pressed upon the Government the necessity for a commercial attaché—a qualified man, with a sound business training and a position sufficient to ensure his being treated with respect by the Chinese.

In order to meet their wishes the appointment was offered to one of our best Consuls in China, but at a lower salary and allowances than he is already receiving. Very naturally he declined this generous offer, and to make matters more ludicrous the title of "Commercial Attaché" was added to the office of Consul-General at Shanghai, with a salary of one hundred pounds a year. This was merely adding an impossible task to the already over-burdened work of the Consul-General, and making him a present of a hundred pounds a year for work which he could not perform.

The gravity of the problem, however, arises from the fact that the vital difficulty is the progressive decay of China herself. And this cannot be solved by any one nation—not even by England. Lord Charles suggests a series of reasonable, well-considered steps of reform. They demand, as an antecedent condition, the establishment of security in China. Here we reach, finally, the crux of the problem. The complete reorganization of the Chinese army and police, as has been done in Egypt, by an international body, Chinese in name and authority, but foreign in direction, like the Chinese Imperial Maritime Customs, England taking the lead—such is Lord Charles' proposal—and by an alliance ad hoc between Great Britain, the United States, Germany, and Japan. There is not the remotest chance of the realization of such an alliance. Is there otherwise any possibility of enforcing the antecedent condition of the preservation of China and the development of trade there? The answer seems easy: only by the adoption of a very strong foreign policy by this country, based upon strict rights under existing treaties, with the conviction that it would be ultimately supported by the United States, and possibly also by Japan. The alternative is the partition of China into "spheres of influence," and, for my part, I fully agree with Lord Charles Beresford that this policy means war in the end. China, as a nation, is fast approaching her end; it may come almost any day. She has plenty of money, plenty of men, plenty of national character. If England does not save her, nobody else will. Her most powerful neighbour, as things are, would welcome her decay. In Lord Charles Beresford's report the Sibyl offers her three remaining books to the British Tarquin. Will he pay the price?

After Lord Charles Beresford's depressing picture of commercial and financial China, Mrs. Archibald Little's vivacious sketches of life in INTIMATE CHINA: The Chinese as I have seen them (Hutchinson, 21s.) are a welcome relief. There is nothing new, strictly speaking, in what she has to tell, but she has been in such intimate relations with the Chinese, through her husband's pioneering and business—Mr. Little has not received half the recognition due to him for his great services in opening up the Upper Yang-tze, or that he would have received if he had been a German or a Russian—and she writes so pleasantly and so wisely that her book may be heartily recommended. In her pages the Chinese man and woman appear as human beings like the rest of us, and their motives no longer masked by inscrutable yellow faces. The home life of the Chinese women presents, as Mrs. Little has intimately seen it, far more aspects in common with the life of Western women than we have been accustomed to perceive. And the stories here told of the beginnings—the ill-fated beginnings—of Chinese reform, and the share women took in it, are of great interest. Mrs. Little, too, has collected much gossip about the mysterious "Forbidden City"—the Chinese Court and its occupants. Precise popular expositions of the "squeeze," the fung shui, likin, "golden lilies," the Chinese dress, housekeeping, servants, calls, marriage, religion, examinations, co-operation, and many other everyday matters of Chinese life are given, and they are written from knowledge and experience. In popular fashion Mrs. Little also lays bare the fact of Chinese official rottenness and the causes of it, so the lady who reads this book while her husband is studying Lord Charles Beresford's will be ready to discuss the Chinese problem with him at the end. We think, however, that either author or publisher has made a mistake in issuing this excellent volume at a guinea. In less luxurious style, at a third of the price, it might have had a large sale. Even the opulent reader may resent, for instance, paying a farthing-and-a-half a page when he finds that the last chapter contains twenty consecutive pages reprinted bodily from the China Mail.

THE BIOGRAPHICAL EDITION OF THACKERAY COMPLETED.

Ballads, Critical Reviews, Tales, Various Essays, Letters, Sketches, &c. By William Makepeace Thackeray. With a Life of the Author by Leslie Stephen, and a Bibliography. With Illustrations by the Author, George Cruikshank, and John Leech. 8½ x 5½ in., lxxxii. + 751 pp. London, 1899. Smith, Elder. 6s.

There is a distinguishing charm about this new edition of the works of Thackeray. To the bright and noble sentiment, to the never-failing humour and playful sense of fun that pervade all Titmarshian literature, we have here—by virtue of Mrs. Richmond Ritchie's genial biographical prefaces—an added feeling of human interest that is extremely grateful. Before coming to the main purposes of the volume, we are personally introduced to the writer by his proud and loving daughter, whose peculiar gift it is to remove all ceremony, and to set us at once on terms of familiarity and respectful ease with the amiable giant of literature. The result of such intimacy is a keen appreciation of the tenderer, the more sensitive and affectionate, side of his character. Never before has Thackeray intime been set so completely before his readers. What Mrs. Ritchie leaves unsaid in purely biographical recital Mr. Leslie Stephen says for her in this volume. This is a reprint of the well-known memoir in the Dictionary of National Biography, interesting, matter-of-fact, and just, betraying no bias, and extenuating nothing. One statement in it, however, does not seem quite clear. Mr. Stephen tells us that the last two volumes of the "standard" and other editions were intended by the publishers "to prevent the publication of more trifles." But since then these publishers and others have issued other pieces—and left others unprinted, which are, some of them, as admirable as any. Why, then, suppress them?

It is impossible to complain that the new volume stints us in the collection it has made. Besides the Ballads from Punch, Fraser, The Times, and elsewhere, and the more serious efforts in verse, we have several pieces which have been included in no previous edition—"Reading a Poem," with the other contributions, except one, in the volume known as "Loose Sketches," together with "The Ballad of Catherine Hayes"; and, as Thackeray calls it, "The Famous History of Lord Bateman." With respect to the latter (which, it may be remarked, presents some examples of Thackeray's very best draughtsmanship—such as the figure of "the proud young porter") we are told nothing that sheds light on the little controversy that has long raged round this tiny romance. Based upon the ancient broadside song—"The Loving Ballad of Lord Bateman"—it contains some amusing departures from the original; and it differs again from that version which George Cruikshank so vivaciously illustrated, and often would not less vivaciously recite. Cruikshank's version is prefaced by an introduction that is commonly attributed to Dickens, and not a few have persistently ascribed to Thackeray the editing of the verse. The discovery of the Thackeray-illustrated version by Mrs. Julia Stephen suggests as the explanation that Thackeray was intending to produce these elaborate drawings, but in the face of Cruikshank's work, issued in 1839, desisted from publication.

More than any other, this volume reveals Thackeray as a critic of literature and art, although the essays, for the most part, belong to his earlier period; and for the first time we find them all together within the covers of a single volume. But perhaps to Thackeray students the most important feature of the present volume is the "Bibliography," with its accompanying referential index which Mr. W. J. Williams has prepared. For and against this bibliography there is a good deal to be said. I have examined it with great care and gladly bear witness to the unusual accuracy of its entries and collations, and to its laboriously compiled cross-references between reprinted pieces. But its omissions and inconsistencies are not a few; nor is its plan such as to include anything like all the known articles and poems of Thackeray. This plan is the one adopted by Mr. C. P. Johnson—namely, the arrangement of the works in the order of their first appearance in book-form. This at once rules out all the unprinted pieces, some of which are of interest and even of literary merit not less than that of many on which this edition may be supposed to confer the stamp of permanence. The scheme, moreover, is valuable neither as a clear chronology nor as an indication of Thackeray's development as pictured in his writings. It thus happens that "Catherine," for example, is quaintly entered under 1869, though it first appeared thirty years before. The inherent disadvantage of such an arrangement is too obvious to be insisted upon; and it needs but a glance at the bibliographies of Richard Herne Shepherd and his follower, Mr. Anderson (in the "Great Writers" Series), to see how much more logical and useful is the plan of simple record, year by year.

The first item entered is "Flore et Zéphyr," which, it will be remembered, consists only of plates. It is not clear, then, why no mention is made of Thackeray's other sets of illustrations: those to Douglas Jerrold's "Men of Character" (the originals of which are now in the South Kensington Museum), and the "Etchings at Cambridge." We miss "Sketches after English Landscape Painters" (1860) and, among the Britannia contributions, "Rolandseck." I imagine that the correct title of the 1855-7 edition of "Miscellanies: Prose and Verse" is "Mr. Thackeray's Miscellaneous Writings," and am satisfied that it is the second edition of "The Four Georges" which Mr. Williams has entered; for the true first edition, issued in the same year (1861), bears the sub-title, "Sketches of Manners, Morals, Court, and Town Life." There is a curious error in the footnote to the volume of "Miscellanies" afore-mentioned. Referring to the Ballad printed in prose form, here called "The Speculators," Mr. Williams tells us that it does "not appear to have been published anywhere previously." As a matter of fact it appeared in Punch, No. 203, p. 244, in 1845, under the title of "Railroad Speculators." Again, it is very regrettable that, in the entry of "Contributions to Punch," Percival Leigh's poem, "The Flying Duke," should have been included. The true authorship of those verses and of "A Plea for Plush" I have previously set forth in these columns; the latter correction has been accepted by Mr. Williams, but not the former. In this way a mistake is handed on with such potent authority that the ultimate establishment of the facts must become more difficult.

Nor is it quite clear on what principle some of Thackeray's letters and reviews are excluded, for a certain number find due record here; nor why mention is omitted of some of the papers for which Thackeray worked and which Mr. Leslie Stephen duly records in his Life. But nowhere do I find any reference to the Pictorial Times, to which Mr. Michael Angelo Titmarsh was a frequent contributor on the subject of the fine arts. The references to the Punch contributions are hopelessly inadequate; for not only are no additions made to the sparse entries in the existing bibliographies, but not a few of those which so appear elsewhere Mr. Williams has left unnoticed. Furthermore, "Little Spitz," "Grant in Paris," "Daddy, I'm Hungry," in the Nation (when under the editorship of Sir Charles Gavan Duffy), the articles on Christmas Books, "Arabella" and "The Partie Fine," as well as—intelligibly perhaps—"The Exquisites" and "King Glumpus," are all wanting here. It will thus be seen that the final bibliography of the works of Thackeray is still to come. Such a one is, I understand, in preparation in America; but it must wait until all the great author's writings which have been discovered have been indexed, when the labours of Mr. Williams, Mr. Johnson, and Mr. Anderson must be absorbed, and the additional Punch matter, in due course to be set forth, may be included with them.

It should be added that Mrs. Ritchie gives some interesting biographical family details of her father's parents and grandparents, of whom portraits are well reproduced. Speaking of Thackeray's methods she says:—"When my father wrote a poem he used to be more agitated than when he wrote in prose. He would come into the room worried and excited, saying, 'Here are two more days wasted. I have done nothing at all. It has taken me four mornings' work to produce six lines.' Then, after a further struggle, all would go well." The illustrations to the volume are varied and adequate.

M. H. SPIELMANN.

In the introduction of the twelfth volume, LOVEL THE WIDOWER, &c., of the biographical edition of Thackeray's works, Mrs. Richmond Ritchie gives some details of his last works and some delicate memories of his closing days. It is divided into two parts—the first telling something of the bibliography of the "Roundabout Papers," and the second giving a glimpse behind the scenes as "Denis Duval" is being brought into being. Of almost all the essays Mrs. Ritchie has some slight but interesting recollections:—

"On a Lazy, Idle Boy" was begun in the large, low sitting room of the little inn at Coire where we were detained for many days. . . . "The Two Children in Black" were met in the train going to Heidelberg, and seen several times afterwards; of the paper "On some late Great Victories" the first words are, "On the 13th day of April last I went to see a friend in a neighbouring crescent."

The friend was my grandmother [says Mrs. Ritchie] who lived a couple of years in Brompton Crescent and remained there until my grandfather's death, when she came to us. My father paid her a daily visit on his way to town.

About the essay on a generally recognized editorial difficulty she says:—

A "Thorn in the Cushion" is very well known, and often quoted. I found a packet of thorns only the other day in an old box where I was looking for figs, and felt that a quarter of a century had not quite swept away the sting of these spinulæ. Sometimes, as my father says, the letters contained not mere thorns, but bludgeons.

"I suppose," she says later, "some people disliked my father. . . ." And she gives the following letter from Charles Dickens, which may help to dispose of one familiar fallacy at least:—

March 23, 1855.

My dear Thackeray,—I have read in The Times to-day an account of your last night's lecture, and cannot refrain from assuring you in all truth and earnestness that I am profoundly touched by your generous reference to me. I do not know how to tell you what a glow it spread over my heart. Out of its fulness I do entreat you to believe that I shall never forget your words of commendation. If you could wholly know at once how you have moved me and how you have animated me, you would be the happier I am certain.

Faithfully yours ever,

CHARLES DICKENS.

A friend's remark is worth quoting :—"Thackeray could not have produced 'Vanity Fair' unless Eden had been shining brightly before his eyes."

In that part of the introduction dealing with "Denis Duval," one can see how the fire of Thackeray's genius was beginning to slacken, and the ardours of his prime to leave him. In the letter announcing his resignation of the editorship of the Cornhill Magazine he says :—

Once, on a voyage to America, I met a sea captain who was passenger in a ship he had formerly commanded. No man could be more happy and cheerful than this. He rode through the gale with the most perfect confidence in the ship and its captain; he surveyed the storm as being another gentleman's business. . . .

"As another gentleman's business" Thackeray could enjoy the magazine and many other things; but there were still books to write, and, as his last and unfinished novel took form, the labour pressed upon him with an almost intolerable weight.

I sit for hours [he writes in May, 1863] before my paper, not doing my book, but incapable of doing anything else, and thinking upon that subject always, waking with it, walking about with it, and going to bed with it. Oh, the struggles and bothers—oh, the throbs and pains about this trumphy!

The volume contains the little play of The Wolves and the Lamb, and the story of "Lovel the Widower," the thirty-two "Roundabout Papers," the first eight chapters of "Denis Duval," with a hitherto unpublished chapter, and the Notes which round off the story. Some of the "Roundabout" essays are illustrated by Charles Keene, and several of these contain portraits of Thackeray himself; he is to be seen in the admirable drawing entitled "Father or Uncle," in "A Great Battle," and, perhaps, "The Evening Post." Frederick Walker's drawing of "Denis' Valet" here reproduced is a very interesting example of this artist's work. We cannot lay aside this volume, which is practically the last of the biographical series, without thanking Mrs. Ritchie for the pleasure she has given us. The picture of her father, painted with so dexterous a hand and yet with so much simplicity and truth, only restates the high estimate in which he is held as a writer and as a man. The words Lord Houghton wrote at the time of his death express the feeling of the present generation, no less than that of his contemporaries, towards the most agreeable satirist of our time :—

O gentler censor of our age,
Prime master of our ampler tongue,
Whose word of wit and generous page
Were never wroth except with wrong;
Fielding without the manner's dross,
Scott with a spirit's larger room,
What prelate deems thy grave his loss?—
What Halifax erects thy tomb?
But maybe he who so could draw
The hidden great, the humble wise,
Yielding with them to God's good law,
Makes the Pantheon where he lies.

THE SPIRIT OF JAPAN.

Exotics and Retrospectives. By Lafcadio Hearn, Lecturer on English Literature in the Imperial University, Tokyo. London, 1899. Sampson Low.

[By SIR EDWIN ARNOLD.]

A new book upon Japan from the pen of Mr. Lafcadio Hearn—besides promising a refined and precious addition to our too scanty list of really well-written books—is sure to convey new facts and deeper insights about Japan even to those who already know much about the country. This charming little volume fulfils expectation in both respects. As a piece of literary work it is worth, for delicacy and lofty thought, whole tons of the trash and trivialities cast monthly on the dumping ground of literature. As a group of studies in continuation of Mr. Hearn's delightful "Out of the East" and "Glimpses of Unfamiliar Japan," it once more stamps him as of all Western men living the one most gifted—by subtlety of mind and swift instinctive sympathy of heart—to understand and to interpret the secret spirit of Japan. Drawn to that land at first by the attraction which its wholly special character and genius exercise upon high sensibilities, Mr. Hearn has become by residence and study more intimately at home with the inner genius and popular life—the Yamato Damashi—of Japan than any author not born of her soil, and those on this side of the globe who would comprehend the Japanese people and their singular place in humanity can have no guide so sure and skilful as this introspective and most accomplished writer. But such a piece of lovely and faithful labour must not be perused with the slashing haste that suffices for ordinary book-scouring. It is a little volume to handle luxuriously and at leisure, like a consummate bit of ivory carving, a length of fairy lace-breadths, or a sword-hilt of gold and bronze wrought by a great master. It should be reserved for golden hours and read by a tranquil mind. To approach so exquisite a work with the ordinary precipitance of modern readers would be to do the author dishonour and to forfeit the magic pleasure which his gentle genius can bestow.

The first paper in the little book describes in simple but effective language the ascent of the famous mountain of Fujisan—and as one of those who has himself preceded Mr. Hearn in that enterprise, I can confidently declare that a better account could not be written. I, too, have seen the morning break from the brink of the "Spring of Gold," when all the world seemed to be lying below in an endless map of blue and rose and green and grey. Then Mr. Hearn takes up the pretty topic of the "insect musicians" of Japan, and, with his usual close research, tells all there is to be told of that passion which the Japanese common-folk have in their caged singing-insects. The Greeks possessed the same taste, and our author goes into the particulars of it with all appropriate gravity, enumerating the varieties of singing insects, depicting their cages, and giving us rich selections from the literature—especially the poetry—which abounds about these Kirigirisu, Kusahibari, and their like. If you have ever seen, in a Japan ennichi, the booth of an insect dealer and found nothing to admire in this delicate craze of the citizens, you will change your mind when you read what the author writes, after citing that pathetic little uta—

*Mushi yo mushi
Natte ingwa ga
Tsukaru nara?*

i.e. :—

Oh insect, insect! thinkest then That Karma can
Be expiated by singing?

Mr. Hearn says :—

The Western reader would probably suppose that the insect-condition, or insect-state-of-being, is here referred to; but the real thought of the speaker, presumably a woman, is that her own sorrow is the result of faults committed in former lives, and is therefore impossible to alleviate.

It will have been observed that a majority of the verses cited refer to autumn and to the sensations of autumn. Certainly Japanese poets have not been insensible to the real melancholy inspired by autumn—that vague, strange annual revival of ancestral pain; dim inherited sorrow of millions of memories associated through millions of years with the death of summer; but, in nearly every utterance of this melancholy, the veritable allusion is to grief of parting. With its colour-changes, its leaf-whirlings, and the ghostly plaint of its insect-voices, autumn Buddhistically symbolizes impermanency, the certainty of bereavement, the pain that clings to all desire, and the sadness of isolation.

But even if these poems on insects were primarily intended to shadow amorous emotion, do they not reflect also for us the subtlest influences of nature—wild, pure nature—upon imagination and memory? Does not the place accorded to insect-melody, in the home-life as well as in the literature of Japan, prove an æsthetic sensibility developed in directions that yet remain for us almost unexplored? Does not the shrilling booth of the insect-seller at a night festival proclaim even a popular and universal comprehension of things divined in the West only by our rarest poets—the pleasure-pain of autumn's beauty, the weird sweetness of the voices of the night, the magical quickening of remembrance by echoes of forest or field? Surely we have something to learn from the people in whose mind the simple chant of a cricket can awaken whole fairy-swarms of tender and delicate fancies. We may boast of being their masters in the mechanical, their teachers of the artificial in all its varieties of ugliness; but in the knowledge of the natural, in the feeling of the joy and beauty of earth, they exceed us like the Greeks of old. Yet, perhaps, it will be only when our blind aggressive industrialism has wasted and sterilized their paradise—substituting everywhere for beauty the utilitarian, the conventional, the vulgar, the utterly hideous—that we shall begin with remorseful amazement to comprehend the charm of that which we destroyed.

We have left no space to dwell upon the equally interesting papers on Frogs, on "Moon-desire," and the "Literature of the Dead," as well as that strange, weird story "A Question of the Zen Texts." Nor can we speak in any detail at all of the "Retrospectives," although these contain some of the profoundest and most beautiful philosophic speculations and some of the finest appreciations I have met with of the deeper mystical doctrines of Buddhism. Enough that here is a book of a thousand—a book to linger over, which, with a seriousness worthy of its grace and gravity, will be for the true judge of literary skill and intellectual opulence an unusual delight, which he will be grateful not to have diminished by too much prelibation.

THE ROMANCE OF THE BOERS.

Fifty Years of the History of the Republic in South Africa (1795-1845). By J. C. Voigt, M.D. In two volumes. xxviii. + 350 pp., xii. + 316 pp. London, 1899.

Unwin. 25/- n.

To those who have learned to look at history dispassionately, and do not judge events solely by the magnitude of their results, there are few modern stories more fascinating than that of the foundation of the two Boer States of South Africa. There is, perhaps, no recent parallel to this complete realization of the ideal expressed in Emerson's "Boston Hymn," where the founder of the Republic declares,

I will have never a noble,
No lineage counted great,
Fishers and choppers and ploughmen Shall constitute a State.

Late events have indeed given undue prominence to the South African Republic—a prominence of which its founders never dreamed, and which they would have been as loth as are their successors to accept. But whether gold had been discovered on the Rand or not, the tale which Dr. Voigt tells in these able and conscientious volumes would be worth hearing. The story has already been told, on a large scale by the laborious Mr. Theal, on a small scale by several less known writers. But Dr. Voigt has a doubly good excuse for telling it again, first, in the possession of a good deal of new material, and, secondly, in the ability to make an excellent and most interesting book of it. One may not always agree with his conclusions, but it is impossible not to admire the enthusiasm and candour with which he tells the story of the hardy frontiersmen, the Dutch and Huguenot Voortrekkers who, in the first half of the present century, laid the foundation of the two Boer States. Readers of his stirring pages will agree that much apparent stagnation to-day may be forgiven to the Boers in memory of the admirable fight which they made for civilization fifty years ago. To them is due the first breaking of the savage but soldierly Zulu and Matabele powers which threatened to draw an impassable barrier against white civilization across the northern frontier of Cape Colony. The Voortrekkers were very fine fellows, and did good service to the cause of African progress. Their later history is less admirable, because the very virtues of the frontiersman tend to unfit him for citizenship of a peaceful State. We may quote Dr. Voigt's description of a typical Voortrekker, Andries Hendrik Potgieter, who was distinguished in the struggle against Dingaan:—

He had grown up an unlettered man. The only book which he knew was the Bible. He had read nothing, he knew nothing, or next to nothing, concerning the history of modern civilization. He had made no study of the theories then ruling and guiding the development of the political world in Europe. He cared nothing whatever about those theories. What he had learned as to the ancient world was contained in the one Book which he carried with him—in that history of the nation which, led by God, travelled through the wilderness and through the country of the heathen to the Promised Land. His faith in the Divine control and human destiny was as firm and unyielding as that of any pious Israelite wandering through the desert. He unhesitatingly believed that Heaven would not forsake him and his people, would protect and shield them from harm, and would ultimately bring them to a country where they could dwell in peace and contentment under a Government of their own choice. . . . In the hard school of experience he had been taught all that he knew. He had fought the Kaffirs; he had encountered the elephant, the lion, the leopard, the bull buffalo, the black rhinoceros, and all the dangerous beasts of the hunting-field. On more than one occasion he had had to guard himself, not only against the poisoned arrows of the bushman marauders, but against the venomous snakes and reptiles of the forest and the mountain. He had braved the dangers of swollen rivers which he had had to cross, and of the thunderstorm, with its lightning shafts and its death-dealing fury, when there was no friendly roof to shelter him. He knew the languages, the habits and customs, the prejudices, the likes and dislikes, of the native races among which he had lived and grown up.

This description, which is not merely a bit of rhetoric, but an account based on the facts of Potgieter's life, would serve for a character of the typical Voortrekker. Of such metal were composed the shrewd Pretorius and the chivalrous Retief, whose names ought to be as familiar to us as those of Fenimore Cooper's backwoodsmen; for, if we except the immortal Leather-stocking, the one set are quite as interesting as the other. Dr. Voigt's chief skill has been expended on the tale of the war in which Dingaan's savage power was broken by the Boer horsemen in stern revenge for the fate of Pieter Retief and his sixty-five gallant companions. The historian gives us a new and very striking picture of the fate of these brave men, whose bodies were impaled, after the massacre, on the crest of a hill near Dingaan's kraal. When the avengers arrived, they found on Retief's corpse the deed of cession of Natal which he had persuaded Dingaan to sign before treachery ended his mission. Dr. Voigt justly says:—

In all history there are few more tragic pictures than that of the martyred leader keeping guard on that hill—his faithful heart torn from his body, his sixty-five murdered companions keeping watch with him, guarding the document for which they had given their lives, and on which their nation's claim to independence in their own land of Natal rests.

The days, the weeks, the months roll on, and still stationed on that precipice stand those faithful sentinels, the guard of death, waiting for the advent of those to whom they have bequeathed the inheritance of their people's freedom. Through all their lonely vigil their leader holds clasped to his side, even in death, that document which will give life to a new nation.

The savage Zulus look with awe on the silent watchers when the darkness of night falls upon the mountains. Even the vultures and wild beasts respect the dead sentinels.

Here is a fine theme for the first great poet or painter whom South Africa shall produce. The Afrikaners as yet are, as Dr. Voigt says, an inarticulate people. If they give birth to one or two more historians with Dr. Voigt's union of impartial labour with enthusiasm and a sense of the picturesque, that reproach will soon be removed. No one can read these volumes without gaining new comprehension of the Boers, and a tolerance of even those drawbacks which are but the seamy side of their rustic and manly virtues.

A MOSLEM ON THE SARACENS.

A Short History of the Saracens: from the Earliest Times to the Destruction of Baghdad and the Expulsion of the Moors from Spain. By Ameer Ali, Syed, M.A., C.I.E., Judge of her Majesty's High Court in Bengal. With Maps, Illustrations, &c. 7½ × 5 in., xxiii. + 638 pp. London, 1899.

Macmillan. 7/6 n.

A good popular History of the Saracens has long been wanted. With no disrespect to Sir William Muir's in many ways excellent book on the Caliphate, of which a third reprint has just appeared (Smith, Elder, 16s.), it cannot be said quite to fill the vacant place, and the only other recent work on the subject, in "The Story of the Nations" Series, is hardly satisfactory. We have now a fresh attempt, written by a Moslem from the Mahomedan point of view, which at least seems to promise freshness and independence of the stereotyped model. A Moslem, acquainted with the Arabic sources, may be expected to deal with Mahomedan history in an original manner and with that sympathy which the prejudices of religion and race make almost impossible in most European writers. Syed Ameer Ali, moreover, is no ordinary Moslem; he is a man of considerable cultivation, who has read widely and thought deeply; his books on Islam represent the "Broad Church school" of that religion; and his general ability and fairness of mind are proved by his seat upon the bench of the High Court of Judicature at Fort William. From such a Moslem we should expect great things, and it is disappointing to be obliged to confess that we have here little more than a well-written and well-founded compilation, running almost wholly on the old lines. The received tradition is to make the Caliphate the central thread, and when, as in the case of Sir William Muir's history, the book is entitled "The Caliphate," this is reasonable enough. But "the Saracens" are much more than the Caliphate, and the title implies a general history of Mahomedan rule. After the ninth century, the Caliphs ceased to be the centre of Moslem power, and interest passes to the local dynasties. Nevertheless, following the old plan, the history of these dynasties is subordinated to that of the nominal pontiffs of Baghdad, and the tale ends with the destruction of the Caliphate there by the Mongols. It is a bad arrangement, and we hoped the Syed would have broken through the established bonds.

In truth, there is no attempt at originality. Syed Ameer Ali appears to have worked chiefly from well-known European sources, though he has also used some Arabic chronicles, but, we fancy, largely through translations. Hence he is a good deal at the mercy of his authorities, of whom he seems to have no very critical judgment. When a branch of his subject has been thoroughly worked up by others—as the Moors in Spain—he writes admirably about it; when there is no good European authority—as for the history of the Buyides or Seljuks—his chapters become meagre and halting. There are immense gaps, and important phases are dismissed in a paragraph. Nor is there that general philosophic grasp which gives a certain value to Sédillot's interesting sketch, or that boldness of conception and dramatic grouping which make the late Colonel Osborn's books on Mahomedan history, with all their glaring faults, remarkably impressive. On the other hand, the Syed's method has its advantages. He has taken great pains to collect his facts, and, considering the immense breadth and complexity of the history, he has marshalled them skilfully. He writes soberly, and his natural Mahomedan prejudices do not as a rule affect the truth of the narrative; they are shown chiefly in the citation of Christian and European enormities—often apocryphal like the "cannibalism" of the Crusaders—with a view to justify corresponding excesses in the East, on the principle that two blacks make a white. But he is not blind to the crimes and vices of Moslems; he denounces the harem system, the employment of eunuchs, and the licence and dissipation of many of the Caliphs; and if he is not quite ingenuous on the subject of polygamy, it is clear that he detects it and is anxious to show that it forms no essential part of Mahomed's system. His pages are overcrowded with names which must prove a stumbling-block to the English reader, but when he escapes from dry annals and comes to an outline of government, society, literature, and science, as they were in the time of the Caliphs, he writes with admirable lucidity and even eloquence. He has brought together a large collection of extremely interesting facts in Moslem civilisation—thanks largely to the previous labours of Alfred von Kremer—which will be as new as they must be surprising to the average reader. Further, by means of marginal contents, headlines, and running dates (both Christian and Mahomedan), he has done his utmost to make his work a serviceable hand-book for easy reference.

The book appears on the whole to be accurate: the dates, &c., are generally correct, as far as we have tested them by the Arabic authorities. But there are a great many slips in the Arabic names which are a little disconcerting in view of the fact that the Syed writes as one who knows the language. "The Barāda, the Chryssorrhoeas of the Greeks" contains mistakes in both the Arabic and the Greek name. The mother of the Prophet is called Amīna, as usual, though her name is pronounced Am'na. "Salama" is decidedly not "the fourth conjugation" of the root "salm." To say that on the conquest of Egypt "the Egyptian Christians, who were called Copts and belonged to the Melchite sect, were treated with marked favour, in consequence of their good will towards the Moslems" shows a complete misunderstanding of the relations of the Jacobites and Melikites with the Arabs. But, after all, the number of such slips and errors, in a volume of over 600 pages, crammed with facts and names, is uncommonly small, and Syed Ameer Ali may well be congratulated on the completion of a complex and difficult task, which, if it cannot be regarded as the ideal "History of the Saracens" for which we still yearn, is nevertheless a very useful and compendious summary derived from a large number of authoritative works.

THE WAR OF THE FUTURE.

The final volumes have just been published of the German translation of the elaborate Russian work, "The War of the Future: its Technical, Economical, and Political Significance," by Johann von Bloch (Puttkammer and Mühlbrecht, Berlin, 40m.). It is in six large volumes, bearing the German title Der Krieg. The original edition was published with the concurrence of the Tsar, and, if report is to be trusted, it was mainly responsible for the manifesto in favour of universal peace last autumn. The appearance of the book, in a language which makes it accessible to Western Europe, on the eve of the meeting of the Peace Congress is thus well-timed, for it is a work which may conceivably have considerable weight in the deliberations at the Hague.

In certain respects M. von Bloch's work is the most comprehensive treatise on modern warfare that has yet been written; we know of nothing published in any language within recent years which covers the field so completely or so thoroughly. The author, we understand, is a Warsaw banker; he is neither man of science nor soldier by profession. This brings with it the obvious advantage that war is not to him, as it usually is to the military specialist, merely an affair of the army and navy; his eyes are constantly open to its wider social and economic aspects; and here, it may be said at once, lies the strongest side of "The War of the Future." Volume IV.—"The Economic Disturbances and Material Loss of the Future War"—seems to us consequently much the most valuable, as it is the most original, part of M. von Bloch's work. The effects of war upon the social life of a nation, upon its commerce and finance, have never before been looked so straight in the face as here. The modern state, as M. von Bloch argues, is as essentially different from the medieval state as is the modern small calibre rifle from the crossbow. And this is a fact which our military prophets are too apt to forget. We cannot always agree with M. von Bloch's conclusions, but we must admit that he has marshalled here a most convincing array of facts and figures. If, to quote Moltke's mot, the time is to come "when war will ultimately abolish war," that consummation will, at least, be hastened by the increasing complexity of modern life and industry and the dependent relations in which one nation stands to another. It is the special merit of M. von Bloch's work to have brought this economic argument into the foreground. But the fact that the author is not a military expert has also its disadvantages. He discusses with minute detail the whole technique of war, from the passage of a bullet through the air to the most complicated problem of military tactics; he has studied carefully all the literature bearing even remotely on the subject, but his work is seriously defective in conciseness and scientific method. It is true, M. von Bloch does not profess to offer us a scientific treatise on war; his object has been rather to forecast the result of the unchecked development of war material. But the descriptive part, which occupies the first three volumes, and is profusely illustrated, is upon such an elaborate scale and brings together so much valuable material—especially statistical material—that it is a pity it should be so diffuse and so biased by the author's personal standpoint with regard to war.

The fundamental idea of the book is that the European war of the future will take place under conditions so widely different from those of any war in the past that even for the highest military authorities it is a Sphinx with an unsolved riddle. The destructive power of modern weapons has already reached a stage when little short of mutual annihilation must be the issue of a pitched battle between opposing armies. Had the French and German troops in 1870 been armed with the latest development of small-bore rifle their firing, it is calculated, would have been at least fourteen times as effective as it was, while the artillery of our day is forty times as deadly as that of twenty-five years ago. And who can say what aluminium and still finer bores may do in the immediate future? The improvement of military weapons has clearly made greater strides in the past twenty years than in all the centuries that have elapsed between the invention of gunpowder and the Franco-German War. The war of the future will bring no decisive conflicts; the kind of battle which took place round Metz in the Franco-German War will be the rule, not the exception, in the next great war. The opposing forces will stand three or four times more distant from each other than in the wars of the past; the armies will be enormously greater, and the comparative absence of smoke a trial of incalculable severity upon human nerves. The old ideals of martial heroism and personal valour will have to give place to new ideals where coolness and endurance are higher virtues than bravery. Again, these mammoth armies of the future, consisting, as they must in great part do, of imperfectly trained reserves, will offer unforeseen difficulties in the matter of command—difficulties of which the playing at war of annual manoeuvres can give no idea. Battles, so far from being accelerated by the improvement of the tools of warfare, will be protracted for days on end, and the shelter of trenches and barricades the only hope of escaping wholesale destruction. A great war in the future will thus only end after years, not of fighting, but of mechanical annihilation. These are the main lines in the picture which M. von Bloch draws for us of the war of the future between land forces, and his picture of the future of naval war points still more clearly to mutual annihilation as the final issue.

Throughout his entire work it must, however, be noted the author has in view only one possible war, a war in which all Europe will be involved, where, say, the Triple Alliance will take the field against the united forces of France and Russia. He takes little account of the kind of war of which we have had an example since the publication of the Russian edition of his work. And surely, as far as the disarmament argument is concerned, conflicts of the Spanish-American type, or wars with half-civilized races, are far more likely to disturb the peace equilibrium of the world in the future than any general European war. It is a pity, by the way, that the German translator did not, if only in a few foot-notes, bring the scientific results of the Spanish-

American War to bear upon M. von Bloch's work; it would have afforded a commentary to his admirable criticism of the confused state of international law where naval war is concerned.

"The War of the Future" is, as we have indicated, a "tract for the times" on an elaborate scale, a plea for universal disarmament. In his sixth volume the author sums up the results of his work, and, in conclusion, deals with the question of an International Court of Arbitration. This is probably the part of the work to which the general reader will turn with most interest, but it would hardly be fair to M. von Bloch to judge his whole work from the concluding volume. We have already complained of a want of scientific method; but that is, perhaps, excusable in a work intended to work directly upon the public mind. Here, however, in this final volume M. von Bloch gives full rein to his enthusiasm for Universal Peace, but, unfortunately, with a one-sidedness and lack of balance which, we fear, will detract from the impression created by the earlier volumes. On one page, to take only one example, we find M. von Bloch pessimistic enough to predict financial ruin for Europe if the present rate of war expenditure goes on for another fifty years, while on another he is naively optimistic enough to believe that the whole Eastern difficulty is peaceably to be solved by the establishment of an International Committee in Constantinople! M. von Bloch, when dealing with the facts and figures of the present, or applying them to the warfare of the future, is on surer ground than when he attempts to solve the political difficulties of the future.

RECENT VERSE.—II.

THE SUMMER SONNETS of the late Mrs. Parker (Grant Richards, 2s. 6d. n.) invite sympathetic consideration, not only for the pathetic circumstances of their appearance, but also for their intrinsic characteristics of devotion and high thought. Their author would probably have been the last to claim for them the higher qualities of poetry, but they are eminently humane and thoughtful. The two sonnets to the writer's husband are winningly frank and affecting, and the strong religious fervour that touches almost every poem in the little book will find it many friends among those who have the good will to sink criticism in appreciation.

In his volume, ON OATEN FLUTE (Glaisher), Mr. William Toynbee hints in his prelude that he is but a singer of rural ditties. The reader will do well not to take this attitude of simple rusticity very seriously. Mr. Toynbee is in reality among the most careful of lyrists; the first poems in this book, such as "The Relenting of Winter," "An April Carol," and so forth, are certainly written for those "cultured ears" he prefatorily disdains. "A May Madrigal" will show with what skill the author handles his simplicities:—

Kingcup and cowslip overspread
The meadows with a maze of gold;
The crofts are emerald-carpeted,
The thorns their creamy flakes unfold;
Laburnums shimmer, lilacs shower
Eddies of prodigal perfume,
A rose is flushing into flower—
'Tis May, 'tis May, the month of bloom!

The thrush, with blitheness brimming o'er,
Inaugurates his gala key,
The blackbird, tentative no more,
His top-note takes of ecstasy:
And where the willows streamward slant,
As stars steal out and shadows throng,
The nightingale her first will chant—
'Tis May, 'tis May, the month of song!

"On Oaten Flute" is a very agreeable little volume.

We could wish that the selection from the SONGS AND POEMS by Mr. T. D. Sullivan (Sealy, Bryers: Dublin, 2s.) had been made in a rather severer spirit; but if the intensely topical and somewhat ephemeral lyrics be passed over, there remains a considerable quantity of ringing, inspiring national songs. But too often the patriot overwhelms the poet, or, at least, the artist, and the result for the dispassionate critic of the series of compositions with which Mr. Sullivan has accompanied the Irish national movement since '48, is rather disappointing. Mr. Sullivan is at his best in songs to be sung "on march" and songs of a post-prandial character which, moreover, should do much to bring home to the English reader the real feeling of the Irish. There are also lighter pieces, such as that entitled "Mac-Cawthly of Pimlico," a tour de force written in the Cockney dialect of one who strives "at keepin' up the browge."

Mr. Herbert Thomas's BALLADS OF EVOLUTION (Camborne, Cornwall, 2s. 6d. n.) are the parerga of a working journalist. They are unfortunate in being prefaced by a somewhat injudicious "note" and a more than injudicious portrait in eccentric fancy dress, but the book contains verse that is fresh and virile, and a great deal that is good-humoured and genial. A "Prehistoric Prophet" has a share of wit, and is written with an easy swing that is characteristic of Mr. Thomas:—

These dwellers in the tree-tops were Society's elite
Who climbed the social ladder with anthropoidal feet;
And the way they clung to branches of their ancient family tree,
With swinging tails, betokened the pride of pedigree.

Here a gay young Romeo chattered in a most romantic strain
To a popular young damsel who was frivolous and vain;
There the patriarchs were snoring in an after-dinner doze,
And the juveniles sat counting the number of their toes.

It will be seen that the "evolution" of the title is not to be taken very seriously, but, as a whole, this is a breezy, manly little book enough.

Mr. John Ottwell's SHORT POEMS (Kegan Paul) contain a number of pointless epigrams conceived in such spirit as the following:—

Of dulness vast and wisdom small,
(His conversation shows it),
A bore is one who tires us all,
And never never knows it.

This could scarcely be more vapid; but when Mr. Ottwell is not trying to be an epigrammatist, he can write reasonably good blank-verse and tolerable lyrics. His book, however, if free from grave faults, is entirely conventional both in measure and matter.

WHITE HYACINTHS, by Lucy A. Bennett (Marshall Brothers, 2s. 6d.), is a collection of religious verses, admirable in intention, and very fairly put together. Adelaide Anne Procter is evidently the inspiring mistress of Miss Bennett, and at times she follows her manner pleasantly enough. Many of the pieces would win popularity as sacred songs if they were set to music of the right sort.

Mr. E. Samuels in SHADOWS (Longmans, 3s. 6d.) has attempted the unrhymed melodies affected by Mr. W. E. Henley (among many others) without properly understanding prosody. The result is that, although there is some thought in his little book, it presents, as a whole, a jargon of quite unmeasurable lines. For example:—

Years after I waked from deep sleep
With a child's low cry at my doorstep.
Yes, there lay the dark, beautiful face,
But in baby form,
And her child entered into my home.

This is neither prose nor poetry.

IN BORDELELAND, by R. S. Craig (Hawick, W. J. Kennedy), contains some charming illustrations by Mr. John Wallace. The verse is purely imitative; and Mr. Craig has yet to select his models. At present he confounds the Tennysonian strain with the hum-drum melodies of Mr. F. E. Weatherly, and a good deal of rather flatulent verse is the natural result.

THE DEMON OF THE WIND, by G. Hunt Jackson (John Long, 3s. 6d.), contains some verse of the drawing-room ballad class, with occasional slips upon a lower level:—

Along a bright and flowing stream
A fairy boat went up and down;
The captain was a juvenile,
With a pair of wings and roseate crown.

This third line is akin to the style of a milliner's catalogue.

SINGINGS THROUGH THE DARK, by Dora Montefiore (Sampson Low, 3s. 6d.), is pretentious, but ineffectual:—

Rise to thy higher self, aspire,
Labour, nor seek reward, nor tire,
Illusions vanish as thy soul mounts higher.

This, we fear, is the apotheosis of platitude.

Miss Frances Bannerman's volume, MILESTONES (Grant Richards, 3s. 6d. n.), contains a number of technically satisfactory verses treating of diverse subjects under headings such as "Expressions," "Votive," "Some Aspects" of love, "Influences," and so forth. The author appears as a poetic quietist; fluent, correct, but hardly inspired.

POEMS (John Lane, 5s. n.) is a rather grandiloquent title for Mr. A. Bernard Miall's book of collected verses. There is certainly a feeling for beauty, an attempt to capture the elusive things of nature in much of his work, but the result is often far from satisfactory. There are some telling stanzas in "The Bridal Night."

Mr. Gordon Bottomley, in POEMS AT WHITENIGHTS (The Unicorn, Cecil-court, 2s. 6d.), though he has a penchant for the mournful and the lurid, shows also a distinct gift of terse and musical expression, and "Y Rhosyn Du," in THE SCENT OF THE ROSE (Gay and Bird, 1s.), has produced a good many pretty songs that would go well to music.

We seem to have reached a poor average of verse in this short survey, and yet there are at least a dozen volumes on our table which fall below the standard of any we have mentioned. Clearly, though there is much good verse written nowadays, a great deal is published that should never venture outside the author's writing desk. In verse, in particular, the cacoethes scribendi remains impervious to every scruple of prudence and of wisdom!

GOLF, ANCIENT AND MODERN.

In 1890 the publishers of the Radminton Library debated whether a whole volume should be devoted to golf. Mr. H. G. Hutchinson admits, in the preface of his new BOOK OF GOLF AND GOLFERS (Longmans, 18s. n.), that there is now no end to the making of books on golf. There is a touch of slyness in the reason which he gives for adding another to the list—viz., "to gather the grain" of previous volumes into one book. But the author's best excuse is his picturesque and humorous style. He even shows us how golf may be used as a key to history. He tells us how the practice of it was forbidden in Scotland "ilk Sunday" in the fifteenth century, "in order that the King's lieges might have leisure from it to pursue the practice of archery as a defence against 'our auld enemies of England.'" Next it was forbidden as breaking the Sabbath, until the easy-going Stuarts took up the game, and Charles I. ordered the Justices of Assize "to see that no man doe trouble or molest any of our loyall and duetifull people, in or for their lawful recreations, having first done their duetie towards God." Though tolerated on Sunday out of church time in the days of John Knox, it has until quite lately been a subject of much annoyance to the rigid Sabbatarians of this century.

But we are not only introduced to the past history of the game. Mr. J. H. Whigham, the American champion in 1897-98, and afterwards—such is the versatility of golfers—a war correspondent in Cuba, contributes a chapter on Golf in the United States, telling us how, in spite of some natural disadvantages of his country in providing golf links, the golf fever has spread across the Atlantic. All club makers must read carefully what Mr. J. H. Taylor has to say on the subject, and all young golfers Mr. Hutchinson's advice as to methods of play. Meanwhile, to the general reader one of the chief features of interest arises from a certain amiable disagreement between Miss Amy Pascoe and her chief, Mr. Hutchinson. Mr. Hutchinson says:—

There is every reason at St. Andrews that ladies should play on the long course—that specially designed for them is too short for the needs of the modern feminine golfer. But else—where there are such excellent ladies' links, suited to their moderate length of driving (the italics are ours) that they had better, perhaps, restrict their energies to them than, too greatly daring, invade the longer links of the men, where they cannot hope to carry the bunkers. Modern ladies, however, are nothing, if not ambitious—that, indeed, is the great secret of their success.

But Miss Pascoe has a chapter to herself.

I am afraid [she says] Mr. Horace Hutchinson is responsible for much of the structural weakness and deficiencies of the ladies' courses. That high authority deliberately questions our right to play on long links! and advocates the gift of a few holes, admitting of a drive or two of seventy or eighty yards; from which magnificent piece of generosity (the italics are ours) he eliminates everything likely to call forth a game.

Mr. Hutchinson, however, manages by means of an adroit "argumentum ad feminam" to have the last word. A little note is affixed at the end of Miss Pascoe's article:—

Since Miss Pascoe was kind enough to write the above able chapter, the Ladies' Championship for 1898-9 has been played on the Great Yarmouth links, and won by Miss Lena Thomson.—H. G. H.

This is unkind of Mr. Hutchinson.

For a fuller discussion of ladies' golf, with an exhaustive description of the different ladies' links throughout the kingdom, their championship competitions, and their club arrangements, we must refer the reader to OUR LADY OF THE GREEN: A Book of Ladies' Golf (Lawrence & Bullen, 3s. 6d.), edited by Mrs. Mackern and Miss M. Boys, in which Miss Pascoe again has a chapter to herself. The book is full of information, but enveloped in a cover which would suggest that the authoresses had lost some of their artistic sense in training for the long links.

It is with a feeling of relief that we turn from this eyesore to the portrait gallery in Mr. Hutchinson's book, representing leading golfers in the act of playing. These pictures are not only of immense interest to golfers, who will recognize how well the positions portrayed suit the meditated stroke, but also to students of art. Mr. Hutchinson might have written upon them a treatise to rival Lessing's Laocoon, calling attention to the beauty of face and form preserved in the most trying circumstances. Here we have not only Apollo "at top of swing," "at finish of swing," "addressing for approach," "approaching at end of stroke," "at top of cleek stroke," and "approaching with mashie," &c., but also Diana in no less interesting situations. To set at rest all doubts as to the result of their strokes, we have only to observe the smile of triumph upon the features of all those depicted "at the end of swing." Of those strokes which are yet to be brought off, that of Mr. Hutchinson himself in the picture of him "on top of drive" more than any other prompts the reader to cry "fore."

THE SARUM USE.

The Use of Sarum. I. The Sarum Customs as set forth in the Consuetudinary and Customary. By Walter Howard Frere, M.A. 9x6in., lxxii.+314 pp., with plan. Cambridge, 1898. University Press. 12/- n.

While Englishmen are exercising the national privilege of writing to the papers, a band of scholars is quietly building up a body of liturgical science which is certain to influence the future interpretation of the English rubrics. Unless the Ornaments Rubric means the precise opposite to that which it says, a reasonable knowledge of the old services is necessary for the due performance of the new. Indeed, in the days of our grandfathers when that rubric was at the lowest ebb of oblivion, our churches bore ample evidence of the power of medieval tradition: the plain altars of the Georgian period with their cloths and cushions, their envelope of linen at the time of the ministration, their two candles at the most by way of ornament, with sometimes a picture for the recedos, the long flowing surplices and black scarves of the clergy—these and many other things bore witness to the continuity of English worship with that before the Reformation. With the first wild orgies of the ritualistic revival the chain was largely broken, under the mistaken notion that the ways of modern Rome were the ways of tradition and of the Ornaments Rubric. A fatality seemed to pursue those first "ritualists." Some, under the impression that they were conscientiously reviving the use of Sarum, produced much, as Mr. Frere says, of which that illustrious church was entirely innocent. Others, disgusted at this strange muddle, unblushingly adopted—or, rather, adapted—the style of Rome. They sinned more in ignorance than wantonness, and their false start is closely paralleled by that of the contemporary Gothic revival.

This fatality pursued the study of Sarum even into the scholar's closet. The missal was butchered by translators, and a Latin edition was twenty years in the press. The Consuetudinary, a more important source of information, went to such an extremity of misfortune that even the Master of the Rolls played it false. Dr. Rock, an attractive Roman Catholic writer, had already mixed up the true text with alien phrases, when Canon Rich Jones undertook to re-edit the Consuetudinary for the Rolls series. He seems to have done so without even consulting the MS. which he professed to edit. Therefore it was high time that the various MSS. which form the bed-rock of the Salisbury use should be collated and edited with painstaking accuracy. The difficult work of brushing away the accumulation of mistakes and giving the world an exact presentment of the originals has been admirably done by Mr. Frere. His book is a monument of sound scholarship that is a credit to the University of Cambridge from whose press it is issued. The old missals were almost as scantily furnished with rubrics as the Book of Common Prayer itself, hence the great importance of such works as the Consuetudinary, which was a book of rules for the chapter, dealing both with the constitution of the Cathedral, the duties of its various officers, and also with its liturgical customs, the arrangement of its ceremonial, and the course of its services through the many changes of the ecclesiastical year. There are two recensions of the Consuetudinary, one dating from about 1210, the other, differently arranged and with many additions, written about a generation later. To have these as they were written is much; but Mr. Frere has set with them in parallel columns another book of directions, dating from the middle of the fourteenth century, and hitherto unpublished. This book, the Customarium, or Customary, is valuable, not only for its later date, but because it is an adaptation of the Cathedral directions for the purposes of a parish church.

A special feature of Mr. Frere's work is its excellent index. By a thorough system of grouping he has made it not only a directory to the text but also a complete summary of its ceremonial directions. For instance, under the word Processio, he has four columns of index which give a complete description of the procession with its various modifications throughout the year. Thus a person who has forgotten his Latin can still learn that the procession of tradition is not an aimless walk round the church, but (like that ordered in our own Marriage Service) a definite movement to a particular place where the bidding prayer and other prayers were to be said. In the same way, by turning to the word Colores, the almost universal misconception as to the Salisbury colour-sequence can be dispelled at a glance.

BYZANTINE TEXTS.

The Ecclesiastical History of Evagrius, with the Scholia. Edited, with Introduction, Critical Notes, and Indices, by J. Bidez and L. Parmentier. 9x6in., 285 pp. London, 1899. Methuen. 10/6

The History of Psellus. Edited, with Critical Notes and Indices, by Constantine Sathas. 9x6in., x.+384 pp. London, 1899. Methuen. 15/- n.

We welcome the first two volumes of the new Byzantine texts edited by Professor Bury, of Dublin. Professor Bury's name as a classical and historical scholar stands so high as to be in itself a guarantee for the excellence of the work to which he is prepared to stand sponsor, and it was certainly time that something was done in England for the study of the literature of the Eastern Empire, for which foreign scholars, notably Slavonic and Greek scholars, have recently done so much. It is discreditable to modern scholarship that critical editions of the Byzantine writers have hitherto been conspicuous by their absence. To judge by the present volumes, Professor Bury seems likely to wipe away the reproach.

Evagrius has suffered from being taken by editors together with the earlier Church historians, to whom he is admittedly inferior in interest. The editio princeps was that of Stephanus, 1544. Christopherson, Bishop of Chichester, John Scaliger, and Valesius tried their hands at conjectural emendation from time to time, and some of their work has appeared in different editions during the last two hundred years, down to Migne's vol. lxxxii. b., which was published in 1866. But till now it does not appear that there has ever been a critical examination and collation of the MSS., of which ten are known. Five of these MSS. appear to be derived from the Baroccean described by M. de Boor, eminent as an editor of Byzantine authors. The other five represent at least three strains, and the present editors show good ground for believing the Laurentian MS. lxx. 23 best to represent the earliest text, though another Laurentian MS. was written probably a century earlier.

M. Bidez, chargé de cours at the University of Ghent, and M. Parmentier, Professor at the University of Liège, have long been known, by their writings in the Revue de l'Instruction Publique en Belgique, to be exceptionally qualified for the task they have undertaken. The edition they have produced is worthy of the highest praise. It achieves the maximum of result with the minimum of ostentation. It will remain for many years the standard edition of the work, and, indeed, can only be superseded by the not impossible discovery of further MSS., which may very likely lurk in the Imperial Library at Constantinople.

A special feature of the edition is the Index Græcitas, which, if continued in the following volumes of the series, will go far to supply the want of a good lexicon of patristic and Byzantine Greek, Sophocles being, as all scholars know, far from complete. The index would be improved by a distinction being made between those words which are lacking in Sophocles, and those which are found only in Evagrius, which by the present arrangement appear to be confused. In marginal references also more clearness is to be desired. In the second volume of the series the Index Græcitas occupies no less than a hundred pages, but we are not told how far the lexicographers have ransacked the author. Nor have we any marginal references at all, which is a pity, as it would have been useful to know, without hunting up the books, where exactly Psellus was copied by Anna Comnena or Nikephoros Bryennios. Otherwise the edition is as excellent as the Evagrius. It could hardly, of course, have been entrusted to other hands than those of M. Constantine Sathas, who published the editio princeps in 1874. The twenty-five years that have elapsed since then have not impaired M. Sathas' interest in the work. He has made several emendations in the text, all of which will probably be recognized to be improvements; and, indeed, Professor Bury in a footnote tells us that he "would correct more freely still," giving some instances which show his usual critical acuteness. Professor Bury clearly does not take his duties as general editor lightly, and the series will gain greatly by his oversight. But he really should not allow M. Sathas to express his regret that there is but one MS. of Psellus extant by saying "It is aggravating." We commend to him a study of George Meredith's immortal "General Ople and Lady Camper."

The history of Psellus is a work of extreme interest to the student of the decay of the Eastern Empire. It is remarkable that Anna Comnena should have accepted him without hesitation and even praised his work. Though it is true, as Professor Bury notes, that others take a very different view, and Professor Geizer calls him "der widerliche Schwatzphilosoph und Redekünstler," the judgment of M. Sathas is more probably the just one. One sentence in his preface may well be quoted here.

It is in truth [he says] a curious thing—unique even in the Byzantine Empire—to see a high dignitary, President of the Senate, dominant Minister of four successive Emperors, writing, by order of the Emperor and Senate, and venturing to read before an audience that prided itself on the name of "Roman," historical memories in which he castigated monastic life as an institution of faineants and foes of humanity; repeatedly asserting that the money of the Treasury is not intended to found convents or be squandered at the caprice of the Emperors, but is a sacred deposit to reward the soldiers who shed their blood for the empire; proclaiming in so many words the superiority of the Athenian Republic to that of Rome—an institution of slaves, not of freemen; and hurling in the face of the Senators words like these:—"We are not governed by Pericles or Themistocles, but by the vilest of the Spartacus tribe whom we have bought for gold from the barbarians."

The first two issues of the series justify us in expecting a high standard in future volumes; and we may justly congratulate Messrs. Methuen on an enterprise which will be of real service to learning.

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

THE MARTYRDOM OF AN EMPRESS (Harper, 7s. 6d.) is an anonymous biography of the late Empress of Austria, which is ostensibly the work of a lady who enjoyed the Empress's friendship. If it had been compiled by a complete outsider from articles published in French and American newspapers, the result would have been very much the same. A considerable portion of the book is devoted to an attack on the widowed Princess Stephanie, which strikes us as in questionable taste.

COMPANIES IN FRANCE, by Thomas Barclay (Sweet and Maxwell, 7s. 6d.), is intended to "afford the information required by all who are directly or indirectly connected with companies and securities in France." It states the law briefly, and expounds it lucidly, duly drawing attention to the points in which French law differs from English. Various important laws, decrees, and judgments—including the important judgment of the Court of Cassation "La Construction, Limited," and the Anglo-French Companies' Convention of 1862—are printed separately in appendices.

EMERALDS CHASED IN GOLD, by John Dickson, F.S.A. (Oliphant, Anderson, and Ferrier, 4s.), is a pleasant, if in places too effusive, little book on the small islands in the Firth of Forth which have been used as religious houses, refuges, or prisons, and one of which, Inchgarvie, is now one of the foundations for that great engineering triumph, the Forth Bridge. From the historical point of view Mr. Dickson does not say one word too much, but occasionally his scientific information errs on the side of minuteness. It is, however, better to sin through over-conscientiousness than to be impressionist, or even impressive, at the cost of accuracy. Mr. Dickson has produced a very superior guide-book.

THE BURNS MEMORIAL CATALOGUE is, in the form of a handsome and profusely yet exquisitely illustrated volume (William Hodge and Co. and T. R. Annan, £1 5s.), a memento of the remarkable exhibition of Burnsiana collected from all parts of the Anglo-Saxon world, which was held in Glasgow during the summer of 1896, by way of celebrating the centenary of the poet's death. The great feature of that exhibition was the manuscripts. Burns' caligraphy was perhaps unprecedented alike for boldness and for care. No doubt he took special pains with it, because, being a poor man, and unable to print off his poems as they came hot from his brain, he was in the habit of writing several copies of them for circulation among his friends. But Burns evidently took a delight in putting his personality, or what he imagined to be such, into his penmanship. This catalogue would have been of supreme interest even if it had contained nothing more than the illustrations of Burns' caligraphy. But it is equally valuable for its portraits of Burns, his kinsfolk and friends, for its representations of the localities to which he has given celebrity, and for its wealth of accurate information as to the editions of his works. The editors of the different sections of this excellent book have done their work at once modestly and thoroughly.

"Never speak of a man in his presence," Johnson once found it necessary to warn Boswell: "it is always indelicate, and may be offensive." This admonition might be profitably commended to the notice of such as undertake to write the biography of a person still living. Its need is emphasized by the perusal of such a book as EUGÉNIE, EMPRESS OF THE FRENCH (Swan Sonnenschein, 6s.), by Clara Tschudi, which has just been turned from Norwegian into English, with fair, though not remarkable, success, by E. M. Cope. Although the future historian may find in the story of her youth and training excuses for the Empress, yet it is quite possible that all the harm and more that Miss Tschudi implies of her "heroine" may be true. But that is not the point; the greater the truth the greater the libel. We can only express disapproval of the taste which has thought fit to rake into the light all the follies and errors of one who is still living and in old age and heavy sorrow, ultima storum. Miss Tschudi has no pretensions to be more than a book-maker, and one is sorry that her compilation has been thought worthy of translation into English.

We can heartily congratulate Mr. W. P. Dodge on producing a really excellent monograph in PIERS GAVESTON (Unwin, 12s.), both well-written and singularly complete. So painstaking has he been in consulting original authorities, both printed and MS., that his study of seven somewhat obscure years of English history is not likely soon to be superseded. In spite of a modest disclaimer in the preface of any special qualifications for the task, he shows a care for accuracy and a patience of investigation which would do credit to the most experienced historian. If he errs, it is only in the very natural direction of exaggerating the attractiveness of his subject. He is far from excusing the faults of Gaveston; indeed, he exposes them with almost ruthless candour; but we think that not many of his readers will agree with his description of the favourite of Edward II. as "a fascinating personality." In another sense, indeed, he might be so called on account of his extraordinary influence over the King; but his aims were too sordid and selfish to arouse in these days more than a passing curiosity. Brave he undoubtedly was; clever, in the sense of "smart," he seems to have been; but we find no evidence in Mr. Dodge's book for the epithet of "generous," which he applies to him in a rather too antithetical estimate of his character. Nothing could be more ungenerous than his conduct in thrice taking advantage of the King's foolish fondness for him to return from abroad and stir up fresh trouble with the barons. And, although we need not believe the scandalous tales of later chroniclers, there must have been some very strong reason for the banishment by Edward I. of one to whom he had but just before made large grants of land; and still more for his leaving the curse of a dying man to his son if he should recall him without the people's consent. What that reason was Mr. Dodge, with all his research, is unable really to explain; and it will probably never be known. But these considerations surely detract from the sympathy which the cruel and faithless conduct of the nobles towards Gaveston might otherwise excite. In an appendix Mr. Dodge gives some useful extracts from his chief authorities; and he proves, we think, beyond a doubt by heraldic evidence that the crusader's tomb in the retro-choir of Winchester Cathedral is that of Sir Arnold de Gaveston.

Dr. Jan Ten Brink's ROBESPIERRE AND THE RED TERROR (Hutchinson, 12s.) is a graphic and picturesque, but an ill-arranged book. The author begins with the guillotining of the Dantonists, and proceeds a certain distance with the history of the conspiracy of Thermidor. Then a happy thought strikes him: "As Robespierre has only to live now another five days, we will pause here to throw a glance at his past." The glance is duly thrown. It suggests other retrospective glances—at the Girondins, at the Hébertists, at the September massacres, at the state of trade, the state of the cafés, the state of the theatres; the interlude filling, altogether, about fifty chapters. Then the thread of the narrative is once more taken up, and the story carried on to the execution of Robespierre. The note of the book is the historian's persistent endeavour to whitewash the revolutionist whom Carlyle held up to odium. The "respectability" of Robespierre fascinates him. He continually harps upon it, contrasting his manners with those of Danton, who frequented doubtful company, and left a good cellar of wine behind him when he died. The priggish bombast of Robespierre's speeches—his appeal to his compatriots, for example, to "crush the tyrannical league of kings by the greatness of our character," and his magnificent exclamation, on the occasion of the Feast of the Supreme Being, "Let us surrender ourselves, under the protection of God, to transports of the purest delight; to-morrow we shall again combat vice and tyranny"—does not elicit any response from Dr. Ten Brink's sense of humour. He merely records them as so many further proofs that Robespierre, when all was said and done, was "an honourable character, a spirit fired with the noblest ideals." He admits Robespierre's responsibility for the law whereby a prisoner before the Revolutionary Tribunal "could not be assisted by counsel, but would find his support in the patriotic members of the jury," but then recalls the fact that at the same time Robespierre warned his brother against the gaming table. It is a rather interesting and ingenious piece of special pleading, though one would have more confidence in the author's accuracy if he had not given us Barère's old story of the sinking of the Vengeur, without a hint that it was untrue. Even "the ill-informed Carlyle," as Dr. Ten Brink calls him, knew better than that. The translation is well done by Mr. J. Hedeman.

The romance of Australasia is inexhaustible. Two years ago Miss Clark's book on the Maori legends awoke the European reader to the delights of a new mythology, to the magic of the poetry hidden in the breast of the black fellow. In BY CREEK AND GULLY (Unwin, 6s.) Miss Lala Fisher, whose volume of verse, "A Twilight Teaching and Other Poems," we reviewed last summer, has gathered together a number of stories of bush life by well-known Australian writers, including Mr. Douglas Sladen, Mr. Hume Nisbet, Mr. Patchett Martin, Mr. Louis Becke, and Mr. E. W. Hornung. From these stories and sketches the reader will learn that the romance of these countries survives the period of the legend proper. The modern romancer can still find primitive man. In the forests of New Guinea, as Mr. Hume Nisbet reminds us, the Hercules and the Apollo of the far South are still roaming in their native woods. Here, too, the reader has not to search back through centuries of an artificial life to find a community in which each man is an artist, delighting in his own handicraft. Mr. Nisbet describes the art of the cannibal, as revealed to him one sunny afternoon beneath the shade of the banana tree in the depths of the tropical forest:—

One youth spreads out a piece of native worked matting for my inspection, and, as we bargain for it with koko (tobacco), I cannot help admiring the variety and precision of the designs upon it, as well as upon the lime calabashes and bau-baus—delicate designs and correct lines, over which great skill and true art taste is shown, as well as on the rich carvings of their canoe prows, paddles, wooden maces, swords, arrows, and axe handles; and I marvel where this nation of naked and savage cannibals can have acquired their art education.

"One bundle of arrows which I purchased from them," Mr. Nisbet continues, "were wonderful in variety, no two alike in design." Their designs are taken from animals and flowers.

This, with the happy knack which they have of seizing chance effects, such as a twist or knuckle in the wood, and turning it adroitly into some object to which they may fancy it bears a slight resemblance, gives the infinite variety, and reveals them to be possessed in a very high degree of the gift of imagination and poetry, as well as artistic power of adaptation and imitation.

Mr. Nisbet goes on to dilate upon the hidden meanings of the designs carved upon these arrows, and further upon the art labour which they bestow upon the latokoes, or trading vessels.

His chapter is the most attractive and novel in the book, because he confines it to a study of the native preserving his own destiny independently of new and civilizing influences. Mr. Louis Becke, Miss Lala Fisher, and Mr. Douglas Sladen deal, on the other hand, with the familiar struggle between the white man and the black. The European is their hero, and in Mr. Sladen's thrilling account of an escape from an "inside station" the plucky little English Miss is actually introduced. Her behaviour to her heroic rescuer reminds us not a little of the heroine in "The Gentleman of France." It is Western romance in a tale of the far South. But these stories are none the less entertaining, especially Miss Fisher's amusing account of how an overseer of a sugar industry saved his colony from dying in scores by the gentle persuasion of the whip.

LABOUR.

THE MARTYRDOM OF LABOUR, by Alfred T. Story (Redway 5s.), is a book written in a temper of red-hot indignation. It covers much the same ground as Mr. Sherard's "White Slaves of England"—a work from which the author quotes extensively—but it contains more political economy and less picturesque description than that notable little volume. The facts recited concerning the condition of the labouring classes in certain underpaid and unhealthy industries certainly furnish food for thought; and Mr. Story is hardly to be blamed for not being ready with any remedy that promised to be instantly efficacious. He seems, at any rate, to be on the right track in refusing to find the panacea in "mere changes of governmental machinery," and in insisting that "a new character, a renovated soul," on the part of the downtrodden workers themselves is what is wanted. His exhortations on this head are too often so worded as to read like mere rhetoric; but they really wrap up a good deal of sound common sense. The pressure, to be effective, must come from the workers themselves; this is the conclusion to be drawn from Mr. Story's paper. It was a conclusion well worth drawing, and would have been worth more precise and analytical treatment than Mr. Story, in the exuberance of his tempestuous eloquence, has given it.

This seems to be the object of Mr. Morrison Davidson in THE ANNALS OF TOIL (Reeves, 6s.), which is written with the object of "planting in the minds of the toilers contempt, righteous hatred, and horror of 'the classes' by whom they have so long been sweated, robbed and maltreated." Most of the book is occupied with pure denunciation. Mr. Davidson throws no new light on the real history of toil. The book is scrappy, full of irrelevant matter, and so carelessly written that in at least two instances whole paragraphs are repeated word for word. The historians of England, Mr. Davidson thinks, are "mercenary and prejudiced scribes of the classes," and Shakespeare himself is "the worst of all the venal scribes." The labour members of Parliament are not fitted "to lead labour anywhere except into the ditch." The poor London County Council—so Progressive, too—is only good for a "cold, mechanical democracy," and the State itself, according to this terrible person, is but "the product of force and fraud, an invention of evil men for evil purposes."

TWO VIEWS OF ST. PAUL.

In Dr. Orelli Cone's PAUL, THE MAN, THE MISSIONARY, AND THE TEACHER (A. and C. Black, 10s. 6d.) and Dr. Lyman Abbott's THE LIFE AND LETTERS OF PAUL THE APOSTLE (J. Clarke, 6s.), we have two estimates of St. Paul by American writers of eminence. Nothing could be more unlike than their treatment of the subject. Dr. Cone is a pupil of the Germans, and his method is like theirs: well equipped with learning, somewhat heavy in method, he writes as a critic to whom the tendency of modern thought renders only "an emasculated Paulinism" possible. To him there is "heartless unconcern" in Paul's eschatology, an odium theologicum without sympathy or fairness in his treatment of the Judaizers, an untenable supernaturalism in his central doctrine of union with Christ; he finds the Apostle too sacramental on the one hand and too rabbinical on the other. He lays an unkind emphasis on St. Paul's confession that the

treasure of his Apostleship was in an "earthen vessel," and that he saw "through a glass darkly." He claims that by this method "the Apostle is fairly treated, and his greatness made apparent." But, though it is true that such stern freedom of criticism is necessary for the elucidation of the truth finding its right place in the long run, and serving meanwhile as a whetstone to the student, yet it suggests the reflection that no one sees so darkly through a glass as the critical superior person. Dr. Lyman Abbott, in his lucid popular way, certainly manages to bring the real Paul more successfully before us. His intention is to apply what he calls the principle of evolution to the Apostle's teaching, which simply means that he does not suppose St. Paul to have started his ministry with a completed system of theology, but traces that growth of his ideas which is obscured by the traditional arrangement of the Epistles. He describes exceedingly well Saul's honest persecution of the Christians, and the horror with which the career of Jesus must have filled an orthodox Jew. Very characteristically he calls the Apostle "not a John Calvin, rather a Browning"; and, instead of seeing him bristling with limitations, as does Dr. Cone, he attributes to opposite reasons the enormous influence on the world of those few hastily written letters, which comprise at the most only sixty pages of a moderate-sized octavo. Pagans, Jews, Catholics, Protestants, even ethical Christians, says Dr. Abbott, have all failed to grasp the breadth of Paul's teaching; it was too big for them, and those who professed to follow it tried to cut it down to suit their own measure. It is interesting to notice who are the modern writers whose "large and spiritual teaching" Dr. Abbott considers to be true to St. Paul; they are Phillips Brooks, Beecher, Maurice, and Robertson; and the exegetical writers whom he has found most useful are Meyer, Alford, Ellicott, Stanley, and Jowett; to these he adds some more recent names, among them Dr. Ramsay, Professor A. Sabatier, and the American theologian Professor McGiffert.

CHEMISTRY.

Among the many significant signs of progress exhibited by the United States not the least significant is the marked improvement in American technical and scientific literature which has taken place within the last few years. Comparatively recently an American technical treatise was synonymous with all that was windy and worthless. To-day, as is evidenced by Dr. F. H. Thorp's OUTLINES OF INDUSTRIAL CHEMISTRY (New York: The Macmillan Co., 15s. n.), and by numerous other instances, all this is changing; the first fruit, perhaps, of the many magnificently equipped centres of technical education with which America is provided. The author of "Outlines of Industrial Chemistry" has, however, succeeded in treating his somewhat unwieldy subject clearly and methodically, and with a due sense of the relative importance of things. In no instance is a process more than outlined, and nowhere is the text sprinkled with hard sayings beyond the comprehension of a student. We have the philosophy of industrial chemistry given us in an exceptionally readable manner. The scientific rationale of a process is not buried beneath a mass of practical recipes, or cumbersome chemical equations. The same lucidity and restraint are visible in the diagrams. In glancing through these "Outlines of Industrial Chemistry" it is impossible not to admire the ingenuity and versatility of the human mind in working up the raw materials of Nature. It is all so clever and so simple that one forgets that less than a century ago industrial chemistry was practically non-existent, and that at the bottom of it all there is endless toil, much danger, and many diseases. We can recommend Dr. Thorp's work, not only to the students for whom it is primarily intended, but as a work of reference, and also to any readers with a modicum of chemical knowledge who may wish to keep in touch with chemical industrial development. The author has provided an excellent index and copious bibliographical references at the end of each section.

Dr. J. H. Varr't Hoff, the author of LECTURES ON THEORETICAL AND PHYSICAL CHEMISTRY, translated by Dr. R. A. Lehfeldt, Part I., Chemical Dynamics (Arnold, 12s. n.), expresses the hope that his "little book may perhaps be a welcome guide to those who wish to possess themselves of the latest acquisitions of physical chemistry." Seeing that the author is the leading living exponent of this new branch of chemistry, it will not be surprising if his modest aspiration should be fulfilled. Physical chemistry, however, bears little resemblance to the chemistry that Faraday loved; its book-lore is lavishly besprinkled with mathematics and graphics, and needs in the reader mathematical and chemical knowledge such as only professionals usually possess.

THE DEATH OF MAY.

The feet of June are on the golden stair,
The lilac casts its perfume on the air;
And touched by dawn and kissed by moonlight grey Dies in the world this last sweet night of May.

Across the hills that cut the western sky
The white moon leans to see the white May die;
Leans from her far off home in heaven to bless
The meeting lips of Death and Loveliness.

O, perfumed May! thy doom no mourner weeps—
The red rose dreams of June—the white rose sleeps;
The nightingales are dumb, and in the dark
The brown thrush waits the prelude of the lark.

* * * *

Over the hills a lark! And one more June
Steals through the eastern door to hear his tune;
Whilst through the sorrowful and western door
Into the outer dark goes one May more.

Whither? We know but this, there all sweet tunes
Have gone, and all the grace of vanished Junes.
And there, to-morrow, this white rose shall know
The rose that bloomed a thousand years ago.

H. DE VERE STACPOOLE.

Among my Books.

THOMAS BROWNE EN FRANCE.

Un comité s'est formé à Norwich pour élever un monument à Sir Thomas Browne. De Norwich, patrie de l'exquis auteur de "Religio Medici," l'appel s'est étendu, très légitimement et naturellement, à l'Angleterre tout entière. Aurais-je la prétention singulièrement audacieuse, d'étendre cet appel à l'Europe, et particulièrement à la France? Je dois confesser très ingénument que je n'ai pas cette prétention, car je ne me dissimule pas que le titre seul de ces lignes sonnera aux oreilles de plus d'un lecteur anglais comme un pur paradoxe. Thomas Browne, pour original qu'il soit, n'appartient pas à cette Weltliteratur dont parlait Goethe et dont il souhaitait l'avènement. Il est essentiellement de son siècle, et il est avant tout de son pays; et assurément son mérite n'en est pas diminué en son fond, mais certainement sa gloire en a un peu souffert au delà de la Manche.

Après cet aveu dénué d'artifice, m'accordera-t-on le droit de rappeler que la critique européenne n'a pas toujours été aussi indifférente à Thomas Browne, notamment en son temps? et ensuite (c'est là un modeste, mais sincère témoignage rendu à sa gloire) qu'il garde encore aujourd'hui, même hors de sa patrie, des admirateurs et des amis?

Thomas Browne avait voyagé en France, et nous ne saurions trop regretter qu'il ne nous ait pas conté son voyage. Il avait, notamment, séjourné à Montpellier, comme plus tard John Locke. Il connaissait de près quelques livres français, spécialement Montaigne et Rabelais, qui tous deux ont avec lui une évidente parenté d'esprit. Enfin son œuvre, malgré des différences qui sautent aux yeux, a plus d'une analogie avec celle de quelques écrivains français, ses contemporains. Il nous est donc particulièrement doux de constater que son nom ne fut pas inconnu dans le Paris du XVII^e siècle. Sa "Religio Medici," traduite en latin "par quelque Hollandais," pensait-on, (en fait, si cette version a paru à La Haye, on sait qu'elle est de John Merryweather), y arriva en 1664.

Elle trouva aussitôt un admirateur en Guy Patin. Guy Patin, médecin comme Browne, était, en son genre, aussi original, quoique bien moins profond, que lui: les contemporains le peignent "satirique depuis la tête jusqu'aux pieds." Ses colères, ses fantaisies, ses préjugés faisaient une physionomie très personnelle à ce partisan acharné de la médecine ancienne, à cet ennemi déclaré des découvertes modernes, qui avait, nous dit Vigneul-Marville, "dans le visage l'air de Cicéron et dans l'esprit le caractère de Rabelais." Guy Patin était fait pour comprendre toute une partie de l'œuvre de Thomas Browne. Comme plusieurs de ses contemporains français, comme Gabriel Naudé ou comme Pierre Bayle, il avait conservé, du XVI^e siècle, un immense appétit de savoir mêlé à une extrême liberté d'appréciation personnelle. Ces hommes sont, comme Browne, des survivants de la Renaissance égarés dans une époque plus grave et plus ordonnée. Dès le 21 octobre 1641, Guy Patin annonce à un de ses correspondants "un petit livre nouveau, intitulé 'Religio Medici,' et il ajoute: "C'est un livre tout gentil et curieux, mais fort délicat et tout mystique; l'auteur ne manque pas d'esprit; vous y verrez d'étranges et ravissantes pensées." Le 16 avril, 1645, il écrit encore de Paris: "On fait ici grand état du livre intitulé 'Religio Medici' (témoignage significatif du bruit que l'œuvre faisait autour de lui). Cet auteur a de l'esprit. Il y a de gentilles choses dans ce livre. C'est un mélancolique agréable en ses pensées, mais qui, à mon jugement, cherche maître en fait de religion, comme beaucoup d'autres, et peut-être qu'enfin il n'en trouvera aucun." Et, ayant appris que Browne vivait encore, il lui appliquait ces paroles du vieux Philippe de Commines sur Saint François de Paule: "Il est encore en vie, il peut aussi bien empirer qu'amender."

Thomas Browne passa donc, auprès des contemporains de Corneille et de Pascal, pour un homme d'esprit, savant, mélancolique et sceptique. Et ce n'est pas tout Browne, mais c'est bien quelque chose de Browne. On lisait encore beaucoup Montaigne vers 1640, et les Français de ce temps, curieux de toute science et même de toute fausse science, avaient encore l'esprit assez jeune pour admettre, avec l'auteur de "Religio Medici," que "nous portons en nous toutes les merveilles de l'Afrique," et pour s'amuser de ces merveilles. Combien leur admiration pour Browne se fût accrue, s'ils avaient pu apprécier dans l'original son admirable style, d'une ampleur si latine et d'une éloquence si large, si voisine en sa forme de notre langue du XVII^e siècle, majestueuse et harmonieuse, sonore et chargée de pensée!

Quelques années plus tard, en 1668, Browne trouva

(1) Voir les Lettres de Guy Patin (éd. Réveillé—Paris, t. I., p. 340).

un traducteur français. C'était un protestant, Nicolas Lefèvre, ancien élève de l'Université de Sedan, et connu par ses travaux sur la chimie. Lefèvre avait jadis été choisi par Vallot, premier médecin de Louis XIV., comme démonstrateur de chimie au Jardin du Roi, à Paris, et, en 1664, sa réputation lui avait valu d'être appelé à Londres par Charles II., qui lui avait confié la direction d'un laboratoire dans le palais de St. James. Lefèvre fut membre de la Société royale de Londres et a laissé un nom estimé dans l'histoire de la chimie. Si je rappelle ces circonstances, c'est que la plupart des bibliographes ont commis des erreurs sur le traducteur français de Browne. La plus grave consiste à l'accuser d'avoir traduit sur le latin de Merryweather ; mais c'est qu'ils n'ont pas ouvert son livre, dans la préface duquel Lefèvre se vante précisément d'avoir eu sous les yeux l'original anglais, "parce que c'est sa langue naturelle et par conséquent la plus naïve et la plus fidèle." Lefèvre savait donc l'anglais, mérite rare en France vers 1668, mais la vérité m'oblige à dire qu'il écrivait fort mal le français, et rien, dans sa dure et incorrecte traduction, ne pouvait donner aux lecteurs de Racine l'idée que la "Religio Medici" fût une œuvre d'art.

En fait, Browne devient, entre les mains de Lefèvre, un pur théologien. Le titre seul de cette traduction indique le but poursuivi par le traducteur : "La Religion du Médecin, description nécessaire (?) par Thomas Browne, médecin renommé à Norwich, touchant son opinion accordante avec le pur service d'Angleterre (imprimée en l'an 1668 [à La Haye])." Une gravure, en tête du livre, représente un pécheur qui tombe du ciel dans la mer mugissante et que retient une main divine, avec cette devise : A caelo salus. C'est un livre d'édification, dans lequel Lefèvre déclare avoir beaucoup profité pour "la pratique des vertus." Pourquoi faut-il qu'il en ait oublié une, qui est la charité ? Dans sa préface, il s'emporte par avance contre ceux qui trouveront à redire aux opinions de son auteur. Il les traite de "chiens enragés" et les compare à "Balac (sic), lequel voyait à regret les troupes du peuple de Dieu, et les regardait avec des yeux d'indignation et de colère." Pauvre Thomas Browne ! N'était-ce pas assez que votre prose d'un rythme si riche et si pur se transformât en je ne sais quel jargon chimico-théologique ? Fallait-il encore que l'étroite intelligence d'un sectaire travestît à ce point votre âme charmante et aimante, à vous qui aviez plaidé avec une si communicative chaleur la cause sacrée de la tolérance ? à vous qui, né protestant, vous glorifiez quelque part de n'avoir jamais entendu l'Ave Maria "sans une élévation de votre âme ?" à vous qui dénoncez ceux qui ne peuvent être "les auteurs d'une opinion sans être aussi les auteurs d'une secte ?" à vous dont la spirituelle bonté a laissé échapper un jour ce mot délicieux : "Quand vous auriez l'oreille assez fine pour entendre le bruit que la lune fait en tournant, ne la prêtez pas aux médisants ?"

Il y a des traducteurs qui tuent leur auteur. J'ai bien peur que Nicolas Lefèvre n'ait mortellement blessé Thomas Browne dans l'opinion des lecteurs français. Du moins l'œuvre délicate du médecin de Norwich s'enfonce-t-elle avec lui dans les régions obscures de la théologie.

Quelques années après, elle se perd chez nous dans les régions austères de la science. C'est parmi les médecins et les physiciens que la critique française du commencement du XVIII^e siècle s'obstine à classer Thomas Browne : ainsi fait le P. Nicéron, dans ses "Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire des hommes illustres" ¹ (1733) : Browne n'est pas, à ses yeux, un écrivain. Et il n'est pas non plus un écrivain aux yeux d'un traducteur qui publia en 1733 son "Essai sur les erreurs populaires ou examen de plusieurs opinions reçues comme vraies, qui sont fausses ou douteuses, traduit de l'anglais de Thomas Browne, chevalier et docteur en médecine." ² L'auteur de cette traduction, qui fut réimprimée en 1738, passe pour être l'abbé Souchay, professeur au Collège Royal et membre de l'Académie des Inscriptions et Belles lettres. Par un paradoxe piquant, la "Pseudodoxia epidemica," sous cette nouvelle forme, se trouve dédiée au duc de Richelieu, le plus grand libertin du XVIII^e siècle, le sceptique et frivole ami de Voltaire, comme à un esprit libre et "supérieur aux préjugés." Ainsi vont les choses. Tout à l'heure Browne était confisqué par un sectaire. Le voilà transformé presque en philosophe et en "ami des lumières," à la mode du XVIII^e siècle. Oh ! comme il avait raison d'écrire : "Si Cardan dit que le perroquet est un bel oiseau, voici Scaliger qui fourbit son esprit pour prouver que c'est un animal difforme !" Dieu nous garde, après notre mort, des traducteurs, des commentateurs et des préfaciers !

Dieu nous garde aussi des maladroits amis ! Je ne voudrais pas affirmer que la France de l'époque classique a rendu justice à l'auteur de "Religio Medici." Il me suffit d'avoir montré qu'elle ne l'a pas entièrement ignoré. Elle a ignoré l'écrivain ; elle n'a fait que soupçonner le moraliste ; elle a grandement considéré le médecin et le savant. Nous avons changé notre point de vue. La renommée de Browne dans la science a pâli. Sa gloire comme écrivain et styliste a grandi d'autant. Mais ici, il convient, je pense, aux étrangers de se taire.

En revanche, ils peuvent légitimement admirer l'humour de Thomas Browne, sa quaintness inexprimable et subtile, sa souplesse et aisance d'esprit, presque unique dans cet austère et rigide XVII^e siècle. Ils peuvent, avec profit et plaisir, évoquer l'aimable figure de ce médecin "honnête homme," comme eût dit notre Pascal, qui "ne se piquait de rien" et qui a su être savant sans être pédant. Et, enfin, pénétrant au fond de cette âme sincère et profonde, ils peuvent, comme ses compatriotes, goûter sa religiosité vraie et cette mélancolie si poétique à la fois et si chrétienne, dont Thomas Browne eût pu dire, comme Jaques dans As You Like It : "It is a melancholy of mine own, compounded of many simples, extracted from many objects, and indeed the sundry contemplation of my travels, in which my often rumination wraps me in a most harmonious sadness."

JOSEPH TEXTE.

(1) T. xxiii., p. 353-360. Bayle a également mentionné Browne.

(2) Paris, 1733, 2 vol., in 12.

THE NEW LAND.

Before it came under the rule of the English, the Land of the Five Rivers, in the savagery of incessant war, was jungle or drab waste, save for a few meagre, ill-tilled fields around fortified cities and villages. To-day it is a green land; and a healthy people, rich in corn and cattle, dwell in its thousand new, unvalled villages on the banks of many canals. It is a new land; and in it the first nation in India is renewing its youth. For it has been peopled by settling on the land pensioned sepoys of twenty years' service; and they have brought into civil life the habit of order and discipline they learned as soldiers. As in other new lands, few questions about their past are asked of strangers who settle in it, if they be well-conducted; therefore, it is the very haven of the good man in adversity.

In the great city of Singhabad, the boy Narain Das, son of Puran Chanbe, priest of Shri Krishn, helped his father in his duties at the shrine until such a time as he should himself be invested with the sacred thread of the Brahmin. And Rukmini, the little daughter of Chedi Lal the confectioner, came daily with her devout mother to the shrine, dressed in her red sari with its yellow border. The two children, careless of the grotesque worship of the god, would slip away to play in quiet corners of the Temple, and shared often an equal chastisement for their truancy. Later, the austere training of the Brahmin separated them; and they grew up apart: Narain Das into a grave, devout young priest, Rukmini into the prettiest of the maidens who accompanied, grave and demure, their mothers to the Temple to make offering and sing hymns to the woman's god.

Later, again, when Narain Das returned, a priest, to the shrine, they came back into one another's lives; not quickly, indeed, for many weeks passed before he began to look eagerly for the daily coming of the prettiest of the worshippers; before his eyes set vague feelings astir in her. In truth, Kama Deva had drawn his bow, and pierced either of them, unaware, with his flower-tipped shafts. Only the little green and gold, rose-necked parrots, flashing in and out of the stucco of the Temple walls, knew what had befallen them, and screamed their jerky laughter at their master's trick; for there is no creature so wise in these matters as the parrot, the servant of Love.

Then, on a day, Narain Das grew as wise as the parrots. He was conducting, for the first time, the worship of the god in the place of his father, who lay ill of an ague; and his eyes, wandering round, as was their wont, to meet the eyes of Rukmini, failed to meet them. The keen pang of disappointment which smote him showed him the truth. Standing as he did in his father's place, in the full exercise of his religious functions, the bells jangling round him, the reek of incense and sickening ghee in his nostrils, he shrank from the truth, and tried to thrust it from him. He succeeded but ill; a darkness fell on his soul; and the parrots, flying out of the shrine on golden wings, screamed to one another that the shafts of Kama Deva, for all their flower tips, were painful in the hearts of men.

When his religious duties had been discharged, and he was left alone with his thought of Rukmini, he reminded himself again and again that the gods had set an infrangible barrier between him and a Sudra woman; but the thought of her clung to his heart.

She did not come to the shrine for some days; and all that while, and it was a long while, Narain Das, by frequent meditation upon Shri Krishn, and hours of repetition of the name of Hari, tried to pluck out the shaft of Kama Deva. Sometimes he seemed to himself to be on the way to succeed; but, for the most part, the feeling that he was a grown man, a Brahmin and a prince among men, that Rukmini was a grown woman, ripe for and worthy of the love of such a man as he, was very strong on him. Moreover, his meditations on the god reminded him that Krishn's love in the forests of Brindabun had been Rukmini, a daughter of the Sudra cowherds. The old syllogism came again and again to his mind:—

The Brahmin controls the charms and spells,
The charms and spells control the gods,
Therefore, the Brahmin controls the gods.

Surely, what was lawful for the incarnation of Vishnu was lawful for the Lord of Vishnu. He turned again to his repetition; but even as his lips murmured, "Hari-Hari-Hari-ji-Hari-ji," his eyes rested on the siras-tree before the gate of the Temple-court; the faint, sweet scent of its tufted blossoms came to his nostrils very disturbing; and among its leaves a dainty little parrot was calling coyly to her lover. There was a gleam of golden wings, and he was at her side, caressing her with his beak, feeding her with seeds, and the pair nestled together their glossy heads. Very tenderly they played till the golden eye of one of them fell upon the still form of the priest; then they stooped, and were gone in a gleam of gold, screaming gleefully, "Learn of Kama Deva, lord of gods and Brahmins!" And a flight of their kin, sweeping past like a chain of gold and emeralds, flung across the purple sky, took up and reiterated their cry. Nature had said her say; and Narain Das came back to his gloomy chamber, his heart fuller than ever of Rukmini, to mutter, fruitlessly indeed, the sacred name.

On the morrow, at last, the sight of Rukmini thrilled him. She came alone and late; laid three wreaths of champak blossoms and a little rice at the feet of the god; and prayed for a blessing on her home and the husband chosen for her. Narain Das had heard her; and, under an impulse of passion there was no withstanding, took up one of her wreaths, and slipped it over her head, saying gently, "Thou art blessed, O Rukmini, faithful daughter of Krishn."

She looked up at him, her wide, joyful eyes shining into his; saw in a breath that the gods had indeed blessed her—with the love of a man; and trembled. Then she rose unsteadily, shivering at the thought that they were but mocking her, that they had set an infrangible barrier between her and him.

Narain Das put his arms about her very clumsily, arms which had never before held a woman; "Little love!" he said hoarsely; and his voice shook. "We played together as children; let us love now!" And he kissed her cheek very clumsily.

"The gods forbid it, my lord!" she said faintly, struggling. "Also—also my husband comes. The wedding is in a month."

Narain loosed her, and cried fiercely, "Who is he?"

"Ganga Sahai, the son of Amin Chand of Golabpore," she said faintly, and fled.

As she passed out of the gate, she tore a few blossoms from the wreath, and let them fall. Narain had them on the instant, and stood, gazing down the street after her, dazed by the tumult in his heart, only conscious that the touch of her cheek was very warm on his lips. He came slowly back to his chamber; and while the champak blossoms filled it with their heavy fragrance, the might of Kama Deva warred fiercely in his heart against the fear of the gods.

When, after the swift dawn, the parrots darted into the Temple, and saw the image of Shri Krishn uncovered, they screamed their glee to be assured that Narain Das was at last the slave of Kama Deva.

Poor Rukmini was in no better case than her lover. She had clung to her faith and its rites with little understanding; but by the natural welding of time they had grown part of her. She had prayed to the gods for devotion to her appointed husband; and in answer to her prayer they had filled her with a passion that dashed and bruised her against the sacred barrier of their own raising. For two days she stayed away from the shrine; on the third day she came early with her mother. The fire in the pleading eyes of Narain burned up her scruples, and brought her on the fourth day alone and late. It was a brief meeting: many eyes would rejoice to spy out the transgression of a Brahmin; but the sweeter for its briefness. Narain's passion found something of an expression. They met again and again; and after every meeting it was harder to say good-bye. They were drifting surely to shame and ruin.

In the midst of their meetings Rukmini's brother came to visit his family from Jonesbad, a new village down on the great Chenab canal. Listening to his tale of the life and ways of the dwellers in it, a wild hope came to her; might they not, if her lover could deign to stoop to a Sudra, find a life together in this new land ?

Then came the goddess from the machine. That creature, abhorred of the men of India for the abomination which comes wherever her evil feet fall, an old woman, for once worked good. Her foster-mother drew from Rukmini her trouble and her hope. She fired at the chance of mischief, and was further spurred to action by Amin Chand's niggardliness in the matter of the negotiations for the marriage. Rukmini's plan seemed to her not only feasible, but excellent : and she enquired among her friends. Then she sought out Narain Das, and told him of a village on a branch of the Garh Sagar canal, whose people had built a little temple and were seeking a priest, that he was the man they needed. The picture of a happy life with Rukmini in that quiet, far village, and a picture of a loveless, dreary life in the temple of Shri Krishn and Singhabad were very clear in Narain's mind : but the thought of Rukmini the wife of Ganga Sahai decided him. He paid the old woman generously.

A few nights later, after the last worshipper had gone, he made up his little bundle, took his few rupees, passed out of the temple, and came down the street without a glance behind. He stole through the field paths to the banks of the Ravi canal, and came to a great barge moored by its bank, shown dimly in the darkness by the glimmer of a little earthen lamp. Two slight women's forms came to his side, without a word, at the foot of the plank which served as gangway : one of them followed him up it on board, and sat down beside him on the high poop. Presently three or four boatmen got out their sweeps, and the lumbering craft went wallowing down the stream.

One dawn, far down the Garh Sagar canal, Narain Das and Rukmini went ashore and took their way under the date-palms, through the tall millet, into the new land. They were not afraid ; for love casts out fear—even of the cruel gods of the East.

EDGAR JEPSON.
CAPTAIN D. BEAMES.

Notes.

As in his "Diamond Jubilee Ode," the Poet Laureate draws his inspiration from nature in penning the poem for the Queen's eightieth birthday, which appeared in The Times of Wednesday. It is in a very musical rhythm, well handled, and the stanzas of country life are in Mr. Austin's happiest vein. There the idyllic poet feels at home, far more so than when he tunes his lyre to higher strains. One cannot avoid some feeling of disproportion, some trace of a singer in difficulties. After all, what have larks, and orchard crofts, and white bindweed to do with Imperial expansion ? We quote what seem to us the best stanzas of the poem—happily called "An Indian Summer" :—

Withal there comes a time when Summers wane,
When from the sunshine something seems withdrawn,
And pensive shadows lengthen on the lawn ;
White bindweed wanders lonely in the lane,
The one sweet thing that now unwithered doth remain.

But there is beauty in autumnal bough
No less than in dear April's dewy leaves,
When with its store of golden-girdled sheaves
Piled stands the wain where one time passed the plough,
And ripened labour reaps fulfilment of its vow.

Then, though no more the oblivious cuckoo calls
From land to land, nor longer on the spray
Of yellowing elm the throistle vaunts his lay,
The ringdove's mate, as fades the leaf and falls,
Reiterates its note of love that never palls.

Though fluttereth still the soul-like lark aloft,
There is a quiet in the woodland ways,
The retrospective hush of vanished days,
And, around garden close and orchard croft,
A something in the air celestially soft.

From hamlet roofs blue apices of smoke once more,
As dies the day in mist along the date,
And widowed evening weeps behind her veil,
From log-replenished ingle heavenward soar,
And lamps are early lit, and early latched the door.

Season it is less earthly than divine.
When Love's rich guerdons with the days increase,
And cares are softened 'neath the crown of peace ;
When all we have won 'twere easy to resign ;
A season like to this, loved Lady, now is Thine !

The centenary of Thomas Hood's birth, last Tuesday, suggests some reflections on literary fashions. His name now suggests little more to the generality of readers than "The Bridge of Sighs" and "The Song of the Shirt." The fate of his comic poems, for which in his lifetime he was chiefly famous, illustrates the transitoriness of humour. "The Bridge of Sighs" is not a finer example of pathos than "Ben Battle" is of humour, at any rate, humour of the kind then popular. Leigh Hunt quotes "Ben Battle" under the seventh heading in his essay on Wit and Humour under "Any kind of juxtaposition of ideas having a pleasant effect, down to those depending on sound ; such as puns, macaronic poetry, half-jargon burdens of songs, and even nonsense verses." But it is in his serious poetry that Hood will live, in poems such as "The Plea of the Midsummer Fairies," "Hero and Leander," which made no stir at the time, and the familiar "I remember, I remember." By the way, the old confusion between the poet's name and that of his son, "Tom" Hood, the editor of Fun, has cropped up again. A writer in the Daily Chronicle rightly points out that the poet was always "Thomas," and that his son was actually christened "Tom" to avoid confusion.

Two years ago a committee, including Miss Anna Swanwick, Sir Edward Russell, Mr. Hall Caine, Mr. Richard Le Gallienne, Mr. Mackenzie Bell and other men of letters, was formed at Liverpool for the purpose of providing a local memorial to the Liverpool poetess, Mrs. Hemans. It was also decided that the memorial should take the form of an annual prize for a lyrical poem. The requisite funds having been collected, the subscription list is now closed. The council of University College has taken control of the fund ; Mr. Charles Allen has promised to produce a memorial medal ; and the prize, consisting of a medal and either books or money, will be first awarded in 1900.

A first list of subscriptions has been published by the committee of the William Black Memorial Fund, of which the hon. treasurer is Lord Archibald Campbell, Coutts' Bank. Among the members of the committee and the subscribers to the fund, which will probably be applied to establishing a lifeboat associated with Mr. Black's name somewhere on the West Coast of Scotland, are the Duke and Duchess of Sutherland, the Marquis of Lorne, Mr. George Meredith, Sir Walter Besant, Mr. Rudyard Kipling, Dr. Conan Doyle, Mr. Anthony Hope, Sir Theodore Martin, Sir Robert Giffin, Lord Strathcona and Mount Royal, Mr. Colin Hunter, A.R.A., Mr. Boughton, R.A., Mr. Macwhirter, R.A., Mr. Orchardson, R.A., Baron Tauchnitz, Sir J. R. Robinson, Sir Wemyss Reid, Sir Felix Simon, Dr. Lauder Brunton, the Editors of the Scotsman, the Glasgow Herald, the Liverpool Daily Post, and many others.

A writer in the Daily News, who has himself seen "a hut full of shepherds in the remote Antipodean backwoods" under the spell of Little Nell, vouches for the following story, which we do not remember to have seen before :—

Perhaps the most curious testimony to Dickens' universality is given by a surveyor, who was crossing the Sierra Nevada mountains. He and his party were snowbound, and, looking for water, came across a little hut, built of pine boughs and a few rough boards clumsily hewn out of small trees with an axe. The occupant was dressed in a suit made entirely of flour sacks, and was curiously labelled on various parts of his person "Best Family Flour Extra." His head was covered by a wolf's skin, drawn from the brute's head, with the ears standing erect in a fierce alert manner. He had not seen a human being for four months, and had lived on bear and elk meat and flour laid in during the summer. On being asked how he spent his time, he went to a barrel and produced "Nicholas Nickleby" and "Pickwick," which he knew almost by heart. He knew nothing about the author, but he gloried in Sam Weller, despised Squeers, and would probably have taken the latter's scalp with great skill and cheerfulness.

Our recent remarks on the subject of the decadence of magazines received a further striking illustration last week from certain proceedings in the Court of Mr. Justice Grantham. The same editor who circulated pudding basins full of gelatinous matter in order to collect impressions of the soles of the feet of celebrities had published what purported to be outlines of the heads of eminent people, and one eminent head indicated, he said, a "shifty, crafty individual"—an error of judgment which cost him £250 and costs. Counsel said that the outline which gave ground for litigation had been supplied by a "very respectable hatter." His respectability did not interfere with his revealing professional confidences. If the editor should return to the subject, his better way will be to send round the pudding basin again with the request that the popular idols of the hour will put their heads into it. He might, indeed, adopt the suggestion of the St. James's Gazette, and lead the way by heroically plunging his own head into one of these terrible receptacles. It would be interesting to have the opportunity of gauging his intelligence from his bumps.

Mr. Charles Miner Thompson, whose appreciation of Miss Wilkins we cited last week from an article by him in the Atlantic Monthly, is himself the author of a small collection of stories of boy-life in New England, "The Nimble Dollar and other Stories" (Houghton, Mifflin, and Co.). His studies of the New England boy are little masterpieces of story-writing, as well as contributions in their way to "historic psychology," as Renan called the science of national characteristics.

A short while since we quoted the proposal of an Italian critic that, as Shakespeare clearly described Hamlet as a podgy and short-winded person, actors should "make up" for the part with pillows and other accessories. The contention of a French critic that Sarah Bernhardt had missed a great artistic opportunity in not adopting this suggestion has resulted in a duel which, as French duels go, was of a comparatively desperate character. M. Vanor, the champion of this new reading of the part, was slapped in the face by M. Catulle Mendès, who defended the reading of it preferred by the great actress; and the result was that M. Catulle Mendès was shortly afterwards prodded in the abdominal region on the field of honour. The tragédienne had invited the poet to lunch with her after the combat was over, and tell her all about it. We are glad to know that, in the opinion of the doctors, the wound, though it has caused the duellist considerable pain, is not likely to have serious consequences.

Eleonora Duse and her distinguished countryman Zacconi have started their "d'Annunzio" tour. During two months they intend to give exclusively the plays of Gabriele d'Annunzio in all the leading towns of Italy. The première of Gioconda at the elegant little white and gold Theatre Mecadante, Naples, drew a brilliant audience, which is said to have literally screamed with enthusiasm. Gioconda is really not a play at all. It is devoid of action, has scarcely a situation, and everything that happens happens between the acts. It is almost like the old belated Italian opera in which the dramatis personae come forward in turn and sing their aria. In Gioconda all the characters talk d'Annunzio, for it is essentially a drama of words, but words of such fine musical cadence that they ravish and enthrall the listener. The story concerns a sculptor and two women, one his good angel, the other wicked and cruelly beautiful. He wishes to live with the first, who is his wife, in peace, but the latter is the inspiration of his art, and he feels he is born to create, not merely to live. So he breaks the heart of the good woman for the sake of the bad. Gioconda has just been published in book form by Fratelli Treves, of Milan.

A copy of the second Shakespeare folio does not often appear in a bookseller's catalogue, but Mr. Thorp, of Reading, is now offering a fairly good one for sale. It is not, however, perfect; very few existing copies of this folio are. Either the portrait is missing, or the introductory verses have been torn into and repaired, or the end leaves are reproductions in facsimile, or other portions are dexterously inlaid; but, considering the poor quality of the paper on which the book is printed and its huge bulk, the present imperfect condition of the majority of the folios is hardly to be wondered at.

On Monday, June 12, Messrs. Sotheby will begin dispersing Mr. William Wright's collection of books, autographs, and portraits. The sets of Dickens and Cruikshank, and the autograph letters of theatrical celebrities, are probably unique. There is an almost complete set of Dickens, first editions, many of them presentation copies from the author; an equally comprehensive set of works illustrated by George Cruikshank, a large number of books illustrated by Rowlandson, and an extensive series of first editions of Thackeray. Another prominent feature is a fine series of volumes which are "extra illustrated." The details of the many hundreds of rare portraits, prints, pamphlets, and autographs with which these books are adorned would form a book by themselves. Forster's "Life of Dickens" is inlaid to three volumes folio size, not the largest "extra illustrated" copy known of this work, but a very costly one. One extra illustration alone cost no less than £40. Other notable books of this class are Doran's "Their Majesties Servants," three volumes inlaid to folio size and extended to five volumes; and the Lives of Garrick, Mrs. Jordan, Edmund Kean, J. P. Kemble, Macready, Sir Joshua Reynolds, and Mrs. Siddons. Among items relating to Dickens is a little expenses book which he kept when employed as an office boy at the age of 16, and when his salary at the time, 1828, was but 13s. 6d. a week. There is also the original autograph manuscript of "The Battle of Life," one of the only three MSS. of Dickens which did not go to John Forster and from him to the South Kensington Museum. In the presentation copy of "Nicholas Nickleby" is a long autograph letter upon the subject of the book, in which the following occurs:—

The country for miles round when I was there was covered with deep snow. There is an old church near the school, and the first gravestone I stumbled on that dreary winter afternoon was placed above the grave of a boy, eighteen long years old, who had died—suddenly, the inscription said; I suppose his heart broke; the camel falls down "suddenly" when they heap the last load upon his back—died at that wretched place. I think his ghost put Smike into my head on the spot.

One curious item is a page in the autograph of Dickens composed when he was only 13 years old. It is a travesty of "Othello," written for private performance in his own family circle. Dickens is believed to have been the author of a tragedy entitled "Misnad, or the Sultan of India," but that manuscript, dating from about 1821, cannot now be found, and the travesty of "Othello" is the earliest known Dickens literary production of any kind.

We have received from Mrs. Archibald Little the following interesting notes as to the manners and achievements of the contemporary Chinese litterateurs. "Among Royal authors," she says, "the Empress-Dowager of China is not generally reckoned, but in her own country she is supposed to set much store by her productions. Jealousy of the poems inspired by his one journey is said to have caused the quarrel between her and Prince Chün, father of the deposed Emperor Kwangshü, and on one occasion she presented no less than 600 stanzas of her own poetry to the most learned body of China, the Hanlin College. In their enthusiasm for Japan, people often attribute to that gifted nation what more properly belongs to the Chinese, whose society games are not of the spelling order so popular at one time in English high society, but extremely difficult, making great demands upon the talent of the players. Capping verses has from time immemorial been a favourite diversion in China, where great people still write verses to commemorate their emotions on visiting places of exceptional beauty, or on seeing often frequented haunts to especial advantage, by a very clear moonlight or at sunset. Allusions to classic authors or to celebrities of ancient days have all to be recognized in Chinese good society, which partakes of the cultured character of our own eighteenth century. And the Empress of China is quite in the fashion in writing verses and also painting pictures of considerable merit. She loves to present a picture to a favoured courtier as a mark of especial favour. Learning and culture are so much esteemed in China that style has to a great extent obliterated original thought.

* * * * *

"It must, however, be remembered that the Chinese are quite unskilled in the Western art of self-advertisement. And, most unfortunately, those who translate from the Chinese generally use rugged English, or a sort of broken, childlike language, that conveys no idea at all of the finished elegance of the original, both as to conception and execution. 'Lu pe yas Lute,' versified by Mrs. Augusta Webster, probably gives a better idea of Chinese poetry, with the vague longing that pervades it, than the bulk of so-called literal translations. As showing the fancifulness of Chinese ideas rather than the beauty of their style, I venture to append a translation of a drinking song by W. A. P. M. The original was written by China's very favourite poet, Li-tao-po, A.D. 720 :—

ON DRINKING ALONE BY MOONLIGHT.

Here are flowers, and here is wine ;
But where's a friend with me to join
Hand to hand and heart to heart
In one full cup before we part ?

Rather than to drink alone,
I'll make bold to ask the moon
To condescend to lend her face
To grace the hour and the place.

Lo ! she answers, and she brings
My shadow on her silver wings ;
That makes three, and we shall be,
I ween, a merry company.

The modest moon declines the cup,
But shadow promptly takes it up ;
And when I dance my shadow fleet
Keeps measure with my flying feet.

Yet though the moon declines to tinkle,
She dances in yon shining ripple ;
And when I sing, my festive song
The echoes of the moon prolong.

Say, when shall we next meet together ?
Surely not in cloudy weather ;
For you, my boon companions dear,
Come only when the sky is clear.

In the exquisitely classic Chinese of the original this must surely be the most elegant, as well as most fanciful, drinking song that ever was written.

* * * * *

"Those who fancy that the Chinese of to-day have none of the aspirations and yearnings of the Chinese of old days may like to read a poem written by a Chinese in English, which is the more interesting in that it is addressed to a foreign friend, a German, who had just committed suicide in that November month in which 'the wild prunes first blossom on the mountain pass,' as recorded in a well-known line of Chinese poetry. The German had returned to China happy in the belief that a girl he loved would soon unite her life with his. Hearing that the engagement was broken off he seems to have given way to a fit of despondency and killed himself, and his Chinese friend bade him farewell in the following lines, which I can never read without emotion :—

The wild prunes blossom, red and white,
In wintry air.
Heavy with orange, in sunlight,
The groves are fair.

The pearl-like river, silent, sure,
Glides to the sea :
A spirit, mutinous, but pure,
Sets itself free.

Love, flowers, and music erst were thine ;
But love, to thee
A blight, was bitter as the brine
Of the salt sea.

From these thy noble spirit yearned
Towards nobler schemes ;
Dreams of a nobler age returned—
Alas ! but dreams.

Last on the river-girdled spot—
Thy spacious home,
Spacious but lone, for one was not
That should have come—

We sat and talked of modern creed
And ancient lore ;
Of modern gospel—gush and greed,
Now to the fore.

Thy fervent hope it was to join
The best with best ;
To break down the dividing-line
Of East and West.

O friend ! albeit of alien race,
For evermore
Shall be with me thy noble face,
Too sicklied o'er

With a world-sorrow e'en too great
For thy great heart,
Since from us, who still serve and wait,
Thou wouldst depart.

Farewell ! The swift-wheeled ship will bring To thy far West
The tidings, while I, grieving, sing
Thee to thy rest.

KU HUNG MING.

Viceroy's Yamen, Wuchang, December 4th, 1893.

If Mr. Ku Hung Ming were writing in his own language he could hardly have expressed himself more touchingly. But shall we ever 'break down the dividing-line of East and West ?'

Foreign Letter.

GERMANY.

THE INTELLECTUAL MOVEMENT IN RETROSPECT.

On the last night of the eighteenth century there took place at the Court of Weimar a famous masquerade, which opened with a symbolic pageant arranged by Goethe himself. When midnight was past, Goethe, Schiller, the philosopher Schelling, and the Norwegian romanticist Steffens withdrew into a side room and there, amidst enthusiastic speeches, drank to the new century in champagne. In these unromantic days there are not many who look forward into the twentieth century with the boundless hope and enthusiasm of those men of a hundred years ago. The world has grown soberer in the past century ; it has not passed through pessimism for nothing. But, even if we are reluctant to look forward, we can hardly escape looking backward, and, of all peoples, the Germans seem most anxious to pass in review their history and achievements in the nineteenth century. Quite a number of volumes are announced, or have already appeared, in Germany dealing with various aspects of the life and thought of the century ; and of these, much the most important so far is a large work by Professor Theobald Ziegler, "Die geistigen und socialen Strömungen des neunzehnten Jahrhunderts" (Berlin: Bondi, 10m.), which inaugurates a series of ten volumes on "Das neunzehnte Jahrhundert in Deutschlands Entwicklung." In this attractive and eloquently written volume Professor Ziegler takes up the evolution of modern Germany on the side which possesses the most general interest for other nations, its intellectual side. German political history for the greater part of the century has been mainly a German affair, German literature and art—music excepted—have only interested other nations fitfully, but German thought has been a steady factor in the whole intellectual movement of our time. Since 1800 Germany has unquestionably thrown out more vital and vitalising ideas into "the seed-field of time" than any other nation.

Professor Ziegler begins with the great formative forces in German intellectual life in 1800, the dying rationalism of the eighteenth century, the classic humanism of Goethe and Schiller, and the new gospel of Romanticism, which was to infuse a fresh vitality into every literature of Europe. Close upon the heels of the romantic philosophy of Schleiermacher, Fichte, and Schelling came the Hegelian movement, of which Professor Ziegler gives an admirable estimate. Unfortunately, however, for Hegel's philosophy, it crystallized too soon into a system, it became too soon the hard-and-fast creed of a school. Hegelianism had in turn to succumb to the spirit of the time, not, however, before it had gathered together the broken ends of pre-Romantic speculation, and for the first time formulated clearly the relation of the individual to the collective idea of humanity, to the State. Hegel had to succumb to Schopenhauer, a philosophy of optimistic collectivism to one of pessimism and, as far as the State was concerned, indifference. And, finally, from the negation of Schopenhauer sprang the new individualism. The step from Schopenhauer's conception of the supremacy of the will to Nietzsche's glorification of the strong man, the Willensmensch, of which Germany possessed so magnificent an example in Bismarck, was not a great one; we must also recognize that it was a step nearer to the old ideals of Romanticism. In the meantime German literature was moving hand in hand with the philosophic movement. After the rich poetry of the beginning of the century came a period of comparative barrenness, for, strange as it may seem, no great thinker ever exerted so unfavourable an influence upon literature as Hegel. The literature which grew up upon his ideas in all the Teutonic North was flat, uninspired, insipid. Thus the most vital problem of modern German and Scandinavian literatures has been the dethronement of Hegel; and it is here, if we only look deep enough, that we shall discover the real mainspring of the vigorous movement which has manifested itself in these literatures in the course of the past thirty years. The young literature of Germany could not long remain content with Schopenhauer, and what it missed in Schopenhauer it found in the powerfully individualistic trend of Scandinavian thought and poetry. Thus it is that Friedrich Nietzsche, the most ruthless champion of individualism of our time, has become, as Professor Ziegler says, "the great Piper of Hamelin" for the younger generation in Germany—a kind of impersonation of its literary ideals. With this final triumph of individualism the last traces of Hegel's literary influence have now been swept away.

Although one may not be able to follow Professor Ziegler in all the details of his book, it is impossible not to be struck by the essential fairness of his treatment. His own personal standpoint is clear enough; we feel at once that it is a South German and no Prussian who speaks. This is nowhere more obvious than in the constant antagonism which he displays towards Treitschke. Those who have come under the spell of the great Prussian historian will often be dissatisfied with the present volume; but Ziegler's standpoint is, none the less, a fairer, more liberal one than Treitschke's. On the other hand, Treitschke seems to me to have got nearer the kernel of German national life than Ziegler. He has understood more clearly how much lies in what I would call the conservative romanticism of the German race; here, and not in the cosmopolitan socialism, which Professor Ziegler seems to estimate so highly, lies Germany's peculiar strength. Ziegler clings too literally to Goethe's dictum—"Das Klassische nenne ich das Gesunde und das Romantische das Kranke." He overlooks the fact that much, perhaps the best, in the classic humanism of Goethe was rooted deep in the inexhaustible romanticism of his race. But although Professor Ziegler is personally not in sympathy with this side of German intellectual life, a paragraph like the following, which throws a flood of light upon the evolution of modern Germany, shows how fair his treatment of the subject is:—

Romanticism is still amongst us to-day, and every one is a romanticist who, like Nietzsche, sets the individual and his ego upon the throne, or, like Friedrich Wilhelm IV. of Prussia, will bring back the Middle Ages into the modern world; or who, again, like Wagner blends all the arts, like Nietzsche blends art and science, like Ludwig II. of Bavaria art and life, into one great ocean and leaves them in the wildest whirlpool of confusion. Those three tendencies of romanticism, full of contradictions as they are, dominate and corrupt the nineteenth century from its beginning to its close. And their power is not only visible where they dominate the century, but also where they are in conflict with it; for all attempts that have been hitherto made to overcome romanticism have been unsuccessful. It has struck too deep a root in German intellectual life for that, there is too much that is fascinating in it for the German mind, its best side is too akin to the German spirit.

Unquestionably the best part of Professor Ziegler's work is that which deals with the religious and philosophical evolution of modern Germany; the chapters on the literary movement are least satisfactory, but another volume of the series is to be devoted exclusively to the literature of the nineteenth century. On the whole, the volume is conceived in a generous, liberal spirit, and is warmly to be recommended to all foreign readers who wish to understand something of the peculiar temper of modern Germany.

The influence of the underlying social and intellectual currents of German life upon the national literature is also the subject of a recent American book which has not yet received the attention in England it deserves. I refer to Professor Kuno Francke's "Social Forces in German Literature" (New York: Holt), of which, I understand, a third edition is already in the press. In this suggestive work Professor Francke sets up what the scientist would call a working hypothesis to the effect that German intellectual and social life has oscillated steadily through the centuries between individualism and socialism. "All literary development," he holds, "is determined by the incessant conflict of two elemental human tendencies, the tendency towards personal freedom and the tendency towards collective organization." And this theory forms the background of his literary history. It is doubtful if a simple hypothesis of this kind is directly applicable to more than a few periods and manifestations of German or of any literature; literary evolution, since the Renaissance, at least, is, I fear, too complex an affair to be explained so easily. But the chief thing is that Professor Francke's hypothesis has aided him in producing what is undoubtedly the best history of German literature in our language, a book based everywhere on first-hand knowledge, full of fresh ideas and new points of view.

Of works dealing with the purely philosophical movement of the century a "Geschichte der neueren deutschen Philosophie seit Hegel," by Otto Siebert (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck and Ruprecht, 7m. 50pf.), may be recommended as a useful enough handbook to assist the student through the maze of schools and coteries in modern German philosophy; it is, however, rather a "Grundriss," a collection of materials, than a well digested history. The actual condition of German thought at the present moment—the Kant revival, the development of psychological research, the Nietzschean individualism—receives rather inadequate treatment. It is a phenomenon of peculiar interest that the sternly practical, commonsense spirit of the new German Empire should have permeated philosophy in Germany as it has done. The trend of speculation has changed so completely in the course of the last twenty years that it is no longer recognizable as German. The "nation of poets and thinkers" has been welded by the Zeitgeist—which it thinks much less about today than it did a generation ago—into a practical, political people. German thought is no longer metaphysical; it works in laboratories and uses the tools of the exact sciences. It no longer indulges in dreams of self-effacing altruism, but insists upon the rights of the individual and the practical virtues of life. As M. Brunetière in one of the essays of his latest volume of Études Critiques says:—"C'est à Léna ou à Berlin que la philosophie tout entière se voit réduite à la 'physio-psychologie'; et c'est à Oxford, je pense, qu'il faut aller aujourd'hui chercher les derniers des métaphysiciens." J. G. R.

FICTION.

When the Sleeper Wakes. By H. G. Wells. 8x5 1/2 in., 328 pp. London and New York, 1899. Harper & Bros. 6/-

It might be accounted captious to complain of the resemblance between the prologue of Mr. Wells' "When the Sleeper Wakes" and that of the late Mr. Bellamy's "Looking Backward." If we are again to be personally conducted on that now perhaps too often repeated tour into the far future—if we are once more to be invited to study the works and ways of the twenty-first or some still more remote century from the report of a contemporary of our own, the romancer, we suppose, must perforce resort to the expedient of the cataleptic trance. To summon his reporter from the shades would be fatal to the realistic illusion, and there is, therefore, nothing for it but to throw him into a state of suspended animation and to wake him as many hundred years later as may be necessary, with his memory and other faculties intact, and his age no more advanced than it was when he became unconscious. So much identity between Mr. Wells' plot and that of others who have preceded him in the same fantastic region must be accepted as inevitable. Where originality is possible in providing motive for his story Mr. Wells' ingenuity of invention has served him well. It was a good idea to make the sleeper the legatee of a couple of millionaires whose bequests, accumulating and fructifying during two centuries, have enabled him to grow so rich "while he slept" that on his waking he finds himself beneficial owner of half the world, while the possessors of the "legal estate," so to speak, the trustees by whom his property has been administered during the interval, have in process of time attained the position of a council of autocrats, practically supreme, over not only their own country, but apparently also the civilized universe. How they contend with the revolutionary party, led by the able but unscrupulous Ostrog, for control of the person of the awakened sleeper, and what thrilling adventures he passes through during the struggle we must leave to Mr. Wells' readers to discover for themselves.

And we trust that their ideas of what precisely happened to him and to others in the course of these adventures may be clearer than we confess our own to be. In the "Time Machine" Mr. Wells displayed a rare and remarkable power of enabling us to realize, or to imagine that we realized, conceptions the most fanciful and remote from physical possibilities. But whether it is that in his later works and in this especially he has less distinctly "visualized" his own fantasies, or whether owing to less cunning workmanship he has failed to convey his own mental impressions, we can testify that at least one reader of "When the Sleeper Wakes" has, after the most careful and conscientious study, quite failed to frame an intelligible mental picture of what passed on the glass roof of London when Graham was being rescued from the hands of the council by the emissaries of Ostrog. And as to the mysterious and chaotic struggle between the oligarchy and the popular party, which occupies the next chapter, we are convinced that if the task of giving a lucid and coherent account of it were to be set by way of examination paper, not one reader in a hundred would get "full marks." Mr. Wells' romance should have been much more fully and competently illustrated than by the couple of indistinct and uninforming sketches which have been inserted in the text of the book. We feel the need of a map or a diagram at every half-dozen pages in the earlier part of the book, though perhaps a single illustration might have rendered intelligible Graham's wholesale destruction of "aero-plane" troop ships with his "aeropile"—an exploit which, as narrated without such aid, produces the impression of the overturning of half a score of omnibuses by the charge of a bicycle. This seriously detracts from the interest of the dénouement—if we may use such a word of a process which leaves the principal knot still tied—and mars the close of a story, the political intrigue and the extremely slender love-episode of which are, moreover, not very skilfully managed. Mr. Wells, again, is too busy with his fighting and flying-machines to tell us much of the manners and civil institutions of the twenty-second century; but his view of the future, so far as he discloses it, contrasts amusingly with Mr. Bellamy's artless admiration for the mechanically perfect and absolutely dreary world of his own creation. Many touches of description in this romance show a satirical intention, as, for instance, the author's account of this very interesting development of the art of hypnotism:—

Long ago the old examination methods in education had been destroyed by these expedients. Instead of years of study candidates had substituted a few weeks of trances, and during the trance expert coaches had simply to repeat all the points necessary for adequate answering, adding a suggestion of his post-hypnotic recollection of these points. . . . In fact, all operations conducted under finite rules of a quasi-mechanical sort—that is, were now systematically relieved from the wanderings of imagination and emotion and brought to an unexampled pitch of accuracy. Little children of the labouring classes, as soon as they were of sufficient age to be hypnotised, were thus converted into beautifully punctual and trustworthy machine-minders, and released forthwith from the long, long thoughts of youth.

Sometimes, however, Mr. Wells' satire—if satire it is—is a little puzzling. As thus:—

Above the caryatidæ were marble busts of men whom that age esteemed—great moral emancipators and pioneers: for the most part their names were strange to Graham, though he recognized Grant Allen, Le Gallienne, Nietzsche, Shelley, and Goodwin (Godwin?).

Is this "nice derangement" of names a joke? If so, it seems to us to miss fire; and, indeed, throughout the whole volume, in his management of incident and adventure, as well as in his passages of description and reflection, Mr. Wells appears less successful in hitting the mark than he has been in some of his earlier tales of wonders.

ROSE-À-CHARLOTTE, by Marshall Saunders (Methuen, 6s.), we found charming from beginning to end. The scene is laid in the Evangeline country, and the spirit of Longfellow pervades the book without making it either insipid or sentimental. The whole story of Rose's courtship is most graceful and tender; and the quiet humour—not of a robust type, but easily to be felt—which distinguishes all the descriptions of the Acadiens relieves the pathos of the plot from mawkishness. Refinement and gentleness are the keynotes of the little book, and we wish it success.

In FORTUNE'S MY FOE (Pearson, 6s.) Mr. Bloundelle Burton has written a stirring romance. The time is 1750 to 1759, the "glorious year;" and the story ends with a good account of the great naval battle fought off Brest in that year. There is less than usual of the "clashing of swords" in Mr. Burton's book, but the human interest is greater, and the chief characters have been carefully drawn.

CALUMNIES, by E. M. Davy (Pearson, 6s.). People who are tired of the Wardour-street swashbucklers and the painful problems of modern fiction will turn, perhaps, with a sense of relief to this quiet, unpretentious love-story. The calumnies are of the common or Cathedral-town variety, but true love triumphs, as it should, on the last page.

Although it appears in a series entitled "Stories from American History," THE STORY OF OLD FORT LOUDON (Macmillan, 6s.) is an excellent example of the leisurely pseudo-historical novel which aims at vitalizing a well-known incident. "Charles Egbert Craddock" (Miss Murfree) has written many novels of adventure among the American Indians, and she here again makes use of the romance and daring as well as the horror which hang about the names of the Cherokee Indians. The Scotsman, Alexander MacLeod, and his young Huguenot wife, Odalie, with her frequent exclamation, "Quelle barbarie!" his brother Hamish, and the other characters are well sketched, and the adventures are based on historical incidents. The writing throughout the book is that of an accomplished novelist of the older school.

IN PHAROS THE EGYPTIAN (Ward, Lock, 5s.), Mr. Guy Boothby gives us a novel dealing with that particular kind of hero of fiction who lives through the centuries and makes himself most of the time particularly unpleasant. Pharos is the avenger of insulted Egyptian gods, and finding that Forrester, the hero, possesses a mummy in which he has an interest, he makes life highly disagreeable for him. The strange scenes and adventures, and the machinations of Pharos, which bring about stirring romantic situations, are told in Mr. Guy Boothby's best manner; everything is impossible, and the book holds the reader's interest from cover to cover. No one will say that it is the highest art, but many will read the book with delight. Mr. John H. Bacon has illustrated the story with great skill.

AN OPERA AND LADY GRASMERE, by Albert Kinross (Arrow-smith, 3s. 6d.), has a touch of originality and a fanciful charm of its own. The author is seen to far better advantage in the Arabian night adventures of his hero and the pretty courtship of Lady Grasmere than in a "Society" milieu, in which the "smart" conversation is conventional to woodenness; and it is not advisable to make the friends of a baronet's widow speak of her as Lady Horace Waring, even though there are two brother baronets. But it is ungracious to find fault with these little matters when we have so charming a scene as the lovemaking in the churchyard to enjoy. That and the general imaginative tone of the book save it from commonplaceness.

Mrs. Campbell Praed has done good work before now, but she has seldom written anything better than MADAME IZAN (Chatto and Windus, 6s.). Indeed, of its kind the book is as good as need be—original, bright, and peopled with live men and women. Madame Izan in herself and her companion, Mrs. Bax, are two delightful characters, but, although (as is natural enough) the women bear the palm, there is not one of the other sex crudely or insufficiently drawn, from Windeatt, the gigantic Australian, down to Yamasaki, the Japanese guide. The background of the story is that excellent one of travel, which some ladies, as Sara Jeannette Duncan, have learned to handle so admirably, and the greater part of the action takes place upon Japanese soil. It is clear that Mrs. Praed has more than a guide-book acquaintance with the Flowery Land, and she has dexterity, a pretty turn of sentiment, and more humour than is generally credited to her sex. "Madame Izan" is decidedly a book that will advance her reputation.

THE MAN AND HIS KINGDOM, by E. Phillips Oppenheim (Ward, Lock, 6s.), will not keep you awake like the same author's "Mysterious Mr. Sabin," but it will certainly not send you to sleep. The man is a rich young Englishman with Socialistic ideas, and his kingdom an almost incredibly virtuous colony of "failures" from England. They live under the wing of one of those bankrupt South American republics whose politics are a mixture of treachery, bloodshed, revolution, and rascality, and where, we gather, they are apt to hang policemen from lamp-posts when they wish to celebrate a saint's day. The hero, of course, marries the President's daughter, and in time is himself elected President. When we bid farewell to the republic it is entering on a career of peace and prosperity under this entirely new Anglo-Saxon management. An Irishman, we think, O'Higgins by name, did actually rise to a similar position in Chili and Peru towards the end of the last century. Now and again Mr.

Oppenheim writes a queer sentence. "But whomever the would-be assassin might have been" is one of them.

Those readers—and they are the majority—who like story-tellers to confine themselves to story-telling instead of trespassing on the domain of the philosopher, have every reason to be grateful to Mrs. C. H. Williamson for THE NEWSPAPER GIRL (Pearson, 6s.). The story is absolutely devoid of sentiment or insight, but it is written if not with a sense of humour, at least with a sense of the fun of the thing, and is based upon an ingenious idea. An American millionairess, desiring to have touch of the stern realities of life, changes her name and comes to London to be a journalist. She follows the profession courageously on the lines of Mrs. Elizabeth L. Banks, masquerading, on one occasion as a flower-girl, and on another, accepting a situation as housemaid. Her employer, on this last occasion, is the proprietor of a newspaper, and, hearing that he desires to sell his property, she amazes him by coming up in cap and apron and offering £200,000 for it. Her purpose, of course, is to confer the editorship upon a young man in whom she is interested. It is all very trivial, but it is brightly told, and the methods of lady journalists who live, not always very scrupulously, on their wits, are satirized without bitterness, but effectively.

We are sufficiently old-fashioned to prefer the works of Miss Rhoda Broughton to those of many authors whom it is now more fashionable to admire. Her characterization may not be subtle, but her characters are always alive, and one may acquire a taste even for her historic present. But we like Miss Broughton to give us either a happy ending or a good reason to the contrary. This is what she has not done in THE GAME AND THE CANDLE (Macmillan, 6s.). Here we have a man and a woman very much in love with each other and apparently on the verge of marrying and living happily ever afterwards. But the man is caught kissing another girl, with the result that:—

He is out of sight, and she turns from the window murmuring to herself, "As a dream when one awaketh." This, really, is as pessimistic as anything in d'Annunzio, though the similarity between Miss Broughton and d'Annunzio is not, in other respects, striking. But it is unconvincing pessimism, because there was no sufficient reason why the man should kiss that other girl, who was very unattractive, and because the quarrel resulting from that supererogatory kiss could have been composed. The book, however, is diverting by reason of the high spirits and lively humour which adorn its earlier pages.

THE GREEN FIELD (Chapman and Hall, 6s.) is a curious book, not without a certain power in places. It begins very badly indeed, but there is an improvement as soon as the author gets his story fairly in hand, and the conclusion is well managed. Mr. Neil Wynn Williams is too much occupied at first with the details of his craft; he spends all his energy in trying to write "forcefully"—the word is a favourite expression with him—and the result is fatiguing to the reader, who is always apt to fancy that high-flown language is adopted to conceal a poverty of thought. But when once he gets to business, Mr. Williams contrives to drop a good many of his curious infelicities of language, and surprises us with some strong situations. He has worked out his plot carefully to an effective climax, and those who manage to survive the opening chapter, and are not deterred by a rather liberal supply of indifferent Midland dialect, will find the story interesting, if rather gruesome. When Mr. Williams is not consciously aiming at strength of diction he can write as pleasantly as most. His characters, too, have life; but he is better with his labourers and servants, in spite of their wearisome dialect, than with the gentry of the neighbourhood.

Mr. John Reay Watson's AN EARTHLY FULFILMENT (Unwin, 6s.) has a strong central situation, realized with an intensity that holds the reader in the face of many small irritations in the way of style and a dialogue overwhelmingly elliptical. The disgrace and exposure of the poor young wife whose one, almost involuntary, sin has been bitterly repented of is almost too painful a subject for fiction—certainly for weak handling. Mr. Reay Watson has made it painful enough and to spare, but his handling has not been weak. The peculiarly tragic fact that the woman's heart had just turned to her husband, re-awakening their old romance, before the moment of discovery of her sordid new "episode"—for it is carefully shown to have been no deliberate sin—rouses the reader's sympathy for her without being in the least demoralizing. The child's suicide, to our thinking, strikes a false note and weakens the essential tragedy, which is the mother's; and the style, as we have said, constantly irritates. Still, any book so human and so individual cannot fail to stand out from the crowd. People will not skip Mr. Reay Watson when he a little forgets his cleverness and begins to tell his story. It is evident that he will always have a story to tell.

We have already commented on the experiment of publishing new novels at sixpence. The first number of the series which Messrs. Methuen propose to issue monthly under the general title of "The Novelist" is now published. The print is certainly clear, but the make-up, though as good as could be fairly expected for the price, will hardly please the self-respecting reader, and still less induce him to put it in his bookcase—a state of things which can hardly be satisfactory to the self-respecting writer. DEAD MEN TELL NO TALES is the title of the story; and the author, Mr. E. W. Hornung, seems to have but a low opinion of the sixpenny public, and to have deliberately written down to what he believes to be their intellectual level. At any rate, he has struck the note of crude sensationalism, and produced a story dealing with all the crimes that are generally considered suitable for the contemplation of the young person—such as murder, robbery, and arson. The result is unworthy of this writer's very considerable abilities. We hope this is not to be the normal effect of the sixpenny novel on a novelist's literary standards.

So far as detail goes, there is much that is good in Miss Mary Findlater's BETTY MUSGRAVE (Methuen, 6s.). Her description, for example, of life in an inferior Bloomsbury boarding-house, though a little wanting in the saving grace of humour, will be found satisfying by those who have had experience of life in such a place; and there are many little touches, more particularly in the earlier part of the book, that mark the hand of the true artist. As, for instance, "'Hush, mamma! there's a bird talking,' he exclaimed once when a nightingale began to sing while Mrs. Lacy was telling him some childish story, vapid as all her stories were." The main theme of the story, however, is not only unattractive, but even repellent. It is a study of dipsomania—a subject which requires exceptional skill for its proper presentation in a novel. We accept it from Zola (and even from Mr. George Moore) because their pitilessly complete observation and analysis is a thing of beauty in itself. We accept it from Sir Walter Besant, in "The Demoniac," because Sir Walter never writes as though dipsomania were three-fourths of life, but interrupts his treatment of it with humorous and idyllic interludes. Miss Findlater is terribly serious, but at the same time superficial, and the general impression left by her book is disagreeable. It would be better for her readers as well as for herself if she would devote her very notable talents to some more pleasant topic, and try to draw a heroine less given to sitting, helplessly, with her hands folded, in circumstances which call for energetic action.

Mr. Henry Wright's DEPOPULATION (George Allen, 1s.) is evidently intended to be read less as a work of art than a contribution to the labour question. The author's theory is that capital is able to trample upon the rights of labour merely because the labourers are too numerous, and compete with each other for whatever employment there may be. If only they were fewer, it would be the capitalists who would compete for their services, with the result that they would be able to insist upon a larger share of the profits of their industry. The one hope, therefore, of salvation for the labourer is that he should refuse to be fruitful and multiply. We are introduced to a working man who grasps this economic truth, renounces marriage (by preconcerted arrangement with the bride) upon the very altar steps, takes to the lecture platform, and founds a Depopulation League. We have here an economic theory in violent contrast with that which normally prevails even in countries where, as in France, there is no need of a Depopulation League. It seems to us to rest on the fallacious assumption that the capital seeking investment in "industrials" is a constant quantity, and would not diminish pari passu with the diminution in the available supply of labour. But it is embodied in an admirably eloquent little book which is not unlikely to arouse an interest quite out of proportion to its length.

LOCAL COLOUR.

Encouraged by the reception given to an earlier volume of the same kind, Mr. Crawley Boevey in DENE FOREST SKETCHES (Thomas Burleigh, 6s.) presents us with a second series of short stories founded on documents ranging from the year 1184 to 1752. His studies provide us with pleasant readings in old ways of life and thought. We protest against the weight of the paper on which the book is printed.

The Evening Argus is on the lookout for a new boom and one of its young lions happens to spend a holiday in a quiet corner of the Isle of Wight at Totlands Bay. How he there discovers the plots of a black-hearted German villain against the honour of our country and the safety of our shores is the story of SPIES OF THE WIGHT, by Mr. Headon Hill (Pearson, 3s. 6d.). It is full of astonishing incidents which happen with a wonderful appropriateness to the requirements of the journalist. The style is cheerful; the sympathetic characters are very good, the bad are very bad; the scenery of the island is described with an evident knowledge, and the general tone of the book is pleasant and exciting.

Mr. John Bufton, F.L.S., F.R.H.S., is evidently a man of wide reading, well versed in the poets, and with a turn for dropping into poetry himself upon the slightest provocation. In his Welsh idyll, which he calls GWEN PENRI (Elliot Stock, 5s.), a large proportion of the text is taken up with verse, quoted and original. Some of it is not bad verse, and sometimes Mr. Bufton writes pleasantly enough in prose; but his dialogue is singularly stilted. It is true that he has made his hero a Welsh poet, but it was surely unnecessary to insist upon his always using poetical tropes in ordinary conversation. "Gwen Penri" is not a bad little story, but it would have been better had the author not dragged in by the heels a good deal of extraneous matter. One of his characters writes an appreciation of Sir Lewis Morris; it is printed at length here, as are most of the poems written by the hero and his friends. This method of writing a story is not one that we can commend with any cordiality.

FROM THE EAST.

SELAM (Jarrold, 6s.) is a collection of sketches and tales of Bosnian life, written by a Bosnian, Milena Mrazovic, and translated by Mrs. Waugh. As a contribution to the world's supply of fiction it cannot be ranked very high; but it has a certain interest in that it gives the Bosnian point of view. The dreamy vagueness of the stories and the weird, unpronounceable names of the people and the places require a special mood for their perusal. The author wishes them, however, to be regarded as "an attempt to afford an insight into the soul of an unknown and, therefore, despised race"; and this purpose they achieve. They show us the Bosnian, tainted with all the melancholy of the East, "yearning after the Infinite, the Unattainable," and by no means worthy of being "classed together with the negroes of the Congo simply as 'barbarians.'" On the whole, the translation is well done, though, when an Oriental lady is made to address a young man as "sonny," we feel that this is not quite in the picture.

THROUGH THE STORM (Murray, 6s.), by Avetis Nazarbek, translated by Mrs. L. M. Elton, is a series of pictures of life in Armenia written from the Armenian point of view. A sympathetic introduction, also written from the Armenian point of view, is contributed by Professor York Powell, who naively praises his clients for their "complete grasp of the economic principles that make for success in the commercial world"—as pretty a euphemism for money-lending as we remember to have met. Still, the fact that the Armenians have grasped the same economic principles that are now directing the attention of Parliament towards English usurers is no reason why they should be tortured or massacred, and it is in order to protest against this maltreatment of his fellow-countrymen that Mr. Avetis Nazarbek has written his short stories. We shall be sincerely glad if his protest produces the result which he desires. But we confess that we are not sanguine. His stories are too long, too full of hard, foreign words, too difficult to read to be likely to influence public opinion to any appreciable extent. Miss May Kendall's "Turkish Bonds"—a book on the same lines, which we noticed a short while since—was pleasant reading compared with them, and we are also inclined to prefer the Blue-books and the pamphlets.

GOD'S GREETING, by John Garrett Leigh (Smith Elder, 6s.), is written to show the hardships of the miner's life and the other side of those "strikes" that seem to the public purely contumacious. It is hardly artistic, but certainly sincere and convincing.

THE DEATH THAT LURKS UNSEEN, by J. S. Fletcher (Ward, Lock, 3s. 6d.), is not a complete novel, the title being taken from that of the first story in a very fair average collection. This first one is ingenious, and the third one "Immediately Afterwards" has a very pretty touch of cynical humour.

SHUEYFINGSIN (Kegan Paul, 3s. 6d.) is an abbreviated and freely adapted version of a translation by the late Sir John Davis of an old Chinese romance. It may gratify the curiosity of the curious, who wish to study the celestial attitude towards life and love.

In the PASSING OF PRINCE ROZAN (Burleigh, 6s.) Mr. John Bickerdyke narrates the love affairs of one Lucas Gilbert, barrister, who is in pursuit of a princess. The characters are somewhat sketchy, but an Irishwoman, Lady Kilmore, is decidedly entertaining. The story is written with considerable humour, and never lags.

In A STRANGE EXECUTOR, by Bennett Coll (Pearson, 6s.), we have a slight variation of the old "mistaken identity" theme. The book is noticeable for a clever study of four unmarried ladies, spinsters or widows. Their love affairs past or present, their petty jealousies, their real sympathy and good fellowship towards one another, and their intrigues concerning the curate and lawyer of their little village are well drawn.

JOCK'S WARD, by Mrs. Herbert Martin (Pearson, 3s. 6d.), is a pretty and amiably-written story, told with some little pathos, of a London street-arab who constitutes himself protector of a broken-down shoemaker. The plot is ingeniously worked out, and the adventures of the strangely-assorted pair in their country retreat are sufficiently lifelike to be interesting. Mrs. Martin writes naturally, if rather obviously, and some of her village characters have the air of being drawn from personal observation.

There is one whimsical fancy, and one only, in each of Mr. Stebbing's PROBABLE TALES (Longmans, 4s. 6d.). They would make entertaining reading one at a time, though coming en masse the "funning" is sometimes likely to pall. Yet there are many humorous quips, besides, as we have said, one invariably happy central idea per tale.

FOR BETTER FOR WORSE, by Conrad Howard (Unwin, 6s.), is a most singular jumble in the way of plot, concerning itself with the love affairs of one generation and the religious difficulties of the next. And the whole potpourri ends with the most naive defence of atheism that one could wish to see. The bad taste of some of the remarks can only be excused, we presume, by extreme youth. But Mr. (or more probably Miss)

Conrad Howard has some grip of human character. The austere hero and his mother are not puppets. The next novel by the same hand might well be worth reading.

ADRIAN ROME, by Ernest Dawson and Arthur Moore (Methuen, 6s.), is the story of a young man of birth, breeding, and wealth who could not make up his mind whether he wished to be a gentleman or a Bohemian. He compromised by marrying a lady in the best society and then falling in love with an actress who, however, is as good as she is beautiful. One of the three parties to the complication must, of course, die; and it is here the hero who dies. The story is good enough to make one regret that it is not better. Parts of it are effective, but there is a want of continuity and a superabundance of extraneous matter.

JOHN THADDEUS MACKAY (Burleigh, 6s.), by Mr. Charles Williams, has the subtitle "A Study in Sects." The characters are partly drawn from life, but it is hard to believe that average people are so ready to discuss their religious convictions with any casual stranger as would seem here to be the case. The hero, whose name gives the book its title, is an Ulster Presbyterian, and his wife, who deserts him soon after marriage, tries almost as many men in the capacity of husband as Mackay tries sects for his religion. Her story is cleverly, though at times almost brutally, told. The book is good reading—with judicious skipping.

Miss Elizabeth Godfrey's story, A STOLEN IDEA (Jarrold, 6s.), agreeably relates how a young lady happens upon an idea in a manuscript and writes a novel round it. Greatly to her surprise and disgust this book proves a remarkable success, and the author of the original story finds what he considers to be his work famous, but himself unknown. Later the plagiaristic heroine falls in love with the author of the idea and a good situation is reached without undue effort. Miss Godfrey develops the story with no small cunning and makes her characters human, "A Stolen Idea" is a book worth reading.

THE GARDEN COURT MURDER, by Burford Delandroy (Ellis, 6d.), is not bad in the highly sensational line. It opens with an individual who is so often alluded to as the Honourable Hubert Haddon that our regret is tinged with relief when he becomes "the corpse," and is discovered in a cupboard (quite the wrong cupboard, too) doubled up and tied with red tape. "Who put him in?" is, of course, the riddle of the tale. It is an entertaining little book, though it is overburdened with a tirade against the laws of England and the "hireling with a piece of hemp," who, after all, supplies a want, on the author's own showing.

ESPRITU SANTO, by Henrietta Dana Skinner (Harpers), is a gentle, pretty, desperately sentimental story, dedicated to the memory of Mercedes, Queen of Spain. The number of embraces between the male characters suggests Charing-cross station before the departure of the Continental train. We began counting the times that Adriano put his arms round his brother and "hugged him very tight," but night fell and we had only read a few chapters. When they are not ridiculous, the brothers are pathetic enough, and there is a certain grace which a little redeems the author's sentimentality. Esprit herself is a sweet and spiritual creation; and when we read that on the day of her birth she smiled at the priest who baptized her, we feel it to be quite in character, if a little unusual.

A MODERN MERCENARY (Smith, Elder, 6s.), by E. and Hesketh Prichard ("E. and W. Heron"), is good enough to make one wish it were better. It belongs to a class of fiction which has become common of late, the scene being laid in a small Continental State which more powerful nations are anxious to annex or influence. The hero is, of course, an Englishman who has entered the service of the State, and has fallen in love with a lady of consequence, in this case the daughter of the Prime Minister. The story is well imagined, but it suffers from a want of directness, very probably the result of collaboration. It is not always easy to understand the intrigues in which the characters are perpetually engaged. With all its faults, which are mostly those of inexperience, the story is above the average.

Correspondence.

MR. JUSTIN MCCARTHY AND CHARLES KINGSLEY.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Surely Mr. McCarthy was right in charging Kingsley with great laxity of expression when he maintained that, by holding a stone in your hand, you are suspending the action of the law of gravitation. Whether Kingsley, if brought to book, would have qualified his appalling statement is another matter; but his words, "So much for the inevitable action of the laws of gravity," speak for themselves. One is reminded of the wag's answer to the spiritualist who contended that the human will can suspend gravity, "You suspend my gravity!" I am old enough to remember the indignation which Kingsley's paradox excited in scientific quarters. It may be worth adding that Henry Smith spoke to me of the volume—I think it was a reprinted lecture—in which the peccant passage is contained, and recommended it to me as pleasant reading; but he cautioned me against its conclusions.

Kingsley wished to throw discredit on Buckle and other writers who maintained, somewhat aggressively no doubt, the now familiar doctrine of the absolute uniformity of natural laws. So confident was he of the strength of his own case that he attacked his opponents on what seemed to him their strongest point by trying to show that a breach, as it were, is being continually made in the law of gravitation. His own view, of course, was that nature is conditioned by the Divine will, and is only a mode of the supernatural. Whether he was right or wrong in this conclusion I am not now inquiring. All I say is that he came to the conclusion by too short a cut. He appears to have thought that a man of God has only to blow his trumpet loud and defiantly and the bulwarks of materialism, like the walls of Jericho, will fall flat at his approach; so that Veni, maledixi, vici might be taken as his motto! At all events, Kingsley was utterly unable to place himself, even for a moment, at what is now called the agnostic standpoint. He once told me that he understood that Comte had gone off his head and that he was not surprised to hear it.

Yours faithfully,

LIONEL A. TOLLEMACHE.

Athenæum Club, Pall-mall, S.W., May 22.

ILLICIT COMMISSIONS.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—One would almost imagine your correspondent "Amicus Curiae" to be a woman—he is at once so brave and so illogical. He is brave in recording in your journal, by inference, that he considers himself better informed than both the Lord Chief Justice and Mr. John Murray. And he is illogical in supposing that there is any connexion between secret commissions and those referred to by the two publishers (writing respectively in Literature and the Outlook) whom he quotes. I will try to assist him by a concrete parallel instance.

I will suppose that he takes out a patent for an article, and submits it to a tradesman, and that the latter offers both to have it made and to sell it—to have it made for 3s., say, to sell it at 6s., and to account to "Amicus Curiae" for copies sold at 5s. 6d. I will suppose, moreover, that the article costs the tradesman 2s. 6d. only. Now, though I think it improbable that Mr. John Murray would pursue this course in a similar case, nevertheless I hope "Amicus Curiae" may be able to appreciate the fact that there is no secret commission in the matter at all, nor any dishonesty, nor even anything to complain of.

A manufacturing profit is as equitable as a profit on sales, and there is no reason (so far as legality, justice, or morals are concerned) to expect that the purchaser should be informed of the amount of that profit.

When you buy a bottle of wine at a restaurant you do not expect to be told what the proprietor paid for it. The only minor that would have made "Amicus Curiae's" inference a logical one would be that the two publishers in question had stated that their estimates were statements of what the work had cost them; but as there appears to be no evidence of this, let me beg "Amicus Curiae" to summon the courage to admit his mistake and his misinterpretation of the plain English of the two publishers. I will only add that I do not know the identity of either of the publishers in question, and that I write because I am at last tired of seeing a body of men (many of whom I know to be honourable and even generous) vilified by incompetent critics, who often proclaim their own dishonesty by their manner of impugning the honesty of others.

I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

AN ENEMY OF BUSYBODIES.

"ENGLISH AS SHE IS WROTE."

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Mr. Spielmann's letter of the 13th inst. in the last number of Literature, headed "English as She is Spoke," brings back to mind an amusing and delightful example of "English as she is wrote" which was published in Paris ten years ago as a "Practical Guide to the Universal Exhibition of 1889."

The editor's note begins by stating that "the Universal Exhibition, for whom who comes there for the first time is a true chaos in which it is impossible to direct and recognize one's self without a guide." The "Practical Guide" takes the visitor by the hand, "traces him not only what he has to see, but still which direction he must follow, which coffees he has to choose to refresh himself, which eating-houses will procure him in the cheapest manner the best meals."

The preface starts off by asking the important question, "Who was giving the idea of the exhibition?" and answers, "Nobody, in reality." The idea, it seems, "was in the air since several years, when divers newspapers, in 1883, bethought them to consecrate several articles to it, and so it became a serious matter."

The preface is followed by a few pages of "general informations," and then we reach the body of the work, which is divided into days. The "Tower Eiffel" is included in the first day's itinerary, which begins with a description of "the exhibition seen in a straight line," and no better idea of the amusing charm of the book can be given than by quoting the passage in which the genesis of the tower is explained:—

In order to attire the stranger, to create a great attraction which assured the success of the exhibition, it wanted something exceptional, unrivalled, extraordinary. An engineer presented him, Mr. Eiffel, already known by his considerable and keen works. He proposed to M. Locroy to erect a tower in iron which, reaching the height of three hundred metres, would represent, at the industrial sight, the resultant of the modern progresses. M. Locroy reflected and accepted. Hardly twenty years ago this project would have appeared fantastic and impossible. The state of the science of the iron constructions was not advanced enough, the security given by the calculations was not yet assured; to-day they know where they are going; they are able to count the force of the wind; the resistance which the iron opposes to it. Mr. Eiffel came at the proper time.

Every page is full of gems, and, being a connected narrative, the interest is maintained throughout by a succession of delightful surprises at the endless possibilities of "English as she is wrote."

Your obedient servant,

D. N. SAMSON.

74, Grosvenor-road, Highbury, N., May 21.

Authors and Publishers.

The report that Mr. John Lathey, the editor of the Penny Illustrated Paper, would succeed Mr. Clement Shorter in the editorship of the Illustrated London News is contradicted. The editorship of the Illustrated London News is, and will remain, in the hands of Sir William Ingram. Mr. Lathey is, and will continue to be, one of his assistants. Mr. Lathey, it will be remembered, is the son of a previous editor of the Illustrated London News.

Mr. Grant Richards will publish during June "Fable and Song in Italy," by Miss E. M. Clerke, who contributed some of the translations contained in Dr. Garnett's recent work on Italian literature. Miss Clerke traces the evolution of the chivalric poems from the street ballads. The transformation of the classical myths into mediæval fairy-tales forms another branch of the subject, and Boiardo's poem, rescued from oblivion by Sir Antonio Panizzi, is shown to be a great store-house of legendary lore.

A number of articles on Savonarola appeared in the Tablet last year. The Rev. H. Lucas, S.J., their author, has revised them and enlarged them into a volume which Messrs. Sands will publish. A special feature of the volume will be the numerous extracts from, and summaries of, contemporary documents, which hitherto have been hardly accessible for the general reader.

Canon Knox Little is a facile writer, and, we have no doubt, a competent observer, and he has put the results of his recent visit to South Africa in a book entitled "Sketches and Studies in South Africa," which is to be published by Messrs. Isbister.

Messrs. Harper are, we understand, about to publish a study by Mr. Stafford Ransome of the progress, policy, and methods of the Japanese since the war with China, entitled "Japan in Transition."

The Plato Lexicon, which we mentioned some time ago, shows signs of vitality. A meeting was held recently at Oxford when Professor Campbell narrated the history of the project towards which the Hellenic Society made a grant of £50 for three years, and among other private subscribers the Master and Fellows of Balliol College gave £30. Ast's Lexicon is to form the basis of the work. One proposal made seems hardly satisfactory—viz., that not merely each word in a given dialogue should be written on a separate slip, but each individual occurrence of a word, a method which would involve prodigious labour. What end, after all, is this concordance to serve? There are two classes of people who will want to use it—(1) the ordinary student of Plato; (2) the stylometrist. The requirements of the first would be amply served by importing a lucid order into the chaos of Ast, not enlarging, but rather retrenching. The great desideratum is to avoid hiding the light of the lexicon under a bushel of references. The problem which interests the stylometrist is to establish the order of the Platonic writings by minute observations on style. To him references are of comparatively little importance; what he wants is an authoritative statement of the number of times a given word or combination of words occurs within a given portion of the text. What is wanted is under each word a carefully selected list of usages for the ordinary student, and in smaller type for the stylometrist a string of references for all the other occurrences of the word, if they are at within compass, and, if not, a numerical statement of the total number in each dialogue.

In 1895 "Chapters in the Life of General Sir R. Church, chiefly in Italy 1817–1820," by E. M. Church, were published by Messrs. Blackwood. General Church had a remarkable career, and is well known for the part he played as General of the insurgent Greeks in 1827. The historical part has been enlarged by the addition of contemporary documents and of an account of General Church's pursuit of the brigands during his government of the provinces of Terra di Bari and Terra d'Otranto. The second part, "Apulian Tales, Episodi Pugliesi," has also been revised. An Italian translation of the part relating to Italy has just been published by G. Barbera, Florence, under the title, "Brigantaggio e Società Segrete nelle Puglie, dai Ricordi del Generale R. Church," with the permission of Messrs. Blackwood.

LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

ART.
Little Journeys to the Homes of Eminent Painters. By Elbert Hubbard. 744 pp. London, 1899. Putnam, 6d.

BIOGRAPHY.
Eugénie, Empress of the French. By Clara Tschudi. Translated from the Norwegian by E. M. Cope. 954 pp. London, 1899. Sonnenschein, 6s.
Memories of Half a Century. By R. W. Hiley, D.D. 954 pp., xx. + 411 pp. London, 1899. Longmans, 15s.

Life and Remains of the Rev. R. H. Quick. Ed. by F. Storr. 72 pp. Cambridge, 1899. University Press, 7s. 6d.

The Romance of a Pro-Consul. Being the Personal Life and Memoirs of the Rt. Hon. Sir George Grey, K.C.B. By James Milne. 72 pp. London, 1899. Chatto & Windus, 6s.

From Howard to Nelson. Ed. by John Knox Laughton, M.A. 96 pp. London, 1899. Lawrence & Bullen.

Rupert Prince Palatine. By Eva Scott. 94 pp. London, 1899. Constable, 15s. n.

EDUCATIONAL.
Lessons in French. Part I. New Ed. Rev. By Louis Faguel, LL.D., and others. 74 pp. London, 1899. Cassell, 2s.

FICTION.
Lesser Destinies. By Samuel Gordon. 854 pp. London, 1899. Murray, 6s.

Two in Captivity. By Vincent Brown. 74 pp. London, 1899. Lane, 3s. 6d.

Cromwell's Own. A Story of the Great Civil War. By Arthur Paterson. 74 pp. London, 1899. Harper, 6s.

I, Thou, and the Other One. By Amelia E. Barr. (Green Cloth Library.) 84 pp. London, 1899. Unwin, 6s.

Marianna, and other Stories. By Georgette Agnew. 74 pp. London, 1899. Burleigh, 6s.

A Gentleman from the Ranks. By H. B. Findlay Knight. 74 pp. London, 1899. Black, 6s.

The Morals of John Ireland. By Rex O'Bill. 74 pp. London, 1899. Burleigh, 1s. 6d.

Defender of the Faith. By Frank Mathew. 74 pp. London, 1899. Lane, 6s.

Gerald Fitzgerald, The Chevalier. By Charles Lever. 854 pp. London, 1899. Downey, 6s.

The Price of His Silence. By Iza Duffus Hardy. (W.T. Novels, No. 5.) 106 pp. London, 1899. "Weekly Telegraph," 3d.

GEOGRAPHY.
Spain. (The Children's Study.) By Leonard William. 74 pp., xi. + 303 pp. London, 1899. Unwin, 2s. 6d.
Man Past and Present. (Cambridge Geographical Series.) By A. H. Keane, F.R.G.S. 854 pp., xii. + 584 pp. Cambridge, 1899. University Press, 12s.

HISTORY.
History up to Date. A Concise Account of the War of 1898 between the United States and Spain. By William A. Johnston. 85 pp., xiii. + 253 pp. London, 1899. Allenson, 6s.

LITERARY.
The Kipling Guide-Book. With a Bibliography of His Works. By William Robertson. 54 pp. Birmingham, 1899. The Holland Book Co. 1s. n.

MISCELLANEOUS.
The Prophecies of the Brabanter. (Corunach Odar Folsalche.) By Alexander Mackenzie, F.S.A. With Introduction by Andrew Lang. 74 pp. London, 1899. Mackay, 2s. 6d. n.

Morison's Chronicle of the Year's News. 1899. First Year of Issue. Compiled by Oliphant Earl. 74 pp. Glasgow, 1899. Morison, 3s. 6d. n.

Little's Annual Pleasure Diary for 1899. 74 pp. London, 1899. Sampson Low, 1s.

Catalogue of the Central Libraries, Lending and Reference. 94 pp. London, 1899. Eyre & Spottiswoode, 1s.

Our Garden. By S. Reynolds Hole. (The Haddon Hall Library.) 84 pp. London, 1899. Dent, 7s. 6d.

The Modern Adam; or, How things are done. By A. W. A. Beckett. 74 pp. London, 1899. Hurst & Blackett, 3s. 6d.

What one can do with a Chafing-Dish. Rev. & Enlarged Ed. By H. L. S. 64 pp. London, 1899. Putnam, 4s.

Is Nature Cruel? By J. Crowther Hirsch. 64 pp. London, 1899. J. Clarke, 1s.

Firemen and Their Exploits. By F. M. Holmes. 74 pp. London, 1899. Partridge, 1s. 6d.

MUSIC.
The Chord. No. 1. A Quarterly Devoted to Music. 74 pp. London, 1899. Unicorn Press.

NAVAL.
An American Cruiser in the East. With an Account of the Battle of Manila, 1898. By J. D. Ford, U.S.N. 854 pp., xiv. + 537 pp. London, 1899. Allenson, 12s.

PHILOSOPHY.
From Comte to Benjamin Kidd. By Robert Macintosh, B.D. 94 pp., xxii. + 287 pp. London, 1899. Macmillan, 6s. 6d. n.

The Case of Wagner. Nietzsche contra Wagner. The Twilight of the Idols, The Antichrist. By Friedrich Nietzsche. Translated by Thomas Common. 94 pp., xx. + 354 pp. London, 1899. Unwin.

POETRY.
The Field Floridus. and other Poems. By Eugene Mason. 74 pp. London, 1899. Grant Richards, 6s. n.

For the King. and other Poems. By R. C. Rogers. 84 pp. London, 1899. Putnam, 6s.

A Modern Omar Khayyam. By R. Didden. 74 pp. London, 1899. Watts, 1s.

REPRINTS.
Woodstock. By Sir Walter Scott. (Temple Ed., 2 vols.) 64 pp., lxii. + 332 + 284 pp. London, 1899. Dent, 3s. n.

The Works of Henry Fielding. Vol. XII. Miscellaneous, Vol. II. With Introduction by Edmund Gosse. 94 pp. London, 1899. Constable, 7s. 6d. n.

The Moral Discourses of Epictetus. Translated by Elizabeth Carter. (The Temple Classics.) 2 vols. 64 pp., xlviii. + 226 + 287 pp. London, 1899. Dent, 3s. n.

The Mistress of Brax Farm. By Rosa N. Carey. 74 pp. London, 1899. Macmillan, 3s. 6d.

Mr. Dooley in Peace and War. 74 pp. London, 1899. Routledge, 1s.

Mad Violet. By William Black. 84 pp. London, 1899. Sampson Low, 6d.

Three Feathers. By William Black. 84 pp. London, 1899. Sampson Low, 6d.

SOCIOLOGY.

Higher Life for Working People. By W. W. Stephens. 854 pp. London, 1899. Longmans, 3s. 6d.

THEOLOGY.

The Polychrome Bible. The Book of Joshua. By W. H. Bennett. (6s. n.) The Book of the Prophet Ezekiel. By C. H. Toy. (10s. 6d.) 104 pp. London, 1899. J. Clarke.

Rebekah. A Narrative from Holy Scripture Told in Hexameter Verse. By G. W. Butler, M.A. 54 pp. London, 1899. Partridge, 6d.

Divine Dual Government. A Key to Many Mysteries. By W. Wood Smith. 854 pp. London, 1899. H. Marshall, 7s. 6d.

Methods and Problems of Spiritual Healing. By H. W. Dresser. 854 pp. London, 1899. Putnam, 2s. 6d.

The Cult of Othin. An Essay on the Ancient Religion of the North. By H. M. Chadwick. 74 pp. London, 1899. Clay, 2s. 6d.

TOPOGRAPHY.

Annals of Shrewsbury School. By G. W. Fisher, M.A. 954 pp., xiii. + 503 pp. London, 1899. Methuen, 10s. 6d.

A Picturesque History of Yorkshire. Pt. III. 94 pp. London, 1899. Dent, 1s. n.

TRAVEL.

The Romance of Australian Exploring. By G. Firth Scott. 74 pp. London, 1899. Sampson Low, 6s.

A Russian Province of the North. By Alexander P. Engelhardt. 94 pp., xix. + 356 pp. London, 1899. Constable, 18s.

True Tales of Travel and Adventure. By Harry De Windt. 74 pp. London, 1899. Chatto & Windus, 3s. 6d.

Sport in East Central Africa. By F. Vaughan Kirby. (Magamamba.) 106 pp., xvi. + 340 pp. London, 1899. Rowland Ward, 8s. 6d. n.

Pleasure Cruises to the Land of the Midnight Sun. 74 pp. London, 1899. Sampson Low, 1s.

Roman Africa. Archaeological Walks in Algeria and Tunis. By Gaston Boissier. Translated by Arabella Ward. 74 pp. London, 1899. Putnam, 6s.

Literature

Edited by J. D. Trill.

Published by The Times.

No. 85. SATURDAY, JUNE 3, 1890.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
Leading Article —The Case for Revision	561
"Among my Books," by Dean Stubbs.....	574
Poems —"On the Hither Bank," by Mr. Geo. Bartram
—"The Walker of the Dawn," by Mr. A. L. Salmon...	574
"At the Play in Old Geneva," by Mr. Francis Gribble	576
Reviews —
The Diary of Samuel Pepys.....	563
A History of Bohemian Literature	564
Three Noteworthy Poets—
Mr. Yeats—Mr. Laurence Housman—Mrs. Clement Shorter	565, 566
From Howard to Nelson	566
Memoir of Dean Liddell	567
German Higher Schools.....	567
Military —
Cromwell as a Soldier.....	568
The Queen's Service.....	569
Lumsden of the Guides	570
The Second Afghan War—The Tactics of the Future	571
Other New Books —
The Solitary Summer—The Naval Pioneers of Australia—Higher Life for Working People—The Prophecies of the Brahman Seer—
The Cult of Othin—Mr. Dooley; in Peace and War—True Tales of Travel and Adventure—Das ist das Deutschen Vaterland—Deutscher Volksthum—Guide Books—This Church and Realm—
The Earth Life—Firemen and their Exploits—Modern Adam—
The British Empire Dictionary—Morison's Chronicle of the Year's News—Catalogue of the Fulham Public Libraries—Life and Remains of Quirk—History Up to Date—Sport in East Central Africa—The Pianoforte and Pianoforte Players	571, 572, 573
Fiction —
The Individualist	582
Ragged Lady	582
The Captain of the Locusts—Through a Keyhole—A Son of the Sea —Tales of Northumbria—La Strada and other Stories—Helot and Hero—Ridán the Devil, and other Stories—The Mandate—Defender of the Faith—Blue and White—God Save England!—
Ma Mère—Cromwell's Own—Robespierre—The Knight of King's Guard—The Romance of the Lady Arbell.....	583, 584
American Letter, by Mr. W. D. Howells.....	578
From the Magazines	580
Book Prices	581
Correspondence —Illicit Commissions (Mr. John Murray, &c.)
—Shakespeare's Sonnets (Mr. Cuming Walters)—"English as She is Spoke" (Mr. Andrew Tuer)—English Hexameters (Mr. T. S. Omond,
&c.)—Shakespeare's Tempest —David, Earl of Huntingdon	584, 585, 586
Notes	562, 563, 577, 578
Authors and Publishers	587, 588
List of New Books and Reprints	588

THE CASE FOR REVISION.

What are the rights of an author in his work as against the public to whom he has once given it? Such a question is not so often asked as those which arise out of the commercial aspects of copyright, but it is perhaps of more general interest. It has lately been brought into notice by Mr. George Moore, who has considered it necessary to justify his action in thoroughly revising his strongest novel for a popular edition. Two or three years ago it was raised on a much larger scale by the course adopted by Mr. George Meredith on the occasion of the issue of the édition de luxe, which seems now to be regarded as the final acknowledgment of a novelist's classic rank. A good deal of alarm was caused, not altogether without reason, by the announcement that Mr. Meredith had undertaken a very free revision of his works for the purposes of that edition. The fact was discussed with an amount of perturbed language which seemed to show that it was considered to be an alarming and unwarrantable proceeding. Old admirers of Mr. Meredith's novels certainly had some ground for alarm when one of the first works in the new edition proved to have been very considerably amended by its author. "Evan Harrington" is a story of admirable merit, though it is the modern fashion to undervalue this brilliant piece of comedy; and it was a little startling to discover how freely it had been revised, though it must be confessed that Mr. John Raikes, on whom the pruning knife was chiefly laid, appeared to few readers to be one of Mr. Meredith's happiest creations. However, this was the only instance in which Mr. Meredith made very striking changes in his text, and only the very assiduous or critical reader would be likely to discover differences in the new corrected edition from that which burst upon the world at large as a revelation in the eighties. To find other instances of how sternly this writer can handle the work of his own pen, we should have to refer to the original edition of "Richard Feverel," which was very much longer than the book that we know to-day under that name, or to the first chapter of "Diana of the Crossways."

VOL. IV. No. 22.

The question, however, is not whether a particular novelist is wise in his revision, but whether the author in general possesses the right of revision at all, and, if so, to what extent he may carry it. To the open-minded reader it may seem rather unnecessary to ask such a question; but in literature, as in the economic world, there are limits set nowadays to a man's right to do what he will with his own. Perhaps a democratic age may be excused for pushing its demands into a circle where, fifty years ago, they would certainly have been received with scorn. At any rate, those who keep in touch with the contemporary course of criticism are aware that the feeling now in question does exist. When the first volume of the Edinburgh Stevenson appeared, a good deal of disapproval was expressed because the author had chosen to amend some of his essays, and had omitted passages which dwelt in the memory of their earlier readers. When Mr. Rudyard Kipling published "The Light that Failed" with a quite different ending from that which all the world had read already, a chorus of disapprobation was heard. Perhaps it is as well that no less consciously and conscientiously artistic novelist has noticed that such a course conceals possibilities of increasing sales with the greatest economy of effort. Publishers have been known to complain that serial publication interferes with the sale of a book; and in order to give people an incentive to read a story a second time they might encourage popular authors to alter the end, as Mr. Kipling did, or to introduce such changes in detail as Mr. Wells allowed himself in "The War of the Worlds." Hitherto, however, we are not aware that the question of an author's right to revise has been complicated by the imputation of such a motive. Were that ever to become the case, most people would incline to admit the validity of the reader's claim against the author. The grounds on which this rests have been satisfactorily expressed by Sir Walter Scott. In the preparation of the 1829 edition of the Waverley Novels—the magnum opus whose financial success lifted the thickest clouds from the evening of Scott's life—the temptation to revise those works of a marvellous improvisation was considerable, but was wisely resisted. Their author felt that any attempt to obviate criticism, however just, by altering a work already in the hands of the public was generally unsuccessful. The reader, as Scott pointed out, "does not relish that the incidents of a tale familiar to him should be altered to suit the taste of critics or the caprice of the author himself. This process of feeling is so natural that it may be observed even in children, who cannot endure that a nursery story should be repeated to them differently from the manner in which it was first told." In the same way one who has read "Evan Harrington" as often as Stevenson read through "The Egoist" will find the later version frequently painful to his associations; a boy who knows his "Hereward" almost by heart from an old volume of Good Words will never read it with entire complacency in the collected edition of Kingsley. The bibliophile, on the other hand, who values books without reading them will encourage authors to alter their published works as much as possible. He is quite aware of the enhanced price which the habit puts upon early editions. Even errata give fictitious value to a book: the first and weaker thoughts of an author are surely more important. This consideration seems to be at the root of the theory that first editions are prized because they represent a great work just as it came, fresh and fire-new, from its author's brain. "The Compleat Angler" of 1653 would hardly bring its present price in the market if it had not grown into such a very different shape by 1676. But the wishes of the collector, no less than the mercenary incentives of the publisher, must be omitted from any argument as to the highest duty of the author.

The truth is that no hard-and-fast rule can be laid down as to an author's right to alter his published work. As with the gentleman in the song, it is not what he says so much as the way he says it that is important. The reader's objection to the author's doing what he likes with his own is no doubt mainly sentimental, but then sentiment, unlike blank verse, is recognized as argument in these days. It also rests on the sense that a man who has written a successful book is as likely to spoil as to improve it by free revision: an author, great or small, is not always his own best critic. The language which popular novelists often use about reviewers illustrates this. FitzGerald, again, as was lately shown in our pages, for all his fine critical faculty, only weakened the charm of his great poem by constant tinkering at it. Coleridge, also a good critic, altered one of the finest lines in "The Ancient Mariner" into a piece of mere prose, which all his editors have had the sense to abandon. On the other hand we have Tennyson, with his emendations which let "the smaller ornaments and fancies drop away, and leave the grand ideas single." We remember Addison's well-meant warning to Pope not to meddle with the first draft of that "delicious little thing," the "Rape of the Lock," for which in after years poor Pope could imagine no reason but jealousy, so rightly did he value himself upon the successful addition of the Gnomes and Sylphs. On this ground also the revision of a literary work is, like treason, only to be justified when successful. Some critics have adduced as a reason against it that an author is better occupied in creating new forms of beauty than in redecorating old ones. This is a counsel of perfection, however, which would add new terrors to the literary life; not the most insatiable reader would grudge Mrs. Browning the amusement of re-writing her girlish version of the "Prometheus," or deny Browning the satisfaction of touching up "Pauline." It would be a very cynical asperity to say that Izaak Walton should have written the lives of several more ecclesiastics instead of adding to the Angler, or that Thackeray and Dickens were wiser than Scott and Mr. Meredith in never resting to revise what they had published. To allow that would be to side with Lord Melbourne, who never bought a living man's works for fear that his bargain might be spoilt by the appearance of a new and more complete edition.

What is a masque? is a question which a good many people will perhaps ask themselves on seeing the announcement that a masque is to be performed in the Guildhall this month under the auspices of the Art Workers' Guild and Mr. Walter Crane. Milton's "Comus" is called "a masque," but its right to that title has been disputed. A "masque" is not primarily a literary form at all. If anything can be found representing it at the present day it is the ballet of the music-hall, especially when this is supplemented by song and speech. But to make it complete, the ladies of the ballet should choose partners from the audience, and the principal parts in the dialogue should be borne by the leaders of the fashionable world.

This, however, we need hardly say, is far from being Mr. Walter Crane's programme. Nor will he, so far as may be gathered from the announcements, give us the anti-masque, or travesty, which usually accompanied the regular masque. In other respects apparently the attempt is to be made to revive the masque—a mixture of dialogue, song, and dance—as it existed at the time when it reached its greatest excellence—the first half of the seventeenth century. It was mainly Ben Jonson who made out of this pastime, so much affected at the Court of the Stuarts, a thing of real literary value, with his masterly scenes in which elegant lyrics relieve the learned discourse of classical and allegorical personages.

Over the relative importance of the poetry on the one hand and the stage business and stage carpentry on the other Ben Jonson and his collaborator, Inigo Jones, bandied many bitter words, and it is to be hoped that the Art Workers' Guild will not give occasion for such a complaint as the former made in his "Expostulation with Inigo Jones."

Painting and carpentry are the soul of masque,
Pack with your peddling poetry to the stage,
This is the money-got mechanic age.

Mr. Walter Crane, however—and here he is quite in the spirit of Jonson—is understood to desire that some profitable instruction should be conveyed by the masque. Be this as it may, there is much beauty for both the poet and the artist to extract from the story chosen for presentation—that of the Sleeping Beauty, the old Teutonic myth in which some have traced the rousing of Nature from its long wintry sleep with the Kiss of Spring.

Some interesting remarks on the latest developments of the French novel are contributed to the Contemporary Review by Madame Darmesteter. She thinks that now, just as at the time of the "Diamond Necklace," real life is competing successfully with fiction, and that the excitements of the Dreyfus case have killed the roman-à-trois without which, for a long time, no French novel could be considered complete. Possibly it is the Dreyfus case that has given that school of fiction its death-blow; but the signs of its decadence had already been detected by many critics for some time before the Affaire began to fill the papers. The authors of "Les Demi-Vierges" and "Aphrodite" forsook the beaten track of the ménage-à-trois, though the new line which they struck out was hardly better, from the point of view of the moralist, than the old one.

The latest tendencies of French fiction are, however, Madame Darmesteter assures us, of a more healthy character; the note of the hour being the discussion of pressing social questions. Thus, she points out, M. Maurice Barrés has written a story in favour of educational reform, and M. Louis Bertrand a story in favour of emigration to Algiers. She might have added that M. Zola is at present publishing in the Aurore a sermon in form of a novel, on the text, "Blessed is the man who has his quiver full of them." This is certainly an improvement on the methods of M. Pierre Louys, and perhaps even on those of M. Pierre Loti; but it indicates a tormenting self-consciousness which is inconsistent with the highest art. When a French novelist arises who can make us laugh as Paul de Kock and Dumas filz did, we shall begin to believe that the mental health of France is on a fair way towards recovery.

One is glad to see from Mr. Hay's courteous letter to Mr. Alfred Austin on the subject of English and American copyright that the United States Secretary of State agrees with the Poet Laureate that "absolute freedom of literary exchange" is at least a consummation to be desired. But Mr. Hay does not help the attainment of this end by insisting that "the hardships which are alleged to proceed" from the present American law "are somewhat exaggerated." As a matter of fact these hardships are frequently considerable. The condition that copyright can only be obtained by simultaneous publication is a continual cause of worry and costly cablegrams—more especially when it is a question of the serial appearance of works of fiction; and the new author, unknown to fame, who happens upon a success which even his publishers did not anticipate, often loses a small fortune through the opportunity which the present treaty gives to the pirates. If Mr. Hay cares to collect instances of this sort of thing, there are many authors on both sides of the Atlantic—from Mr. Charles Sheldon downwards—who could supply him with them.

Reviews.

The Diary of Samuel Pepys, M.A., F.R.S. Vol. IX., Index. Vol. X., Supplementary Pepysiana. Ed. by Henry Wheatley, F.S.A. 8½ × 5½ in., 366 + 342 pp. London, 1899. G. Bell. 10/6 each vol.

It is nearly twenty years since Mr. Wheatley gave the public the first fruits of those invaluable Pepysian labours which have now resulted in the completion of a most handsome and monumental edition of the immortal Diary. In the Cornhill Magazine, reviewing "Samuel Pepys and the World he Lived in," which was published in 1880, Robert Louis Stevenson observed that "a great part of Mr. Wheatley's volume might be transferred, by a good editor of Pepys, to the margin of the text, for it is precisely what the reader wants." One is delighted to think that Mr. Wheatley, whose enthusiasm for Pepys is so great and of such long standing that he has apparently named his own house after the diarist's estate in Huntingdon, has himself had the chance of becoming the good editor in question, and that his name will go down to posterity along with what has every prospect of long remaining the standard edition of a unique English classic. There is only one point in which Mr. Wheatley's work seems to offer any possibilities to the superseder, for it is impossible to imagine annotation more fully or accurately done than his. The text of the Diary, which has grown by steady accretions from the two volumes of 1825 to the eight volumes of the present edition, has been given to the world on the principle of Fontenelle, who said that if his hand were full of truth he would be careful only to open one finger at a time. Three successive editors have been needed before a practically complete edition of the diary could be obtained. Lord Braybrooke thought fit to ignore what he considered the frivolous details of Pepys' domestic life and the fine shades of his personality; Mr. Mynors Bright thought the account of the diarist's official work tedious: even Mr. Wheatley assures us that certain passages which he has omitted "cannot possibly be printed." Stevenson said, in relation to a similar plea in Mr. Bright's edition, "As for the time-honoured phrase, 'unfit for publication,' without being cynical, we may regard it as the sign of a precaution more or less commercial; and we may think, without being sordid, that when we purchase six huge and distressingly expensive volumes, we are entitled to be treated rather more like scholars and rather less like children." It can certainly be argued that an editor has no right to tamper with the text of so important a human document as the Diary, and Mr. Wheatley has gone so far in his admissions that it is not very easy to see for whose sake he has used his blue pencil. At the same time it may be conceded that, in the present state of the law, Mr. Wheatley had to choose between the blue pencil and such a device as the Kamashastra Society of Sir Richard Burton. Still one cannot help believing that one day the whole Diary will get into print, and one cannot but be sorry that the Casanova-like candour of Pepys and the present condition of public taste may between them deprive Mr. Wheatley of the glory of being the final editor of Pepys.

Human nature has this of the Divine in it, that it is always apt to think more of the one which is lost than of the ninety-and-nine which are found. In a critic that is not always a virtue, and it would be ungenerous to grudge Mr. Wheatley his due meed of praise because circumstances have made it practically impossible for him to give us an unexpurgated Pepys. The two final volumes of his edition, which are now before us, bring the reader back to a properly grateful frame of mind. They bear witness to unwearying industry, to wide reading and the capacity to interest all who had a mite to contribute to the work, to a mind saturated in the Pepysian atmosphere, and to the most amiable desire to put at every reader's disposal the editor's own treasures of learning. The supplementary volume of Pepysiana brings together practically all the "odds and ends of information" which throw light on Pepys' life and work, though they have not already found a place in the notes. The index volume is a model of what such a thing should be, and will bear comparison even with Dr. Birkbeck Hill's stupendous index to his Boswell, which has hitherto been the despair of imitators. Its arrangement is so orderly, its scope so full, that it makes the Diary a score of times more handy and valuable a work of reference than it was before.

It is not, however, as a work of reference that we set most value on the Diary. In the three-quarters of a century that have elapsed since the book was first disinterred from its long and quiet rest in the Pepysian Library at Cambridge, the world's attitude to it has quite altered. Lord Braybrooke looked on the Diary solely as an adjunct to the historian, a useful and almost unique record of current events during and after the Restoration. Macaulay dreamt one night that his niece came and confessed to him "that Pepys' diary was all a forgery, and that she had forged it." The dreamer woke in an agony at the thought that his history was thus falsified. If it were proved to-morrow that the Diary had been composed by Richardson as a pendant to "Clarissa," we should value it none the less, though the historian would be sadly to seek. We could no longer rank the Diary, indeed, with the self-revelations of Rousseau and Casanova, St. Augustine and Benvenuto Cellini, but it would take place among works of fiction as one of the finest studies of character in the world; and its real delight for the reader with no historical axe to grind would be not a whit the less. It matters little whether Samuel Pepys ever lived, when he is so absolutely life-like. We know him so well that we rank him with Panurge and Robinson Crusoe, Don Quixote, and Captain Booth, rather than with the other Secretaries to the Admiralty and grave official persons who made history without immortalizing their inner selves. The reader who considers the Diary from this point of view owes Mr. Wheatley as great a debt for his extension of the text as the historical student does for his elucidation of facts and dates. For there can be no doubt that the real Pepys is now first exposed to the world in his true colours; even Mr. Bright omitted far too many of the countless little touches which go to make up the picture of that singular and delightful personality. We are glad to have every detail that we can possibly get: even the odd mixture of bad French, Spanish, and Latin—the very Lingua Franca of free love—with which awkward passages are thinly veiled is no stumbling block to the judicious student of humanity. We do not really know Pepys till we see him at church on the solemn Fast Day in memory of the Great Fire, when the crowd was too thick for him to stay out the sermon, "so to the Swan and braise la fille, and drank, and then home by coach." It is true that one should not kiss and tell—but in short-hand and after the lips have been dust for two centuries, surely the loquacious frailty which makes for amusement may be excused. Doll Tearsheet was a frail wench, but lapse of time is a good antiseptic, and it must be a very sour Puritan who can think ill of Pepys for the recurrence of the record that "we did biber a good deal de vino," or that "I have lately played the fool much with our Nell." Mrs. Pepys no doubt found it trying, but the modern reader is none the less entertained by the sequel to that oyster feast at the tavern—"So home to dinner, where finding the cloth laid and much crumpled, but clean, I grew angry and flung the trenchers about the room, and in a mighty heat I was; so a clean cloth was laid, and my poor wife very patient, and so to dinner." Pepys did some excellent work for the Navy: but for our entertainment he was better employed when he sat in the low room at Sir Philip Warwick's, reading Erasmus on letter-writing, "a very good book, especially one letter of advice to a courtier, most true and good, which made me once resolve to tear out the two leaves it was writ in—but I forbore." It is a strange fate, as Stevenson says, that a man should be "known to his contemporaries in a halo of almost historical pomp, and to his descendants with an indecent familiarity." The moralist may call this being "damned to everlasting fame." But to the wise reader Pepys must always be infinitely amusing, and therefore infinitely dear. There is no doubt that he would in his heart have preferred that warm and friendly human prospect to any dulness of half-forgotten respectability, with a couple of lines in the "History of the Navy" for all his epitaph.

A LITERATURE STILL "TO SEEK."

A History of Bohemian Literature. By Francis, Count Lützow. ("Short Histories of the Literatures of the World." Edited by Edmund Gosse.) 8½ x 5¼ in., 425 pp. London, Heinemann, 1899.

This is another volume on the less known or entirely ignored literatures of the world, to which attention has been called by English works on Finnish, Hungarian, or Japanese literature during the last twelvemonth. In reviewing Count Lützow's book we do not for a moment mean to assume that air of superiority which, in dealing with works on Hungarian or Finnish literature, critics generally have taken up with so much satisfaction to themselves, if not also to others. We do not pretend to know more about Czech literature than does the author of this the first rather extensive English book on the subject. Nor do we so much as attempt to teach Count Lützow anything that he has not known long before, and better. Our only complaint is that, after reading his work from cover to cover, we now regret to have thus departed from the course of the ordinary literary critic. If, indeed, we had not read the work, we might have congratulated the British nation upon a work initiating them into the treasure-house of a new literature. The Bohemians, one of the "interesting" nations, are not unreasonably supposed to have an interesting literature, and a work of over 400 pages on the history of that literature might be expected to reveal many a great literary achievement of the Bohemians. Inquiring Englishmen who stay at Prague hear so much about the great past and promising future of Libussa's people that they entertain hopes of some Bohemian greatness in literature too. The Hungarians, whom Western nations not unfrequently mix up with the Bohemians, are, although rather important than "interesting," rightfully boasting a great literature with thousands of authors. So are the Poles. Why not, then, the Bohemians? They have, it is true, long been oppressed by the Austrians. But were the Turks not the cruel rulers of two-thirds of Hungary for over 150 years? Bohemian literature has been cultivated chiefly in the present century—but is not that the case with Hungarian literature too? It is, therefore, not unfair to expect of Czech-speaking people—that is, of over seven millions—a literature which may legitimately claim a place, if not among the literatures of the world, at least among the "Literatures of the World" as published by Mr. Heinemann.

In that expectation, however, we are disappointed, and by the very book here under contemplation. We do not here consider Bohemian literature; we consider, as is our duty, Count Litzow's book on that literature. And so doing, we cannot but come to the following alternative—either there is as yet precious little in Bohemian literature, and in that case it is unintelligible why that literature should be published in a series together with Greek, English, or French literature; or there is something in Bohemian literature, and in that case Count Litzow has failed to represent it. Here is, as succinctly as possible, a syllabus of the Count's book.

In the first two chapters we hear of a few legends, epic fragments in Bohemian, and of mostly poor chronicles in Latin, detached passages of those insignificant works being given in English translations. In the fourteenth century Stitny, the moralist, appears to be the only Czech prose-writer of any importance. In the next chapter, which is inordinately long (nearly 60 pages), we learn much about the famous Huss and the politico-religious troubles of his time. We do not deny that the history of Huss, one of the few historic personages of the Bohemians, deserves such elaborate treatment—but elsewhere, and not in a work on literature with limited space. The Czech works of Huss are either purely theological or private letters; neither set is of any great literary value, except for the mere fact of their language being Bohemian. In the fifteenth century there was only one other Czech writer of any merit, Chelcicky. In other words, the vast Hussite movement has, as far as we are here told, left no trace of a literary work in any way commensurate with the political significance of Hussitism. In the fifth chapter we are, indeed, introduced to a few more names, such as those of Bohemian humanists writing in Latin; one Czech poet, Simon Lomnický (born 1552); and, again, a number of theologians and moralists, such as the founders of the "Unity" or the community of the Bohemian Brethren, such as Rokycan, "Brother Gregory," Prokop of Neuhaus, Brother Lucas, Blahoslav, and Budovec of Budova. Not one of them is represented as having done any remarkable service to Czech literature. This, being put into plain language, means that the Bohemians, no more at the time when they were politically still a great nation, as in the fifteenth century, than when, as in the sixteenth, they still had large autonomy, produced any literature of their own worth the attention of the non-Bohemian. In the same chapter nearly 50 pages are devoted to the well-known educational writer and "pansophist" Comenius (Komensky), who visited this country. In the sixth chapter we hear of some mémoires valuable as historical documents on the stirring history of Bohemia previous to, and for some time after, the battle of the White Mountain (1620), which in one single hour put an end to Bohemian national aspirations for over 200 years. Hajek, Bilek, Brezan, Harant of Polzic, Skála, and Slawata (of defenestration fame) are the most noteworthy. The period from the fatal battle to the third decade of this century is a blank. And so we reach, in the seventh or last chapter of the book, our own times. For 353 pages we had been waiting in vain for anything approaching literary value; now, surely, in the last chapter, we must finally be requited. This, however, is not to be. We hear, it must be admitted, at some length, of one good poet in Czech; and unfortunately that poet was Kollar, a man born and educated in Hungary. Most of the chapter (in fact, excepting the pages treating of Kollar, nearly the entire chapter) is devoted to pure seconds such as Dobrovsky, Štáfl, Palacky, Jungmann. Of the only possibly valuable part of Bohemian literature, that of the last 30 to 40 years, we are told next to nothing. Of the poets Hanka, Celakovsky, and Vrchlický we are given a few lines; of the other Czech modern writers we hear still less, or only the mere names, and even of names there is only a little over a dozen. At the same time the author writes that "the last 20 years have contributed immensely to the development of the Bohemian language and literature"! If that be so—and we have good reason to think it is—why then, in the name of Bohemia, has Count Litzow not told us more about it? In fact, why has he not devoted the bulk of his book to modern Bohemian authors, and only a small introductory chapter to the rest? Many of the works of modern Czech writers are of a date old enough to admit of adequate literary criticism. Where ten lines are given to Jirecek, twice that number might have been employed for an appreciation of J. Maly or Zdenka Semberova, who are not even mentioned.

We have noticed only a small number of misprints; p. 262 (1647 instead of 1641), p. 357 ("in" instead of "im"), p. 360 ("Lehrgebäude" instead of "Lehrgebäude"), p. 401 ("Hussitenthums" instead of "Hussitenthums"), pp. 407 and 408 (repetition of the words "born 1846").

THREE NOTEWORTHY POETS.

In POEMS (Unwin, 7s. 6d.), and in "The Wind Among the Reeds"—reviewed in these pages a few weeks ago—Mr. Yeats has included, as he tells us in his preface, all of his published poetry which he cares to preserve. Much of it has appeared before; as it stands, revised and partly rewritten, in the present edition, it should give Mr. Yeats a high place among contemporary singers. Its author is something more than a facile writer of verse; he is a poet as surely as he is dreamer and mystic and lover of old Irish folk-lore. Some of his poems are marked by a melody of words that recalls Shelley; some are like Heine's in their combination of simplicity and weird imagination; almost all are touched with a note of tender regret for days long past—the days of the Fenian and the Red Branch legends, the days when fair Niam came, lured by tales of the Danaan poets, to lead Oisín captive:—

O Oisín, mount by me and ride
To shores by the wash of the tremulous tide,
Where men have heaped no burial mounds,
And the days pass by like a wayward tune,
Where broken faith has never been known,
And the blushes of first love never have flown;

This is the dominant note in most of these poems—the unconquerable desire to leave the hard material world and dream away long years in some peaceful fairy land. The same feeling inspires that wonderfully simple little play, the more pathetic for its simplicity, called The Land of Heart's Desire, which was produced some five years ago at the Avenue Theatre, and is included in this book. In the short poem that comes immediately before it Mr. Yeats himself supplies us with the key to much of his poetry. His verses, as he claims, tell

Of the dim wisdoms old and deep,
That God gives unto man in sleep.
For the elemental beings go
About my table to and fro.
In flood and fire and clay and wind
They huddle from man's pondering mind;
Yet he who treads in austere ways
May surely meet their ancient gaze.

It is possible that Mr. Yeats' poems are too exclusively Irish for a general popularity. His three long pieces—"The Countess Cathleen," "The Land of Heart's Desire," and "The Wanderings of Oisín"—are all steeped in Irish tradition, and full of symbolism which some readers, not of Celtic blood, may find difficult of explanation. But all who love the music of words will find on every page evidence enough of Mr. Yeats' mastery of his material. He paints best the realms of mystery—the dim, shadowy night, or the misty land of half-forgotten tradition. But he touches upon many strings with a sure hand: the simple ballad of Father Gilligan is no less well done, in its kind, than the swinging march of certain stanzas in "The Wanderings of Oisín." This poem, as it now stands, we think the cream of the collection; the subject was one to fire the poet's imagination, and he is at his best in such descriptions as this of Oisín's ride :—

And we rode on the plains of the sea's edge ; the sea's edge barren and grey,
Grey sand on the green of the grasses and over the dripping trees,
Dripping and doubling landward, as though they would hasten away
Like an army of old men longing for rest from the moan of the seas.

But the trees grew taller and closer, immense in their wrinkling bark ;
Dropping ; a murmurous dropping ; old silence and that one sound ;
For no live creatures lived there, no weasels moved in the dark :
Long sighs arose in our spirits, beneath us bubbled the ground.

And the ears of the horse went sinking away in the hollow night,
For, as drift from a sailor slow drowning the gleams of the world and the sun,
Ceased on our hands and our faces, on hazel and oak-leaf,
the light,
And the stars were blotted above us, and the whole of the world was one.

These three stanzas show not only Mr. Yeats' merits, but his faults also—a nebulosity, a vagueness of definition that is perhaps pardonable in so dreamy a temperament. It is not lack of polish that makes his poetry sometimes obscure—most of the verse in this book has undergone revision again and again—it is rather an inability to think clearly. He sees all things in a haze—a beautiful, mellow haze. He is a dreamer, and a poet ; as such are rare in these days, we will not waste time in pointing out the defects of his qualities.

Mr. Laurence Housman's THE LITTLE LAND, WITH SONGS FROM ITS FOUR RIVERS (Grant Richards, 8s. n.), is adorned, but by no means illustrated, with four drawings—a delight to the eye—in which he has sought to evoke discreetly, by a parallel charm, the essential spirit of his poetry. So much is clear ; but of what in each case the figure seated or crouched upon a rocky mound, and holding or spurning a pitcher whence water gushes, is emblematical we confess ourselves uncertain. Once he is evidently Cupid ; and thrice he is winged ; it is also permissible to connect the pitchers with the "four rivers" of the sub-title, which correspond with the fourfold division of the text, and in some dim way with its main themes of childhood (or play), love, religion, and death. There are many enchanting things among these poems—songs and fables and unclassified verses in which all Mr. Housman's abundant fancy and vigour and verbal inventiveness find their opportunity. "A Prayer in Autumn," for example, is characteristic :—

Flocks to the seaward of feathers ; loud winging of leaves and birds ;

And a roaring wind in the grey of a headlong sky ;
While autumn is hoarding her dead, and harries together her herds,

Let her not cast me aside, in the waste of the year let me die !
I have had summer in plenty, too long for the things I could learn—

Summer enough for a life, since spring was enough for the dream !

When I hear the leaves sobbing around me, and wings on a backward return,

In the eddy and roar of the year, let me go with the stream.

O Love, when the first leaf unfastened I found you ; you came.
I grew blind in your gaze, and your lips to my lips were aglow ;
And your hands and your feet lay upon me like fitters of flame ;
Oh, Love, now the last leaf unfastens, I lose you, you go !

On the other hand, a certain vagueness is his danger. He tends not seldom to a superfetation of images saying more than they suggest, to a looseness and tenuity of intention that make a mannerism of allegory and of his similes a mere pretext. Thus we have to set "The Magic Wood" and "The Apple of Winter" and "Undergrowth" against "The Elfin-Bride" and the lucidly elusive "City of Sleep" and "A Prayer Against Spring," and "The Man in Possession," which last poem curiously enough (or is it merely the calm rhythm ?) recalls some verses of the poet's namesake, the "Shropshire Lad." These are all fit to live. We admire, too, but rather as an exercise in scrupulous reconstruction, the sonnets and several poems that succeed them, which are Jacobean both in form and content. The artistic quality is always incontestable ; it is only over the sense, imprisoned in a web of pleasing phrase, that we sometimes stumble. That Mr. Housman can be quite articulate many poems in this volume besides those we have named make manifest, even though in a good number of cases the ultimate residuum of ideas is hardly accessible or seems to wear a giant's robe.

BALLADS AND POEMS. By Dora Sigerson (Mrs. Clement Shorter) (Bowden, 3s. 6d.). Mrs. Clement Shorter is a charming singer within the limits of an incomplete but authentic talent, to which the ballad form, with its traditional demands on temperament and comparative indifference to technical accomplishment, is particularly well suited. She is sympathetic and buoyant ; she has the tragic instinct, a vivid and singularly direct manner, and skill to impose the influence of a magical atmosphere upon her readers. Mrs. Shorter achieves real distinction in such ballads and "shannachies" as "Jeanne Bras," "The White Witch," "The Banshee," and especially in the poignant poem of "The Woman who went to Hell"—a metrical transcription of a West Irish legend which Mr. William Larminie has recorded in prose. Besides ballads, a good deal of miscellaneous verse is included in this volume. Little of it, perhaps, is absolutely memorable ; but a long story called by a title out of FitzGerald's "Omar," "The Me within thee blind !" and written in rhymed heroics that have a certain monotony, is powerfully conceived ; and the same may be said of the first thing in the book, "My Lady's Slipper," which figures among the ballads, but may be more appropriately described as a "dramatic romance." Mrs. Shorter's obvious imperfections are on the technical side. Her musical ear preserves her nearly always from cacophonous combinations and bad rhymes, but often allows her to stumble in the less simple and longer-winded rhythms she appears to prefer. In many cases, indeed, Mrs. Shorter gives the impression of having forgotten before she got half way through a poem what her original scheme of metre was. The most disconcerting instances of lines rhythmically irreconcilable are to be found in the otherwise admirable ballad "Jeanne Bras" and in "Uisneach and Deirdré," where the verse seems to waver continually between six accents and five. We wish we could find an excuse for supposing that these lapses were intentional irregularities.

"ADMIRALS ALL."

From Howard to Nelson: Twelve Sailors. Edited by John Knox Laughton, M.A. 9x6in., viii. + 476pp. London, 1899. Lawrence and Bullen. 10s. 6d.

We have to confess that this is a rather disappointing book. What is the particular advantage of entrusting the writing of lives of admirals to distinguished naval officers ? Mr. Laughton in his preface says that "What has been chiefly aimed at is to show how the work and methods of the great sailors of the past strike the sailors of the present," and he considers that "men who, having for many years braved the dangers of the sea, are in the ideal position to comprehend its mysteries." That is not exactly how we should have put it. The inshore fisherman and the stoker brave the dangers of the sea, but are not necessarily the better authorities on the naval wars of the past. Neither are the mysteries of the sea the matters to be dealt with here, but the causes of success and defeat in the conflicts of men. Mr. Laughton must be supposed to mean that gentlemen who have spent their lives in learning how to fight with ships will, supposing them to have the needful historical knowledge and the indispensable critical mind, be the best judges of the fighting of the past. No reasonable person will dispute that proposition. Natural faculty, plus professional knowledge, presents the ideal combination. When, however, we come to read the lives contained in this volume, we find uncommonly few traces of this expertise, this peculiar insight of the artist. They might, as a rule, have been written by any intelligent landman who would consult his books. Sir R. Vesey Hamilton, for instance, writes the life of Rodney, and this is all he has to say of the battle of Dominica:—

He [Grasse] missed it [his opportunity], and after various manœuvres Rodney got his chance, availed himself of it, and gained a decisive victory on the 12th April, 1782—a day henceforth memorable in our naval annals.

Is that all the sailor has to tell us of a battle which is a landmark in naval history, because of the way in which it was won, and because it struck a death blow to the paralysing pedantry of the line of battle? Many men, many women, many children, who never saw the sea could say as much, if they would bring their minds down to it. Meanwhile, two good pages are given to a dispute of no importance whatever with the Spanish governor of Carthagena, a matter of politics and diplomacy wherein a sailor is no better judge than another man. This complaint of ours does not apply to Admiral Colomb's papers on St. Vincent and Neleon. Admiral Colomb is the last man in the world to rest content with waving the banner, or to stop till he has extracted what he believes to be the real causes. His criticisms are very suggestive and also thoroughly independent. There is only one point on which we could wish that the Admiral had been more clear; and it is this: how far were Nelson's tactics justified only by the bad quality of his enemy? It may be perfectly correct to do things against an Afghan army which it would be mad to try against a German corps; but are we then to think of the tactics of the general commanding on the north-west frontier, who does what would be insane against an equal foe, as being positively, and not only relatively, good?

A GREAT ACADEMIC FIGURE.

Memoir of H. G. Liddell, D.D. By Rev. H. L. Thompson. 9x6in., 288 pp. London, 1899. Murray. 16/-

The only fault that we have to find with this most readable memoir is one which the critic does not usually find in biographies—that it is too short, considering the interest of the period with which it deals. Probably nowhere in England has the external mutation of society been so visible and so swift, even to abruptness, as at Oxford during the last half-century; and biographies of men who have lived there through this period, more especially, of course, if they have been themselves pars magna of contemporary change, like the late master of Balliol and the late Dean of Christchurch, must have a special interest for all Oxonians. These two great academic figures, who loomed so large on the view of undergraduates of the seventies and eighties, had, indeed, but little in common. They rendered alike great services to literature or to scholarship. Their ends were the same, in so far as each worked unselfishly for the good of his college and his University; but their methods were as different as the temperament by which the method was formed. They were as diverse in their excellences as in their peculiarities of speech and bearing. Jowett was the greater teacher, Liddell the busier public servant; Jowett's name is certainly, and, perhaps, deservedly, better known to the world in general; Liddell, the Olympian Dean (the "Grand Old Man," as Mr. Gladstone, with apparent unconsciousness, once called him), was in his day the greater figure within the limits of Oxford.

Indeed, as Mr. Thompson says, "to describe with any completeness the public services of Dean Liddell in matters affecting the interests of the University would almost entail the writing of a history of Oxford for a period of 35 years." While still headmaster of Westminster, he was a member of the penultimate University Commission. After he came back, he was the moving spirit of many boards and delegacies. He was the "true founder" of the body of non-collegiate students. He was an active curator of the University Galleries, and only ceased at his death to be a delegate of the Press. At the same time, he was working always at the Lexicon—requiring, as it did, constant revision so as to be kept abreast of contemporary scholarship—and governing a great college. One may infer from the universal report of Christchurch men, confirmed as it is by Mr. Thompson, that the Dean's shyness, never apparently conquered, must have made the latter part of his work the least agreeable to himself. His position at Christchurch must certainly have been at first very difficult. He came almost simultaneously with a new commission, on which he had himself sat, and which nowhere proposed more drastic reforms than in Christchurch—where students were still appointed by favour, where the Chapter was omnipotent, and where "noblemen" took formal precedence in hall of their nominal tutors. These and other antiquities were to be purged away; and Dr. Liddell had to hold the scales between contending parties and to preside over the inauguration of a new era. Except, however, for his extreme personal reserve, he was in other respects well qualified to rule at that particular period; for if he had no passion for reform in the abstract, yet his sense of right and sane openness of view made him invaluable as a guide and director among reformers. Indeed, an intolerant progressist could hardly have succeeded that eminent but somewhat inhuman Grecian, Dr. Gaisford (a Dean antiqui moris, if ever there was one), who considered that a Commission "could be productive of no good." Gaisford died in 1865, in the same year as President Routh, of Magdalen, who had talked with Samuel Johnson and did not believe in the existence of railways.

Dean Liddell's personality did not apparently lend itself to the anecdotist, and he was never a great letter-writer; so that Mr. Thompson's task has been comparatively easy. He has not had to reject a mythology nor to select from a huge correspondence like other biographers. There are, indeed, some good stories in the book; that, for instance, of the alto singer who was commanded, as a matter of college discipline, to sing bass. There are some very interesting letters from Mr. Ruskin and Dr. Pusey, and an instructive note on Mr. Gladstone's stay at Oxford in 1890. But with these exceptions we hear very little of the Dean's relations with the many remarkable persons with whom he must have been brought into contact; and this makes an otherwise excellent biography a little tantalizing.

THE FAILURE OF GERMAN EDUCATION.

German Higher Schools: the History, Organization, and Methods of Secondary Education in Germany. By James E. Russell, Ph.D., Dean of Teachers' College, Columbia University, New York. 8½x5½in., xii.+445 pp. New York and London, 1899. Longmans. 7/6

It is refreshing to find a competent educational authority thoroughly investigating the vaunted methods of the German schoolmaster, and coming to no more enthusiastic conclusion than that they are, apparently, all right for Germany. That, however, is Dr. Russell's attitude; and the array of facts which he diligently and dispassionately marshals will not, except in very few particulars, seem to English readers to warrant any warmer laudation of the system. Let us take those few exceptions first. These relate, of course, to the teaching of modern languages, and, more particularly, to the distribution of that teaching. In England the modern languages can hardly be said to be really well taught elsewhere than in a few of the best public schools. One or two of these can at any moment put forward a few French and German scholars capable of flinging scornful challenge to the best pupils of those commercial academies in which the dead languages are neglected for the avowed purpose of giving the living languages a better chance. It is characteristic of the German genius that in the German schools precisely the opposite state of things prevails. In the Gymnasien, says Dr. Russell, "the course, as a whole, even at its best, does little more for the pupil than give the ability to translate literary English with the help of a dictionary." "But," he continues, "modern language instruction in the Real-schools is quite another thing. Here is life and vigour and ability—and, of course, most excellent results." And he explains how these results have been obtained :—

The Prussian Lehrplan of 1892 . . . set as the aim of modern language teaching familiarity with the living tongue and an intimate acquaintance with the life of the people who use it. The idea of making French and English a Real-school substitute for the classical languages was intentionally abandoned ; instead of formal discipline of the mental faculties, the Government set as the standard of excellence the ability to use the modern language and the knowledge of modern literature and social life. Not power in general, but power in special directions, was made the end of all such instruction.

This means, of course, that, in the opinion of Prussian educational experts, the middle classes are not worth educating but only worth instructing ; so that knowledge comes to them, wisdom is welcome to linger. Such is the philosophical explanation of the German clerk, who is such a terror to the English clerk because he knows so much more than he does, yet is willing to work for so much less. By adopting the principles of the Lehrplan we might, no doubt, make the English clerk a similar terror in Germany ; but the question whether it is worth while has first to be decided.

Another topic which Dr. Russell treats carefully is the position of the German schoolmaster. To him, as to Demodocus of old, the gods have given both good and evil. He is not an adventurer but a civil servant, guaranteed against wrongful dismissal, sure of gradual promotion, and entitled to a pension on retirement. On the other hand, he is very poorly paid. At the Leipzig Gymnasien—which may be compared, if not with Eton and Harrow, at least with the Manchester and Bedford Grammar Schools—assistants begin with salaries of £85 a year, rising, after four years' service, to £105 a year ; while the headmasters themselves get only £345 a year and a house. In Wurtemberg, the highest stipend drawn by a headmaster is only £220 a year and a house. This clearly is not a rate of pay calculated to attract the best talent in the country to the class-room ; and there are vexatious restrictions on the conduct of assistant-masters which would not be tolerated here, and are unlikely to be popular anywhere. They must not marry without the consent of the provincial school board ; they must notify the director in case they wish to travel during the vacation ; and they are forbidden to write for the magazines on topics of the day.

In the main Dr. Russell has preferred the amassing of facts to the institution of comparisons. Looking at the facts, every reader can easily institute his own comparisons with special reference to his own ideals. Those who hold, as most of us do in this country, that a school ought to do something more for a boy than cram his head with knowledge, will find the book, for all its guarded commendations, a very damaging indictment of the German methods. Here is a passage which, properly read, "gives away" most of the praise bestowed, on other pages, upon the system :—

The esprit de corps of the public day schools is weak and uncertain. Too many pupils regard themselves as deprived of harmless liberties, many others have no thought except to get through and away ; there is far too little personal contact of teacher with pupil. . . . A strong sentiment of loyalty to the school and its traditions cannot thrive in such atmosphere. The average boy seems to consider schooling a necessary evil—something to be endured patiently, resolutely, thankfully, if only thereby he escape social damnation.

That is to say, Dr. Russell finds wanting in the schools of Germany very much what M. Démolins found wanting in the schools of France—a something for which even the undisputed thoroughness of German teaching is but a sorry substitute.

MILITARY.

Cromwell as a Soldier. By Lieut.-Col. T. S. Baldock. R.A. 9×6in., xv. + 538 pp. London, 1899. Kegan Paul. 15/-

Colonel Baldock's solid red volume is the fifth of the "Wolsley Series," a collection of military works, some original, some translated from the German. We note in the list of authors the well-known names of Lettow-Vorbeck and Verdy du Vernois, as well as that of Major Younghusband of the Guides.

To write a life of Cromwell as soldier is a task of no mean difficulty ; it has never before been essayed in England, and Hoenig's German biography is unsatisfactory from the author's insufficient knowledge of the original sources, which betrayed him into many inaccuracies. Professor S. R. Gardiner has treated of Cromwell's battles at considerable length ; but only as episodes in his magnificent "History of England," not as things to be studied for their military lessons. Colonel Baldock has evidently read through his History of the Great Rebellion with great care, and can seldom go wrong where he follows such a guide. On the other hand, he does not always seem acquainted with other good modern works on the Civil War, such as the articles which Mr. C. Firth and Colonel Ross have from time to time contributed to the English Historical Review, or the proceedings of the Royal Historical Society.

On the whole, the volume before us is a very creditable production. Readers who are not seventeenth-century specialists will find in it a very good general idea of Cromwell, his tactics and his strategy. Military readers more especially will be grateful for the opportunity of comparing the drill, the marching and attack formations, and the organization of the Cromwellian army with those of to-day. Civilian writers on the great Civil War have seldom condescended to deal with such details ; one may search through them in vain for definitions of a "forlorn," or "reformado," or a "commanded troop." Colonel Baldock has dealt with these technicalities of seventeenth-century military science shortly but very clearly in his second chapter. He shows that he has not attacked Cromwell's wars without a careful preliminary study of Ward's Military Magazine, and Turner's "Pallas Armata." It is only by poring over works of that description that the student can make out what were Cromwell's personal contributions to the development of the art of war. From his own despatches it would certainly not be possible (in spite of Carlyle) to make any such discovery, for Oliver found it as difficult to express himself with real lucidity on battle formation and manœuvres as to set forth his political creed with exactness in his harangues to his recalcitrant Parliaments.

In his last chapter Colonel Baldock sums up very clearly the three great characteristics which made Cromwell a master of the art of war. The first was his combination of dash and caution in the handling of mounted troops. Pre-eminently a cavalry general, he gained every one of his battles by the charge of his cuirassiers. The two mistaken habits which weakened the force of horse soldiery in his day were a tendency to trust to firearms rather than to the cold steel, and an inability to keep in hand after the first clash of the opposing squadrons had begun. Both these faults were hateful to Cromwell ; he never suffered his Ironsides to fall to squibbing with pistols and musketballs, or to practise skirmishing tactics. Such work was for the dragoons, the mounted infantry of his day. His own troopers were always thrown into the fight with closed ranks and at a moderate pace, so as to combine heavy impact with perfect cohesion and order. He relied less on high speed than did his rival, Prince Rupert, and preferred precision to blind fury at the moment of contact. His squadrons were treated each as a single ponderous projectile, not as a mere collection of high-spirited units. The consequence of this deliberation in Cromwell's advance was that his men never got out of hand. When Rupert's horsemen were victorious they invariably dashed on in wild career after their routed adversaries, dispersed all over the country side, and took hours to rally—as witness Edgehill and Naseby. Cromwell's troopers, on the other hand, never failed to hang together and wait for orders after a successful charge. It was only necessary to halt them for a moment, to dress the ranks and breathe the horses, and then they were ready for fresh work. At Marston Moor the same regiments were employed for four separate and successive operations without losing their cohesion.

However fierce the charge, however confused the mêlée, Cromwell never lost control over his troops. He never let go his last reserve until the last of the enemy's squadrons had been broken and dispersed. However successful a charge had been, he always reformed his troopers before launching them in pursuit.

Second among the practical lessons which Cromwell taught to his contemporaries was the great strategic precept that wars are settled by battles and not by sieges.

Of all the commanders of his day none understood so well as he that the value of a fortress depends on the support it can give to the army in the field. If the field army is thoroughly beaten the fate of the fortress is sealed. Cromwell never defended a leaguer, still less did he ever stand a siege. Never did he besiege a fortress while there was an unbeaten enemy in the field.

Such strategy was a revelation in the Civil War, where, during the earlier years, both King and Parliament wasted their armies by garrisoning every manor-house and small town, in oblivion of the fact that these small detached forces would fall helpless victims to the enemy if the field army was driven out of their neighbourhood. In 1644 Charles and the two Houses had each some ninety or a hundred thousand men in arms in one corner or another of England. But neither party ever concentrated more than 25,000 for a battle; the rest were scattered about in small detachments and immobilized in garrisons. Cromwell, on the other hand, was wont to "slight" (i.e., dismantle) all strongholds that fell into his hands except those of primary importance. Every man deducted from the field army to occupy an unnecessary castle he looked upon as a man lost. Hence it came to pass that he was always at the head of the largest possible number of men on the decisive spot of the battlefield.

Cromwell's third strong point was that on which historians have often laid stress to the neglect of the other two—his capacity as an organizer. It was this power which first brought him into notice. Other officers in 1642 had as good material at their disposition as those godly yeomen of Huntingdon and Cambridge whom Oliver formed into his first troop. But no other commander made so much of the means at their disposal; his troop grew into a regiment, and his regiment became the pattern for all the cavalry of the Eastern Association, and finally for the whole of the "new model" army.

On the creation of this force the claim of Cromwell to stand among the very greatest soldiers of all ages should rest. When the backward military organization of England at the outbreak of the Civil War is considered, it is perfectly marvellous that in seven years one man, himself an untrained civilian at the outset, should have brought the national forces to such a high degree of perfection.

All this general exposition is admirably done; less admirable, however, are some of the details. Colonel Baldoek has two main faults; he is not drastic enough in dealing with bad authorities, and he has not always laid hands on the most important documents bearing on any particular campaign. Let us take, for example, Marston Moor. There had long existed a controversy as to the way in which the Royalist army was drawn up, and concerning its exact numbers. But these points were completely settled in 1898 by Mr. Firth's discovery of Prince Rupert's own plan of the battle, wherein every squadron and regiment is accurately set down, with its numbers, in most cases, appended. Without this document we should never have known that the exact force of the host was 8,000 horse and 11,000 foot, or that the Prince had advanced two regiments to the line of the hedge that covered his front, or, again, that he had placed the whole of Newcastle's infantry, not on his left (as was generally supposed), but to his rear and in second line. It is hopeless to describe Marston Moor, as Colonel Baldoek has done, without any knowledge of this document of absolutely primary importance. As an example of the other sort of fault to which he sometimes gives way—that of using with respect sources that are absolutely worthless—we must quote with disapproval his treatment of the Squire Papers as if they were worthy of the least mention. Still worse is the quotation of the celebrated "Memoirs of a Cavalier" as a serious source of information. Even if its author was not well known, a short glance through the subject matter of a few pages is sufficient to show that it must be a forgery of the eighteenth century. To say that "it is discredited by Gardiner, but, genuine or not, it was written by some one of considerable military knowledge," is to give the worthless, if ingenious, compilation far too much credit.

Of mistakes of the smaller kind a fair amount might be picked out. Lords Lieutenant were instituted by Mary, not by Edward VI. (p. 14). Sir Faithful Fortescue deserted at Edgehill with a troop, not with a regiment—i.e., with sixty or eighty men, not with 300 or 400. The mysterious Earl of "Buckleigh" on p. 146 should be the Earl of Buccleugh. Waller, not "Walker," captured Portsmouth from Goring (p. 8). Elizabeth's Spanish war can not be said to have "never entailed large armies," for 16,000 soldiers sailed on the "Journey of Portugal" in 1589 over and above the seamen. But errors of this kind are comparatively trivial, and perhaps hardly worth mentioning in a book full of good and conscientious work.

The Queen's Service: Being the Experiences of Private Soldier in the British Infantry at Home and Abroad
By Horace Wyndham, late of the —th Regiment. 7½ x 5 in.
xii. + 305 pp. London, 1899. Heinemann. 3/6

The everyday life of a soldier in the ranks of the British Army does not lend itself, apart from intervals of what Private Terence Mulvaney calls "sumptuous fightin'," to description at once faithful and picturesque. A great artist like Kipling, to whom, "by permission," this book is dedicated, may utilize certain details of barrack-room existence in a way to disarm any but captious professional criticism. But the concrete realities of the military career will never be found in literature of the type of "Soldiers Three," for a very simple reason. Artificial processes seldom, if ever, beget true literature, and, although it is quite wrong to call the British soldier of to-day a mere machine, he is, to a large extent, an artificial product. The whole scheme by which his every-day life is governed is utterly distinct from that which serves for the ordinary human being, who has no need to spend three or four hours out of twelve in rhythmical tramping over a parade ground, and is not liable to a term of imprisonment with hard labour for merely calling a fellow man a simpleton. A sailor's life, it is true, is similarly one of routine, and still more rigidly circumscribed, and yet has produced some notable literature. But the sailor at sea has the uplifting sense of being on continual active service, in addition to the mystical inspiration arising from the element with which he works alternately in the closest partnership or in struggles for dear life.

But if the daily round of barrack life does not tend to work such as Clark Russell's or Dana's, or to revelations like "The Cruise of the Cachalot," it is quite possible for a clear and literal record of it to have a genuine interest. Although England is not a military nation, its Army is part and parcel of its national existence, and is, moreover, a school which, for a large section of the population, has a distinct reformatory, as well as educational, influence. The process can only be fairly described in minute detail, and we cannot possibly follow Mr. Wyndham through the forty chapters in which he rises from the condition of a "rookie," enlisted at St. George's Barracks, to the rank of sergeant; soldiers with his regiment at Dublin, the Curragh, the Cape, Gibraltar, and Malta; and discourses brightly upon such subjects as Christmas Day in the Army, Courts-martial, regimental institutions, army schools, military hospitals, troopship voyages, and "gentlemen rankers." But even this incomplete allusion to the contents of Mr. Wyndham's book—portions of which have appeared in several good periodicals—will give some idea of its comprehensiveness. It may fairly be added that Mr. Wyndham's personality as exhibited in these pages is an attractive one, more so than that of several other writers on the same lines. It is to his literary advantage that he did not rise to a commission, and that he is throughout in perfect touch with his subject, instead of treating it from the olim meminisse standpoint which is generally misleading and sometimes insincere. Another point in his favour is that he is up-to-date. The period covered by his service is from the winter of 1890 to the winter of 1897, and, although in two important particulars the conditions of service have been greatly improved since Mr. Wyndham purchased his discharge, his work, as a whole, will probably hold good for some years to come, as not only a readable narrative but also a substantially accurate work of reference.

It was hardly to be expected that military men would find in "The Queen's Service" anything absolutely new. The yarns in particular are of the crusted variety, including the well-worn one about the sergeant-major and "fancy religions." Although officers, as a rule, avoid displaying a very close acquaintance with la vie intime of the barrack room, they are as fully aware as Mr. Wyndham himself of irregularities such as he describes in connexion with the canteen and the sergeants' mess. But there are difficulties in the way of radical reform, and, with wider experience, Mr. Wyndham would perhaps have spoken with less freedom on these points. He makes another mistake in supposing that an officer who has risen from the ranks is necessarily a good disciplinarian because he treats certain offences with "draconic severity." As a matter of fact, it is here that the "ranker" too often oversteps the mark, his influence with the men being sometimes impaired by the fact that he "knows too much." On the other hand, Mr. Wyndham shows excellent sense and full knowledge in discussing that snobbish and wholly impracticable idea, "a regiment of gentlemen." His "few suggestions" as to food, cooking, and some other matters in which improvement is still possible, are modest and practical, and he very effectually controverts the notion of giving the reservist a better chance of obtaining civilian employment by teaching him a trade during his term of service. One regrets that Mr. Wyndham's experiences did not include a spell of India. But this deficiency does not seriously discount the welcome to be extended to the work of a healthy-minded young soldier who, having put his hand to the plough, manfully kept it there, and did not forget at the same time to examine the soil and other characteristics of the fields in which he was working.

Lumsden of the Guides. A Sketch of the Life of Lieut.-Gen. Sir Harry Burnett Lumsden, K.C.S.I., C.B., with Selections from his Correspondence and Occasional Papers. By General Sir Peter Lumsden, G.C.B., C.S.I., and George R. Elsmie, C.S.I. With Portraits, Maps, and Illustrations. 9x5½ in., xvi. + 333 pp. London, 1899.

Murray. 16/-

Harry Burnett Lumsden received his commission in 1833, and a few months later was gazetted to the 59th Bengal Native Infantry. In 1842 he was selected to act as interpreter and quartermaster to the 33rd Native Infantry, and in that capacity took part, under General Sir George Pollock, in the Afghan War. When Henry Lawrence was appointed British Resident at Lahore he chose Lumsden as one of his assistants, the others being George Lawrence, Herbert Edwardes, John Nicholson, Hodson, Richard Pollock, and several more who were destined to be scarcely less famous. Perhaps no man ever had a keener eye for character than Henry Lawrence; it was said that he was in the habit of keeping a note-book in which he entered the name of every promising young fellow he met. In those days frontier troubles were incessant, and Lumsden was in the thick of them. He accompanied the expedition to Kashmir, and so firmly established himself in Lawrence's favour that he was given an independent command, his men being the very Sikhs against whom he had just been fighting. "You may fancy my feelings at finding myself—a griff of a lieutenant—suddenly placed in the position of a general officer with troops in whose company I had never been before except as an enemy."

Such was the man to whom, when Lawrence conceived the idea of raising the Guides, he entrusted the task. In a lecture delivered at the Royal United Service Institution, Sir Henry Daly, who, in Lumsden's absence, had the good fortune to command that famous corps at Delhi, said:—

Lumsden possessed characteristics for the task in a rare degree. A daring sportsman, full of endurance, hardy and strong of frame, with an instinctive knowledge of men which gave him a power which none under him ever questioned. Life in the Punjab in those times was full of incidents, and few were the days which did not test self-dependence and salubrious intelligence. Henry Lawrence quickly gauged Lumsden's genius. It is hardly enough to say that on the enrolment of the Guides (at first consisting of one troop of cavalry and two companies of infantry) each man's personal history was known to Lumsden. Men from every wild and warlike tribe were represented in its ranks—men habituated to war and sport, the dangers and vicissitudes of border life—Afridis and Goorkhas, Sikhs and Huzaras, Wuziris, Pathans of every class, and even Kafirs. . . . Lumsden sought out the men notorious for desperate deeds, leaders in forays, who kept the passes in the hills, and lived amid inaccessible rocks. He made Guides of them. Tempted by regular pay and enterprise, many joined the corps and became conspicuous for daring and fidelity.

Among his recruits was the notorious Dilawur Khan, whose chief occupation seems to have been "kidnapping bankers and rich traders." Dilawur was invited by Lumsden to the camp, and, to the general astonishment, accepted the invitation. When the matter was explained to him he treated it as a joke and departed laughing. But a few weeks later he returned to say that he would, after all, join the Guides on one condition—that he was excused the degradation of the goose-step. Lumsden, however, insisted on His being taught the complete art of war, and finally had the satisfaction of seeing the most dreaded man on the frontier patiently balancing on one leg at his bidding.

About half his earliest recruits were men of this stamp. In training them he was indefatigable, and before long he had made them the finest native corps in India. For him they would go anywhere and do anything. At Sangao, the first action in which they were engaged, they displayed, among other qualities, their extraordinary power of getting over the ground.

When the Mutiny burst over India, the opportunity of the Guides came. Their fidelity never wavered, and in their march to Delhi they performed a feat which can never be forgotten. It was thus described by Major-General Sir Sydney Cotton in his address to the Peshawur force:—

Next to British soldiers the men who, in the hour of doubt and danger, stood highest in the public confidence, were the Guides. They were then cantoned at Murdan. Their commander, Captain Daly, received the order on the 13th May, marched that very evening, and reached Attok (thirty miles) next morning. It was soon seen that Delhi was the centre of the Mutiny, and to Delhi the Guides were ordered to push on. They did push on; they reached Delhi on the twenty-fourth day after leaving Murdan, three of which days they halted by order. The distance was 580 miles, or fifty-seven regular marches achieved in twenty-one, and during those twenty-one days they turned off their road twelve times, burnt three villages. No soldier can hear of such a march without admiration, and their "deeds of arms" were equal to their march.

All this time Lumsden, burning to be with his beloved Guides, was cooped up in Kandahar. With his brother (one of the authors of this book) and Dr. Bellew, he had been sent there on a political mission. The breaking out of the Mutiny rendered Lumsden's position most precarious. At the first rumour of a reverse to the British troops in India the whole population would have risen, and the lives of the members of the mission would have been sacrificed. For this reason it was considered impolitic to withdraw until some decided success had been gained. Lumsden was dependent for news upon letters from friends, chiefly from Herbert Edwardes, Commissioner at Peshawur. These letters occupy a considerable portion of the book, and, although they hardly belong to a life of Lumsden, they nevertheless give a very interesting picture of India during the Mutiny. As Lumsden was not recalled until some time after the fall of Delhi, he had little share in the real fighting. Partly for that reason, partly, no doubt, because of his dislike to push his own claims, he never received the high honours which he deserved. For five years he held the command of the Hyderabad Contingent, and when his term expired he returned to Europe, living for a time, on account of his wife's health, at various places on the Continent, and eventually succeeding to the family property in Aberdeenshire.

The authors have written a fascinating book, and every page has an interest of its own. It is well worthy to stand on the shelves beside such volumes as "Hodson of Hodson's Horse," and the lives of John Nicholson, Henry Lawrence, and other distinguished soldiers who have helped to make our Indian Empire.

Colonel H. B. Hanna, whose literary efforts have hitherto been confined chiefly to vigorous and rather acrimonious pamphlets, has attempted a work of real magnitude in THE SECOND AFGHAN WAR, 1878-79-80, the first volume of which (Constable, 10s. n.) carries him to the formation of the Multan, Kuram Valley, and Peshawar Valley Field Forces. Colonel Hanna brings to his task unmistakable earnestness, industry, and military experience, and a fluent and lucid style. But his avowedly controversial object—that of proving the iniquity of the so-called "forward policy," especially in relation to the treatment of Shere Ali by Lord Lytton—seriously discounts the contemporary value of his work. As an indictment, his "Second Afghan War" may convince some and confirm the half-formed views of others, but such bias as Colonel Hanna displays disqualifies the book from being accepted as a standard history of the campaign. If he had adhered to his original intention of producing a faithful record of events in which he himself bore an honourable part, the result would doubtless have proved more satisfactory. Apart from its one-sidedness the book contains much that is of real interest, and the amount of genuine information conveyed is remarkable. Colonel Hanna has had access to many papers not ordinarily available, and has done his collating and extracting exceedingly well. The slight prominence given to the operations on the Quetta side, in which Colonel Hanna himself took part, is excusable since it results in a bright narrative of the advance of Biddulph's force, as well as in some useful historical details concerning the great frontier fortress which now dominates Baluchistan.

Captain H. M. Bower's translation of Hoenig's INQUIRIES CONCERNING THE TACTICS OF THE FUTURE (Longmans, 15s. n.) is a just, if rather tardy, tribute to the merit of a very notable study in combined military history and criticism. Since the first publication of his book in 1881, under the title of "Two Brigades," Hoenig has been widely read on the Continent, and, since the appearance of the entirely re-modelled second edition of 1890, has not been without honour in our own Service. The translation is from the fourth edition (1893), and is meritorious if only by reason of the industry and self-effacement of the translator. From the tactical standpoint Hoenig is the enthusiastic prophet of psychology. Time after time he comes back from the discussion of what has actually been done to the necessity of morally educating a corps to do what ought to be done, and if not invariably convincing, he is always forcibly, and sometimes quite picturesquely, instructive.

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

In THE SOLITARY SUMMER (Macmillan, 6s.) the same Elizabeth who introduced the reader last summer to her German garden now spends with him a pleasant five months' holiday in the same retreat. The reader is, in fact, almost the only visitor whom the fastidious Elizabeth will allow to cross the threshold. To him she is a delightful hostess, with not only a knowledge of gardening, won by years of experience and occasional failure, but the gift of imparting it to the uninitiated in an unaffected style, free from technicalities, and with a touch of poetry. Here is a hint to gardeners on the proper combination of colours:—

How very much more charming different coloured tulips are together than tulips in one colour by itself! Last year, on the recommendation of sundry writers about gardens, I tried beds of scarlet tulips and forget-me-nots. They were pretty enough; but I wish those writers could see my beds of mixed tulips. I never saw anything so sweetly, delicately gay. The only ones I exclude are the rose-coloured ones; but scarlet, gold, delicate pink, and white are all there and the effect is infinitely enchanting. The forget-me-nots grow taller as the tulips go off, and will presently tenderly engulf them altogether and so hide the shame of their decay in their kindly little arms.

Despite her love for the garden, Elizabeth devotes a good deal of time to literature. In her reading she thinks that books, like flowers, only reveal their full beauties at the right time and place—unlike Mr. Arthur Waugh, who discussed this question the other day in our columns.

When I drive in the forests, Keats goes with me; and if I extend my drive to the Baltic shores, and spend the afternoon on the moss beneath the pines whose pink stems form the framework of the sea, I take Spenser; and presently the blue waves are the ripple of the Idle Lake, and a tiny white sail is Phædria's shallow ship, bearing Cymochles swiftly away to her drowsy little nest of delights.

The contrast between this Elizabeth and her husband, the "Man of Wrath," already drawn in "Elizabeth and her German Garden," is well kept up. Despite her plaintive entreaty, "Please, Man of Wrath, say something long for once," he is as laconic as ever. Elizabeth's idea of the value of a bad cook in keeping her husband in order will strike some wives as more original than prudent.

As long as I have her [the bad cook], my dear man, you will be comparatively thin and amiable. Poor Schmidt [another husband], as you call him, eats too much of those delicate savouries and then looks at his wife and wonders why he married her. Don't let me catch you doing that.

Equally diverting is Elizabeth's account of her visits to the stuffy little German cottages in her neighbourhood. The first thing is to ask the wife of the house what she has given the family for dinner; the next to admire the size and plumpness of the feather bed. "She who can pile them up nearest to the ceiling becomes," we are told, "the principal personage in the community."

This autobiography of a cultured and observant woman, full of enthusiasm for nature and with a shrewd sense of humour, is a fitting sequel to "Elizabeth and her German Garden."

THE NAVAL PIONEERS OF AUSTRALIA, by Louis Becke and Walter Jeffery (Murray, 7s. 6d.), is a batch of biographies of the eminent seamen whose names are associated with early Australian history—Dampier, Cook, Phillip, Bass, Flinders, Bligh, and some others; and the authors, by diligent use of the "Historical Records of New South Wales," have given popular form to a good deal of information that is not very accessible. Their work is of uneven merit, and the earlier chapters are somewhat disappointing. Their account of Cook, for instance, is not so satisfactory in many ways as Sir Walter Besant's, and we would rather read about Dampier in Mr. Clark Russell's monograph. The chapter about Admiral Phillip is also somewhat lacking in interest. In the later chapters, however, there is plenty to repay the reader's perseverance. The story of Flinders' long captivity in Mauritius is very well told, with copious extracts from the explorer's letters; and it is a story that is not well known. It is interesting, as an example of the cosmopolitan sympathies of men of learning, to find that, at the time of the battle of Trafalgar, Sir Joseph Banks was in correspondence with the members of the Institut de France, and was able to induce the literary men of Paris to exert their influence to obtain Flinders' release by special favour of the Emperor. Another well-told story is that of the mutiny of the Bounty. It has not, of course, the charm of unfamiliarity, but it seems to be told with more knowledge, and with more care in the weighing of evidence, by Messrs. Becke and Jeffery than by their predecessors. Their verdict is not very favourable to Captain Bligh, who was as unpopular in Sydney as he was on board his ill-fated vessel. They tell a story, which is new to us, to illustrate how high feeling ran upon the subject, and how long animosities endured.

Some years ago an accomplished young lady, well known and much respected in Norfolk Island, and one of the (two or three generations removed) descendants by one side of her family from the mutineers, visited England. This lady's husband, proud of his wife, took her to his home in a certain English county, where, in her honour, her husband's relatives had invited many friends, among them a dear old lady who they knew was a descendant of Bligh. "What an interesting meeting this will be!" thought they, not taking into account all the circumstances. The old lady and the young lady were duly introduced. "Dear me!" said the young lady, "and so you are the — (mentioning the relationship) of the tyrant Bligh!" "How dare you, the — (again emphasizing the relationship) descendant of a base mutineer, thus speak of a distinguished officer!" indignantly exclaimed the old lady. Which little anecdote shows how very emphatically there are two sides to this story.

The book is well worth reading. It is illustrated from old prints, many of them of an exceedingly interesting nature.

HIGHER LIFE FOR WORKING PEOPLE, by W. Walker Stephens (Longmans, 3s. 6d.), is a sober discussion of the measures which have been, or might be, proposed for the amelioration of the condition of the poorer classes. The usual arguments are offered in favour of an eight-hours working day, and in the last chapter there is a good deal of vague Malthusian talk, in which no dots are put on any of the i's. The author's remarks on the subject of old-age annuities are, however, worthy of consideration. He proposes that such a scheme should be voluntary, and that the principle of the tontine should be applied. There are difficulties in the proposal which he does not meet. The chief of these is that the employés in unhealthy industries, being fully aware of the fact that they are likely to die young, would probably object to entering tontines on equal terms with sailors, agricultural labourers, and others whom statistics show to be, as a rule, longer lived. The suggestion would have been more helpful if it had been supported by actuarial calculations. Will not some actuary take the trouble to work the figures out, and show us what sort of an annuity a man could buy, on the tontine system, for half a crown a month—payments to begin, say, at eighteen years of age, and the annuity to be claimable at any time after twenty years' payments have been made?

THE PROPHECIES OF THE BRAHAN SEER (Mackay, 2s. 6d.), by Alexander Mackenzie, F.S.A. It was certainly worth while to collect in one volume the prophecies of Coinneach Odhar Fiosachie, the Scotch seer of the seventeenth century, more familiarly known as Kenneth Mackenzie. As a mine of Scotch tradition, full of romantic incidents in the history of great Scottish families, and legends of the country side, the book is most welcome. But from the point of view of the Society for Psychical Research, it cannot be said that Mr. Mackenzie brings forward much convincing evidence in favour of Kenneth's powers. As Mr. Andrew Lang says in his somewhat sceptical introduction to the book, "we are dealing with poetical legend, not with evidence. . . . We can scarcely ever . . . find evidence that the prophecies were recorded before the event."

In Mr. H. M. Chadwick's study of THE CULT OF OTHIN (Clay, 2s. 6d.), the most important contribution to the subject is modestly placed in the notes at the end. The main part of the book is devoted to three questions. What were the chief characteristics of the cult in Scandinavia? How does it differ from the cult of Woden in Germany? What are the earliest traces of the cult in Scandinavia? The first essay introduces us to the familiar Othin, the Scandinavian God of War; the second only shows that after all there is very little difference worth bothering about between the Scandinavian and the Germanic cult. So far we have not made much progress. Othin, as the God of War presiding over Walhalla, the goal of the dying warrior, who, like the soldier of the Khalifa, willingly embraces death as the road to his God and to the wish-maidens, the houris of the north: Othin, the father of the Volsungs who fight with his invincible sword, the god with one eye, the god of magic and cunning, is familiar even to those who know him only in the poems of Wagner's music dramas. But for the Othin, as known only to scholars, such as Mr. Chadwick, we must turn to the notes. Here the God of War appears as also the "giver of poetry" and the dispenser of chattels, as shown by an amusing traditional dialogue between Othin and Thor. Another interesting discussion, also relegated to the notes, deals with the relation between the Othin legends and Christianity. The third essay, as to the date of the Scandinavian cult, would have rivalled the notes in interest had Mr. Chadwick shown the bearing of his conclusions upon the new theory that the cult of Othin is not indigenous in Scandinavia.

"Mr. Dooley" is a favourite with the English publishers. We hear of him appearing under all sorts of covers and at any price from 1d. upwards. Messrs. George Routledge issue him in a neat little volume at 1s. with an imaginary portrait on the cover, and also at 6d. in a paper wrapper. Mr. Grant Richards has already published several editions of his issue and now sends us an enlarged edition "by arrangement with the American publisher and the author." Like most of Mr. Richards' publications, MR. DOOLEY; IN PEACE AND WAR (2s. 6d.) is admirably bound and printed. It contains five new articles, and an excellent portrait of Mr. Finley Peter Dunne, the creator of the new Irish American wit. Here is Mr. Dooley on the author of "The White Man's Burden":—

"I think," said Mr. Dooley, "th' finest pothry in th' wurrudd is wrote be that frind iv young Hogan's, a man be th' name iv Roodyard Kipling. I see his pomes in th' pa-aper, Hinnessy; an' they're all right. They're all right, thin pomes. There was wan about scraggin' Danny Deever that done me a wurrudd iv good. They was a la-ad I wanst knew be th' name iv Deever, an' like as not he was th' same man. He owed me money. Thin there was wan that I see mintioned in th' war news wanst in a while—th' less we f-rget, th' more we raymimber."

Mr. Dooley's friend, Father Kelly, gives us a little parody of Mr. Kipling with a pleasing side thrust at the "Fenyan" and the "Anglo-Saxon 'liance":—

Whin he shows as 'seekin' frindship with paws that're thrust in thine,

That is th' time iv pearl, that is th' thruce iv th' line.
Collarless, coatless, hatless, askin' a dhrink at th' bar,
Me Uncle Mike, th' Fenyan, he tells it near an' far,
Over an' over th' story: "Beware iv th' gran' flim flam,
There is no thruce with Gazabo, th' line that looks like a lamb."

TRUE TALES OF TRAVEL AND ADVENTURE, by Harry de Windt (Chatto and Windus, 3s. 6d.), shows that truth is not only stranger but more entertaining than fiction, for these tales, so varied in scene and character, of curious and exciting experiences in all parts of the world, relieved by sketches of English life and of quiet country scenes, are far more readable than many of the volumes of "short stories" by professed novelists.

THE GERMAN FATHERLAND.

The most popular poem written by the patriotic poet E. M. Arndt was, from 1813 to 1870, his "Was ist das Deutsche Vaterland," which the late Arnold Ruge not inappropriately called the "Geographical Marseillaise." It is now generally assumed that the question of the poet found a practical answer in the last-named year. It was therefore a felicitous idea of Professor Joseph Kürschner, who is one of the most active littérateurs of modern Germany, to furnish a pictorial representation of his native country under the title of DAS IST DAS DEUTSCHE VATERLAND (Berlin: Hermann Hilgers Verlag, 10 marks). This magnificent volume contains well nigh 1,300 artistic illustrations of everything that is worth seeing in Germany, and the letterpress is far superior to that usually found in such publications.

Another patriotic German work is the portly volume which the distinguished editor of Meyer's "Konversations-Lexikon" has issued under the title of DEUTSCHER VOLKSTUM (German Nationality), an expression, by-the-by, coined by the Turnvater L. F. Jahn in 1810, in order to replace the loan-word Nationalität by a purely Teutonic term. Jahn it was who started the question Was ist Deutsch? and Dr. Hans Meyer here gives an answer to that comprehensive query. He has associated with himself a number of specialists who treat the subject from an historical, ethnological, geographical, and philological point of view, and describe the manifestations of the German geist in the field of political and literary history, of music, art, law, religion, and language. The book is published by the Bibliographisches Institut, and is beautifully got up, with copious illustrations of portraits, facsimiles, &c. The price is 15 marks.

GUIDE BOOKS.

A seventh edition reaches us, revised and augmented, of Baedeker's NORWAY, SWEDEN, AND DENMARK (Dulan, 10s.).

A timely little book which will serve as an historical guide to KENSINGTON PALACE comes from Messrs. Bell (2s. n.). Its author is Mr. Ernest Law, whose good work in connexion with the art treasures of the Royal Palace we have noticed more than once.

THE CYCLIST'S GUIDE TO THE ENGLISH LAKE DISTRICT, by A. W. Rumney (Philip, 2s. 6d. n.), is a handy book for the pocket. It contains twenty-one route maps, and a district map on durable pegamoid cloth, with a handy cardboard scale for the determination of distances.

HINTS AND NOTES FOR TRAVELLERS IN THE ALPS (Longmans, 3s. n.) is a reprint, with alterations and additions, of John Ball's general introduction to his "Alpine Guide," prepared, on behalf of the Alpine Club, by the Rev. W. A. B. Coolidge. The additions include an article on "Photography in the High Alps," by Mr. Sydney Spencer, and one on "Life in an Alpine Valley," by the editor. The latter, like all Mr. Coolidge's writings on Alpine subjects, is remarkable for its erudition. The use of the word "alp," for instance, in its sense of "a mountain pasture specially fitted for pasturing cows in milk," is traced back to 739; while the history of Grindelwald is sketched by Mr. Coolidge from the building of the church which took the place of the chapel of Saint Petronella in 1146. A complete history of Grindelwald is a book that should be written, and Mr. Coolidge, now that he has taken up his residence there, is emphatically the man to write it. No adequate work on the subject exists, and Gruner's "Die Eisgebirge des Schweizerlandes" (Bern, 1760), which deals with the subject, is not easily obtainable.

The Rev. L. E. Brooke, in his Lectures, now published, on THIS CHURCH AND REALM (Rivingtons, 2s. 6d.), gives a brief and plain exposition of the Ritualistic position on the Ornaments Rubric, the Eastward Position, Vestments, Incense, and Reservation, by way of defending his own practice. He wishes for proper episcopal courts with a final appeal to the collective episcopate—a programme which, of course, implies some reform in the election of Bishops.

Mr. E. Longworth Dames, the author of some nature studies collected under the title of THE EARTH LIFE (Redway, 5s.), has many fine thoughts, a keenly receptive mind, and an abundance of language—but he errs from the want of simplicity; and we fear few readers can stand much in this style:—

But now of these things it is in no wise to think or to realise that they have existed ever, save in a far vanished life which may be again at some period too indefinite for aught of consideration.

FIREMEN AND THEIR EXPLOITS, by F. M. Holmes (Partridge, 1s. 6d.), gives a description of certain famous conflagrations and also a popular account of the rise and development of fire brigades and the invention of appliances for extinguishing the flames and saving life at fires. It contains a very interesting chapter on the ingenious methods adopted by the fire brigades of New York.

OF THE MODERN ADAM, OR HOW THINGS ARE DONE, by Arthur W. A. Beckett (Hurst and Blackett, 3s. 6d.), containing hints and sketches relating chiefly to the lives of speakers, writers, and soldiers, mostly reprinted from Punch, we need only say that they are fairly representative of the humour provided for Punch's readers a generation ago, and will still amuse those who are not too clever to have lost their taste for it.

THE BRITISH EMPIRE DICTIONARY OF THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE (Newnes) is printed in large, clear type, and is cheap (3s. 6d.). It confines itself to words and their meanings, without giving phrases, or even compound words where their meaning is obvious, and avoiding the thorny paths of etymology. The editor is the Rev. E. D. Price, F.G.S.

MORISON'S CHRONICLE OF THE YEAR'S NEWS (Morison, Glasgow, 3s. 6d. n.) is a clearly and conveniently printed summary of each day's news during 1898, which is likely to be very useful. Its usefulness, of course, depends on its index, which, as far as we have tested it, is carefully compiled. Rather by way of emphasizing the necessity of duplicate entry than of impugning the completeness of the index, we must point out that after "Peers created" the reader will not find a reference to the page on which Lord Kitchener's peerage is recorded.

The new CATALOGUE OF THE FULHAM PUBLIC LIBRARIES is a great improvement on the old one, and is marvellously cheap at one shilling. A feature of it is what are called "analytic entries"—references, that is to say, to "parts of books or included articles," as, for example:—

MOUNT ATHOS. In Curzon (R). Visits to the monasteries of the Levant, 1897. Ill. maps. C.2436

This system must be useful, though it must involve a good deal of labour to the cataloguer.

The Rev. Robert Herbert Quick was a schoolmaster whom the Harrow boys gave rather a bad time, but who theorised luminously on educational subjects. Mr. F. Storr now gives us the LIFE AND REMAINS OF QUICK (Cambridge University Press, 7s. 6d.). It is well enough done, but the question whether it was worth doing still remains. The writings of a melancholy pedagogue with a taste for introspection are not things with which the world needs to be provided in great quantity. It certainly would have been kinder to Mr. Quick's memory to suppress his wailings over his inability to keep order in his form.

So much has been written about the Spanish-American War that it is hardly necessary to do more than chronicle the appearance of another book upon that subject. It is called HISTORY UP TO DATE (Allenson, 6s.), and is by Mr. William A. Johnston. The author is not always accurate on occasions when accuracy would strike a blow at patriotic pride. His statement, for example, that at Caney "the Seventy-First New York were in the thick of the fight" is not borne out by the statements of other eye-witnesses, or by the fact that various officers of that unfortunate regiment have been cashiered for hiding behind trees or taking other measures to get out of the line of fire. The book is illustrated with photographs—some good and some indifferent.

SPORT IN EAST CENTRAL AFRICA, by F. Vaughan Kirby (Rowland Ward, 8s. 6d. n.), is a book for sportsmen rather than for the community at large, as will be seen from this extract taken at random from the table of contents:—

The lioness returns—An exciting night—A counterfeit—Vultures—The lion found—A hyæna scare—Night adventure with a lion—Boxed up—Shift camp—Inyala antelopes—Lion round the camp—Impala—Out of form—Eland shooting—Troop of hyænas—A leopard shot—A man-eating lion—Trumpeter hornbills—Ingala hunting—A buffalo bull.

The extract is not exceptional but typical. From cover to cover the book abounds with palpitating actualities of this sort. Those who take an interest in big-game shooting will find it hard, if they once pick the book up, to lay it down unfinished; but the prose style is such that other people will, perhaps, find less difficulty in doing so.

Mr. E. E. Kellett and Mr. E. W. Naylor have done a good work in translating Dr. Oscar Bie's HISTORY OF THE PIANOFORTE AND PIANOFORTE PLAYERS (Dent, 12s. 6d.). In adapting this standard work in Germany to the needs of English readers they have wisely refrained from a too literal adherence to the text, and have here and there omitted passages, where the style of the German author seemed to them too philosophic for their purpose. Occasionally they have interpolated passages of their own, either in amplification of the author's meaning or in order to mention some player or composer for the pianoforte—such as Sterndale Bennett—omitted by the German writer but of special interest to Englishmen. The series of admirable illustrations of old instruments and of composers and performers from Orlando Gibbons to Moskowski, including the well-known cartoons of Beethoven and Liszt, give additional interest to this work of discreet adaptation.

ON THE HITHER BANK.

3rd JUNE, 1889.

[He wrote "The City of Dreadful Night."]

Shrouded Brother, lingering lonely by the grey and silent river, Twixt his ghostly paddles crouching, plies the grim old Shade no more?

Or, by many crossings harried, rests the Boatman of Forever
In the unresponsive Yonder, where the darkness hides the shore?
Wan, Rejected at the Ferry, what the freight that last went o'er?

I have heard no hovering echo of the drums in muffled throbbing,
Of the wailing of the pibroch, of the tramp of following feet,
Of the rattle of the volley, of the sorrowing trumpet's sobbing,
Of the strain that dogs the dead man down the banner-bordered street:

Ne'er a note of martial mourning, for a chief of soldiers meet!

Back beyond the belt of brightness, where the living fain would linger,

There was ne'er a wailful organ breathing dolour overhead;
Ne'er a Fugleman of Sorrow waving crowds with strenuous finger
To a masquerade of mourning for a spell of Glory sped,
For the Masterful and Mighty, lopped, and numbered with the dead!

Here, before the boat went over, was no wreck of bays that mingle

With the gold of honoured shrouding, strung and spun with bootless care;

There is nought of ravished purple on the bleak and ghastly shingle—

But a wreath at random woven from the trappings of Despair!
Musing tarrier for a passage, tell me of the last-won fare!

"Here was but the shroudless wreckage of a scorned and sorrowing rhymers,

Of the shunned and fameless chanter of an ever-peerless strain;
But the thousand-trampled remnant of a thrice-defeated climber,

But the phantom of a Prophet who had prophesied in vain
To the myrmidons of Mammon, in the market-place of Gain.

"But, behind the darkness yonder, there be minstrels many waiting;

There's a corner in their Throne-room for the Bard of sombre spell;

In the Chamber of the Shadow he shall find no lack of mating;
There's a whisper on the water—'tis the Boatman comes to tell
That the Countersign was spoken, and forever All is Well!"

GEO. BARTRAM.

THE WALKER OF THE DAWN.

Who is it stealeth, icy chill and grey,
With the first day-glimpse o'er the gloomy wold?
When the dim portals of the east unfold
Who is it comes, ere comes the nursling day,
Ere the young beams have time to speed away
And tell their tale of dawn, so often told—
Who is it creepeth like a phantom cold
Into the rooms where sleep should have its sway?

His name is hard to tell. With deadly chill
He lays his finger on the throbbing heart,
And lo, the coursing of its blood is still,
The eyelids close, the dry lips fall apart.
Day comes with bounding pulse, but it is seen
That here the Walker of the Dawn hath been.

ARTHUR L. SALMON.

Among my Books

AT ELY MINSTER.

III.

Miss Jennett Humphreys, in her most charming "Among my Books" gossip in your columns some weeks ago, wrote of Sir Thomas Cockayne's "Treatise of Hunting," and, in allusion to his quotation from the "Measures in Blowing" laid down by "Sir Tristram, one of King Arthur's knights," asked the pertinent question:—"Is it a fact that copies of Sir Tristram's book are really in existence?"
"Some library, somewhere," she thought, "may be in happy, if unknown, possession of a copy—it will be in a hunting district, on the shelves of some Tudor lodge, where the Tudor master was a kennel enthusiast—and how enjoyable it would be, if such a copy could be discovered, and if literary hands might be allowed to be laid upon it."
Well, I know not how many centuries old Miss Humphreys would wish her Book of Sir Tristram to be. Would she have us go back to that dim age, to "that island valley of the saints," when at Caerleon or at Glastonbury King Arthur held his mythic court? Or is she thinking of that later time when Geoffrey of Monmouth wrote his "History of the Britons" and told the story of Uther Pendragon and of King Arthur—and the land

Where mythic Uther's deeply wounded son

In some fair space of sloping greens

Lies, dozing in the vale of Avalon,

And watched by weeping queens—or of that still later day when, in 1155, the metrical version of Geoffrey's History was rewritten in Norman French by Robert Wace, and called the "Roman de Brut"? I fear she will find no Sir Tristram there, for Robert himself tells us naively enough that, when in search of the Arthurian wonders told of by Breton trouvères he went to seek for them in the forest of Brecheliand, his search ended in mere vain folly:—

Là alai—jo merveilles querre

Vis la forest e vis la terre;

Merveilles quis, mais ne's trovai;

Fol m'en revins, fol i alai.

Fol i alai, fol m'en revins,

Folie quis, por fol me tins.

Or, perhaps, she pictures some old illuminated manuscript of late thirteenth or early fourteenth century, with knight and lady, hound at foot and hawk on wrist, "in quaint devices deftly blazoned" in large initial letter or bordered margin, wrought in some old scriptorium of the convent where my Lord the Prior had St. Hubert for his favourite saint? Alas! I fear she will never see that book. Too few memorials of the gentle leisure of that pleasant time in those haunts of ancient peace remain. They have been washed into forgetfulness by the silent stream of time:—

Rura quæ Liris quiescit

Mordet aqua taciturnus amnis.

But if Miss Humphreys is satisfied, as I half guess she may be, with Tudor times, and the new black-letter printing of Caxton or Wynkyn de Worde, or William Coplande, at one or other of their presses, at the Signet the Sun, or of the Rose Garland, or in the Vintre at the Three Cranes Wharfe, then she may surely have her wish. But it will be in no hunting district, in no Tudor lodge, where enthusiastic Tudor masters kennelled hounds, but at 15, Piccadilly, on the shelves of Bernard Quaritch—he catalogued it in 1897, under the title of "The Book of St. Albans," printed in 1486, sold at the Duke of Roxburghe's sale for £147, and "since made perfect at enormous expense by the late Earl of Ashburnham, now offered for £500"—or on the shelves of the University Library at Cambridge, in a similar edition to the Roxburghe one, or here in a somewhat later edition in this Old World Library at Ely Minster.

For behind a little locked and latticed wicket, embedded among shelves, which groan beneath the weight of mighty folios of ancient fathers and medieval doctors of theology, rests a copy of the book she longs to see. It came to us by private gift of one of our canons, from the library of Mr. Haslewood, who published a modern reprint in 1810. In a printed bibliographical note pasted into the cover Mr. Haslewood says:—"This I consider the earliest edition of the Book of Sir Tristram known." It is catalogued thus:—

Lattice. Book of Sir Tristram. The Book of hawking, huntynge and fysshynge, wyth all the properties and medecynes that are necessary to be kepte.

It is a small quarto of 94 pages, divided into three parts. Each part begins with a page containing title and rough wood engraving, and ends with the words—"Imprinted at London in Saynt Martyns Paryshe in the Vinetre upon the Thre Crane Wharfe by Wyllyam Coplande."

The first part on Hawking and the third on Fishing are in prose, but the second part on Hunting, unlike the treatise of Sir Thomas Cockayne of which Miss Humphreys wrote, is in verse. This second part begins thus:—

Lykewyse as in the booke of Hawkyng a foresayde are written and noted the termes of pleasure belongyng to gentylme havynge a delyght therein. In the same maner this booke folowynge sheweth to such gentyll persons the maner of Huntynge for all maner of beastes whether they be beastes of venery or chase of rascall, and also it sheweth al termes convenyent, aswel of the houndes as of ye beastes aforesayd, and there be many dyvers of them, as is declared in the books folowyng.

¶ Beastes of venery are iii. kindes.

Wheresoever ye fare by frith or by fell
My dere childe take hede how trysta [i.e., Sir Tristram] doth you tel
Howe many maner beastes of venery there were.
Lysten to your dame, and she shall you lere
Foure maner of beastes of venery there are
The fyrst of them is the hart, the second is the hare
The Bore is of one of tho, the wolfe and not one more.

¶ Beastes of the chase are v. kyndes.

And where ye come in playne or place
I shall you tell which ben beastes of enchase.
One of them is the Bucke, an other is the doe
The Fox and the Martynon, and the wylde Roe.
And ye shall all my dere chyldre other beastes all
Where to you them fynde, rascall ye shall them call
In fryth or in fell, or in the forest I you tell.

The last few pages after the inscription "Explicit Dame Julia Barnes her Boke of Huntynge"—and the story of that good lady's birth and genealogy, full of such good "hunting" of another sort for Bookmen, though it should be noted, is too long and intricate to linger over now—are filled up with various scraps of knowledge and useful information, as, for example, the properties of a good horse and the order of precedence of the Bishops. As to the horse, our Dame asserts that "a good horse should have xv. properties and condicions. That is, to wete, three of a man, three of a woman, three of a foxe, three of a hare, and three of an asse."

Then follow various wise saws, of which these may be quoted:—

Who that maketh in Christmas a dog to his larder,
And in Marche a sowe to his gardynar,
And in May a foole of a wyse man's counsell,
He shall never have good larder, fayre garden, nor yet well kept counsell.

Again,

Who that buyldeth his house all of salowes,
And prycketh a blynde horse over the falowes,
And suffereth his wyfe to seke many halowes,
God send hym the blisse of everlasting galowes.

Two double columned pages follow containing the list of "the Companyes of beastes and foules." At first I thought I had read the initial letter of this last word wrongly, and that for "fowls" I ought to have read "souls." But no! "a muster of peacocks," "an exalting of larks," "a cherme of goldfinches," "a chattering of choughs," "a gaggle of geese," "a cast of hawks," "a covy of partiryches," "a fall of woodcocks," cannot be intended as a characterization or classification of human souls, and yet the list includes "a cluster of churles," "a rag of maydens," "a gagle of women," and ends—it is very strange—with "a charge of curates," "a discrecion of preestes," "a disworshypp of Scottes."

And so with "The Measures of Blowing," much as Miss Humphreys has them in her book—there is pasted into the volume a MS. page, in writing of Elizabeth's time, giving "the Measures" in a quaint musical notation of dotted semi-circles and squares—the Book of Hunting ends. My space is gone, otherwise there is much good quoting and gossip I should like to have made from the Book of Hawking, and the Treatise of Fysshynge with an Angle. But to these perhaps I may return at another time, as to others, which may show that the Book of Sir Tristram keeps good company behind the little lattice, such as, for example, the famous "History of the Seven Champions of Christendom"; William Caxton's "Fructus Temporum," with the "Chronicles of Englonde"; John Milton's autograph copy of Chrysostom's Sermons; two Love Letters of Bishop Patrick, and not a few more. To the mathematical Preface of John Dee in his 1570 edition of Euclid I must some day return, and, indeed, for the present I know not how I can end better than with his farewell to his readers:—

So I commit you unto God's merciful direction for the rest; heartily beseeching him to prosper your Studies, and honest Intent: to his Glory, and the Commodity of our Country.
Amen.

CHARLES W. STUBBS.

Deanery, Ely, May, 1899.

AT THE PLAY IN OLD GENEVA.

[BY FRANCIS GRIBBLE.]

It may not be generally known that amateur theatricals were the favourite amusement at Geneva in the happy days before Calvin came to the city and decreed that all the citizens should pretend to be as pious as he himself actually was. The fact, however, leaps to the eyes of those who have occasion to pry into the old records. "The Council," we read in one official document, "exhorted certain councillors and two others to get up some good historical plays;" and a little further on we read that the actors in the said historical plays had six florins of the public money divided among them for their trouble; and as we turn over the pages of the registers of the Council, we find similar entries continually reappearing. No public ceremony, we gather, was complete without a dramatic entertainment. In particular, there was always a dramatic entertainment when the Duke of Savoy visited the town, which, at that period, owed him a certain shadowy and ill-defined allegiance. Let us try to draw the picture of the performances of 1523, when the Duke arrived in state with his newly-wedded wife, Beatrice of Portugal. An old diary which certain industrious Genevan antiquaries have rescued from oblivion enables us to do so with some approach to accuracy.

When the citizens heard that the Duke was coming, they first got up a subscription in order to make a present to their Bishop. It is recorded that the oblations consisted of "half-a-dozen plates, half-a-dozen porridge basins, a dozen wax candles, and an equal number of boxes of sweetmeats." But let that pass. It may be interesting, but it is irrelevant. The reception to which these useful gifts were the preface demands our attention more imperiously. It proceeded, we shall see, on the theory nowadays so doughtily championed by Sir Walter Besant, that, on the occasion of a public pageant, the representatives of art and letters are entitled to the leading rôles. In this way:—

At the bridge over the Arve, four mounted Syndics met the Duchess and escorted her towards the city, holding a white silk canopy over her head. At Plainpalais, a further deputation of the leading citizens awaited the cortège. Their leader, Jean Philippe, attired in a magnificent silk suit with silver facings—for which he had paid fifty crowns—delivered an address of welcome in indifferent French verse, which may be thus rendered into English verse of corresponding quality:—

O Lady fair, of high renown,
We bid you welcome to the town;
Marshalled in orderly array,
We hope you will be pleased to-day.
For all of us desire to be
Your humble servants, as you see.
We'd serve you, since we know your worth,
Sooner than any Queen on earth.

That was all. The reciter had finished, and the cortège passed on. It had not got far before it met a deputation of the leading ladies of Geneva. There were 300 of them, and they all wore their most glorious apparel—lace caps with gold fastenings, gowns of brocaded satin bordered with velvet, and white shoes with bright silver buckles. They, too, had their leader, who delivered a poetical address: and, indeed, poetical addresses were the order of the day. At the Porte de la Corratierie, at the Chapelle de Notre Dame du Pont, at the corner of almost every street, a fresh poet—usually attired in some allegorical costume—awaited the arrival of the distinguished visitor. There was a Sybil, there was a Lady of Renown, there was an Apollo with a train of Muses; and each of these masqueraders in turn expressed his or her sentiments in verse. The procession stopped and attended to every one of them, the formula "taken as read" not having been invented in those early times.

These recitations, however, were only, so to say, the hors d'œuvre of the intellectual feast. The pièce de résistance was the play—a mystery play depicting certain notable episodes in the career of the Roman Emperor Constantine. It was in six acts, and the peculiarity of it was that each act was given on a separate stage; the noble spectators moving on from one open-air theatre to the next during the entr'acte. But the acts were short, and the plot of the play can easily be summarized. As the first act consists of twelve lines only, we may venture to give it at full length. The characters are Constantine, his mother, Saint Helena, and an angel, and it runs thus:—

SAINT HELENA. Jesus, who on the cross wast slain,
May thy sad death be our great gain,
And help my darling son to smite
The Persian King whom he must fight.

Enter Angel, carrying a cross.

ANGEL. Rise, Constantine! No longer now
Will God this Persian's pride allow.
He marks thy mother on her knees
Wherefore In hoc signo vinces.

(Gives him the cross.)

SAINT HELENA. My son, no longer here abide!
Go forth, and in the cross confide!

CONSTANTINE. The King of Persia I will soon run through.
Mother, farewell!

SAINT HELENA. My gentle son, adieu!

CURTAIN.

We pass on. The second act, contains no dialogue, but only action; Constantine engages in mortal combat with the King of Persia and slays him. In the third act, he describes his Christian exploit to his mother. In Act IV., the scene shifts to Jerusalem. Constantine calls upon the Jews to identify the true cross for him; they refuse and are imprisoned for contumacy. In Act V., Constantine distinguishes the true cross from two others by the fact that it enables him to restore a dead man to life; and in Act VI. Constantine and his mother kneel at the foot of the true cross, engaged in prayer.

Such was one of the kinds of dramatic entertainment that flourished in old Geneva. Another more popular variety was what was known as the Sottie—a species of satire in form of allegory on the topics of the day. Two such Sotties have been preserved and reprinted in a collection of bibliographical rarities. The one on which we will fix our attention was given at Geneva in 1524. It was organized without reference to either Duke or Bishop, for no higher purpose than the amusement of the citizens by the citizens. The leading character was a certain Père Bontemps, who personified what we should call the "Good time coming"; and its historical importance lies in the fact that it expressed the sentiments of the Reformers more than ten years before the Reformation reached Geneva. Modern Puritans who denounce the stage may, therefore, be invited to observe that it was by means of stage plays that Geneva—that stronghold of Puritanism—first effectively expressed its passionate desire for the removal of Papist abuses. The salient passages are contained in the following scrap of dialogue between the Physician and the World:—

PHYSICIAN. So that is what disturbs your mind?
And you are not disturbed to find Church benefices bought and sold
By needy thieves in quest of gold?
A baby on his mother's knee
Appointed to a Bishop's see?
While haughty prelates, as they please,
The goods of any neighbour seize,
And go to war on small pretext—
Whereby all Christian men are vexed.

THE WORLD. From Luther's land these plaints arise;
We're told they are a pack of lies.

PHYSICIAN. Whatever the abuse you ban
They call you, now, a Lutheran.

And so forth. The Sottie was short but pungent; and as it was given in the week of the fair, we may take it that it was well attended and made a considerable impression. But the Duke and Duchess of Savoy, though they were in the town at the time, did not go to see it. The MS. of the Sottie contains a note to the effect that "no seats were retained for them and they were not invited." As they were strenuous upholders of the authority of the Bishop of Rome, it was, perhaps, just as well, in the interest of peace and harmony, that they stayed away.

Notes.

The next number of Literature will contain an original story by Mr. E. F. Benson, entitled "Consequences."

Our readers will see that a controversy is raging in another column on the subject of illicit commissions in the publishing trade. A further pronouncement on the matter is contained in an interview with Sir Walter Besant which appeared in Tuesday's Daily Chronicle. "Now do you think," asked the interviewer, "that the Act proposed by Lord Russell of Killowen in reference to secret commissions can have any bearing upon the relations between authors and publishers?" "We complain," Sir Walter replied, "and always shall complain, of secret profits. They still exist." This means, if it means anything at all, that Sir Walter Besant can help Mr. John Murray where the Lord Chief Justice could not help him, and would be able, if Mr. Murray should address to him the same request which he addressed to the Lord Chief Justice, to furnish "such further particulars as would enable the council of our association to investigate the case." We hope that Mr. Murray will do so, for the matter is one which, in the interest both of publishers and authors, should be sifted carefully.

The death of Don Emilio Castelar has called forth many long obituary notices, but, while full justice has been done to his merits as a politician, hardly any of his biographers have recognized the fact that he was a man of letters. He was, however, a very voluminous writer. His works are of very various character and are spread over a long period of time. His first book was a novel, and appeared as long ago as 1855, the title being "Ernesto. Novela Original de Costumbres;" it was followed, in 1856, by "La Hermana de la caridad, leyenda popular." His last book, which appeared as recently as 1892, was a history, "Historia de Descubrimiento de America." During the thirty-six years which represent the period of his literary productivity, his pen was seldom idle. He figures as a classical scholar in "Lucano, su Vida, su Jenio, su Poema," 1857; as a pamphleteer in "Questiones politicas y sociales," 1870; as a biographer in "Vida de Byron," 1873; as an essayist in "Perfilar de personajes y bocetas de ideas," 1875; and as an historian in "Cronica de la Guerra de Africa," 1869, in "Estudios historicos sobre la edad media," 1875, and in "Historia del movimiento republicano in Europa," 1876. In addition to being a man of letters, Castelar was a journalist of distinction. He was editor of the Tribune, a contributor to La Discusione, founded by Rivero, and in 1864 he himself founded La Democracia, in the pages of which he wrote articles tinged with a theological mysticism which gave great offence to his Radical friends. He was at one time professor of history and philosophy at the Madrid University.

"Surely (writes a correspondent) Mr. Lionel Tollemache, and Mr. Justin McCarthy are somewhat inordinately scandalized by what the former calls Charles Kingsley's 'appalling statement,' with reference to 'suspending the inevitable action of the laws of gravity.' Are they not charging him with a monstrous and ridiculous paradox when he was really guilty of nothing worse than that very common inaccuracy of language which confounds 'a force' with the 'law' of its operation. To talk of suspending 'the action of the laws of gravity' is, of course, nonsense; it is indeed nonsense, or nearly so, to talk of the 'action' of a formula—a thing possessing, not motive energy, but simply mental validity. The 'force of gravitation' is the power of attraction exercised upon each other by all material bodies; the 'law of gravitation' is the general proposition that all such bodies 'attract each other with a power varying inversely as the square of their distance from each other.' To 'suspend the action' of this law would mean—so far as the phrase has any meaning—to bring about a state of things in which bodies would either cease to attract one another at all, or would do so with a force varying otherwise than according to the inverse square of the distance. Whether it would be more 'appalling' to assert the possibility of this than, for instance, to maintain the flatness of the earth, I do not know; but it would, at least, be equally absurd; and if it were conceivable that this is what Kingsley meant he would undoubtedly have reduced himself to the intellectual level of the earth flatteners at once."

"But is it conceivable that he meant any such thing? Is it not certain that when he talked of suspending the 'action of the laws of gravity' he really meant the 'effective operation of the force of gravitation'—the suspension of which is, of course, a phenomenon occurring every moment of our lives? That the argument of the Professor of History was inconclusive and his illustration puerile, I am not concerned to deny, but the drift of the one and the significance of the other seem to me perfectly plain. 'Do not,' he says in effect to the Necessitarian, 'do not talk of man being the helpless instrument of blind external forces in the moral world, when we see that the one form of cosmic energy, the universality and apparent omnipotence of which is the most constantly impressed upon us, is capable of being made of none effect by an exercise of the human will acting through the human muscles.' You may take the analogy for what it is worth, which, no doubt, is mighty little; but can there be any doubt that that was the analogy which Kingsley had in his mind? If his scientific hearers were scandalized, they too, or some of them—since such errors in thinking are possible even to the scientific—must have confounded 'force' with 'law.' For they could not have forgotten that, if the force in question ceased for an instant to be capable of such 'suspension' as is implied in deflection of its line of action, the inhabitants of this and the other planets of the solar system would be reposing in the bosom of the sun within a space of time which I leave you, Sir, to calculate exactly, but which on the most liberal computation would be inconveniently short."

The Rev. W. H. Fitchett, who is now in England, is one of the best known among Australian writers proper—that is, those who live and work in Australia. London has paid him due honour, and, what is more interesting, Canada has recognized the claims of an Imperial literature, and the University of Toronto has given him an honorary LL.D. degree. Mr. Fitchett became known in England under the nom de guerre of "Vedette," for his books on "Deeds that Won the Empire" and "Fights for the Flag." He is the principal of the Methodist Ladies' Training College at Melbourne, and edits a weekly paper, The Southern Cross, and also the Australasian Review of Reviews.

The chief living Australian poets, about whose work we said something the other day, are less personally known in England. Mr. A. B. Paterson ("Banjo") is a native of New South Wales, the son of a Scotch squatter. He is a solitor in good practice in Sydney, and was a leading amateur steeplechaser until he sold his horses a year or so ago. Mr. Henry Lawson was brought up on a selection in the Mudgee District. Both know the Bush equally well, but they look at it from different points of view. Paterson belongs to the class that rides, Lawson to that which walks—or "swags" it. It is remarkable that, while Paterson's verses are as "horsey" as Gordon's, Lawson never refers to the horse in either of his books.

Mrs. Cross (better known as Ada Cambridge), another Australian writer well known in England, is the wife of a Church of England clergyman at Williamstown, a suburb of Melbourne. The cares of a large family allow her scanty time for writing, but she devotes a couple of hours three or four times a week to make the story she may have in hand move on a little. She will probably visit England before long to renew acquaintances made some twenty years ago. Ethel Turner is now Mrs. Curlew, and lives in one of the pleasant suburbs of Sydney.

Lady Randolph Churchill's intention of binding each separate issue of the Anglo-Saxon in leather in a distinct style is a further inroad on the plan, already almost forgotten, of binding certain sets of books in a similar style. In old-fashioned libraries, especially those formed early in the century, it was an unwritten law that particular classes of bindings should be reserved for particular sets of books. There was one colour for history and philosophy, another for poetry, another for theology, and so on. The shelves of such libraries have a solid and rich appearance, and collections formed on this plan have about them that air of dignified repose which distinguishes a library from a mere room full of books.

There is, however, a prevalent idea that each book should have an individuality, a character of its own, and even flaming varieties of colour in a library are not now looked upon as heresies. The English method of publishing has not always been favourable to this individualistic practice, or, at least, not to the same extent as in France, where the plan of issuing the finest of books in paper covers has always done much towards inducing purchasers to cultivate any personal whims they may have in reference to bindings. In short, Dibdin's sarcastic gibes at people who have "patchy" libraries would now be meaningless, for, in a modern collection, questions of uniformity in effect have no place whatever. There is hardly anything more untidy to be seen than the shelves of a collector of to-day, where paper and cloth covers, grey boards, and even broken-backed books stand side by side with elaborate tooled moroccos and "full gilt" backs. But many considerations have now to be taken into account which were not of importance in the days of the worthy Dibdin, and the owner of a Kilmarnock "Burns" or a "Pauline," "in boards as issued," would be most unwise to change their covers for the finest work of the book-binder.

A correspondent writes :—

The quotations made by your reviewer from "Cambridge Compositions" remind me of an amusing jeu d'esprit perpetrated by an Oxford scholar two generations ago (Mr. Massey, of Wadham), which I have not seen included in any similar collection. Mr. Massey, who had an extraordinary faculty for running off Latin verses, was challenged by a friend with the following letter which he happened to have just received :—

"Rev. Sir,—You are requested to attend a Meeting of the Bridge Committee on Saturday, Nov. 9, at 12 o'clock, to consider Mr. Deffle's proposal for laying down gaspipes.

"We are, Rev. Sir, yours faithfully,
"SMITH & SONS, Clerks."

Mr. Massey took very little time in producing the following version :—

Concilio pontis cui tradita cura tuendi
Ut bonus interis posceris ; ipse veni.
Nam quarto nonas concurrunt ante Novembres,
Saturni medium sole tenente diem.
Quarendum an prosit, causam Deflete ferente,
Ponere quos tenuis permeet aura, tubos.
Hanc scribe mittunt Fabri, natiq̃ue paterque,
Qui summe, pastor, te, reverende, colunt.

The West Ham Town Council have decided, in view of the difficulty many inhabitants may experience of visiting the libraries on working days, to open the Reference Libraries and News Rooms on Sundays from 3 to 9 p.m. The experiment deserves success. The labour involved in opening a reading room on Sunday is probably less than that involved in opening a church ; and West Ham, with its large working-class population, is a part of the town in which, more particularly on wet days, the advantages of the new departure should be appreciated.

Some interesting statistics are included in the annual report of the public libraries of St. George, Hanover-square. Among other things, of the books borrowed in the course of the year 51·83 per cent. were novels, and 39 per cent. fell under the heading of philosophy. The occupations of the borrowers are also scheduled, so that one can draw inferences as to the ways of earning a living that are most conducive to literary tastes.

Clerks win easily with a score of 344 : the next class of littérateurs is domestic servants, with 231 (we wonder which of these monopolized the philosophy) ; then follow scholars, 145 ; students (it is not explained how students differ from scholars), 73 ; dressmakers, 71 ; assistants (shop and other), 59 ; civil servants, 35 ; tailors, 35 ; musicians, 34 ; mechanical engineers, 26 ; lodging-house keepers, 25 ; and grocers, 20. Several classes of the community were represented only by a single reader. Their pursuits are very miscellaneous—bank managers, brewers, Church workers, Consuls, firemen, golf club makers, members of Parliament, lavatory attendants, park-keepers, turncooks, window cleaners, and detectives. It is not mentioned whether the solitary detective tried to monopolize Sherlock Holmes.

A copy of a rare and interesting black letter book, printed by Seres in 1563, occurs in the last published catalogue of Messrs. Meehan, of Bath. This is "The Burnynge of Paules Church in London in the yeare of oure Lord 1561." This little tract formed the substance of a sermon preached by Pilkington, the first Protestant Bishop of Durham, and led up to a most violent religious controversy. Some half-dozen small books include all that Pilkington ever published, and these are now seldom met with. Besides being one of the foremost Churchmen of his time, he had a large share in settling the Book of Common Prayer and the Thirty-nine Articles, he actively supported the new social movement in England, and he also procured a charter of incorporation for the citizens of Durham.

American Letter.

ARMS AND THE MEN.

At the opening of our Civil War the veteran general first in charge of the Union armies, who has passed into apostrophe as "Great Scott !" and is so invoked among Anglo-Saxons wholly ignorant of his victorious part in our last war with England, was tormented into unwonted humour by the animosities of the journalists and ministers on both sides. "If this war is ever fought through," he said, "the trouble will be to pacify the non-combatants." Some such difficulty is now upon us as a legacy of the late hostilities with Spain. In point of actual fighting it was not one of the big wars. There was one land battle which, in its losses, was of a very minor measure ; and there were two sea fights, in one of which the Americans lost a man by heart-failure, and in another had a number of casualties scarcely mounting beyond the digital figures. The losses of the Spaniards, though far greater, were well within the first thousands. We beat them easily, but we beat them thoroughly ; our soldiers showed as great courage as if the Spaniards had been hard to beat.

But if the bloodshed in the struggle was small, the inkshed has been simply enormous. It began long before the first shot was fired, and by direction of the infuriate non-combatants it has continued to this moment with unabated horrors, and with the menace of worse and worse things. The outpouring no longer deluges the newspapers, because these must really give the news, and the murders and the divorces must have their chance. But the spirit of war seems to have obsessed our periodical literature, and there seems no present hope of release from it. The hostilities began just one year ago ; in two months they stopped, and peace was practically made between the nations. But still troops of heroes of all shapes and sizes are writing themselves up or being written up with tireless activity in the magazines. I have had the curiosity to look over the periodicals for last month to the number of eighteen or twenty, and I have found only four or five which apparently made no mention of the war, but no doubt if I had looked more carefully I should have found some shadow of battle in these. In thirteen others an inexhaustive search developed thirty-three papers relating to the recent hostilities, of a variety ranging from sober history and criticism through the personal narratives of the combatants, high and low, down to the biographies of the witnesses of the fighting. Never, apparently, did war sit so often for its picture in art as well as in literature; for all the records have been accompanied by the utmost profusion of illustration. We have had its frightful visage in profile, in three-quarters, in full face; its Moloch-form sitting and standing and lying, in half-length and in whole-length. The generals and admirals have been represented in thousands of portraits, and the different types of soldiers, rough riding and smooth riding, volunteer and regular, sea and land, black and white, no less. These have told their several stories; the correspondents who saw them fighting have told their stories, and the photographers who snap-shotted the correspondents have, for all I know, turned their cameras upon themselves and will yet give us a luminous conception of how the men looked who kodaked the men who saw the men who fought the fight.

There is no question of the courage or the soldiership or the seamanship of our army and navy; there is no doubt but our generals and admirals and men of all arms and ranks could have brought a great war to a victorious finish as valiantly and skillfully as they have fought one of the smallest wars known to history—perhaps the very smallest war ever waged between nations. The question is of the proportion of the inkshed to the bloodshed; and while one must rejoice that the inkshed is incomparably the greater, one creeps a little with the thought of the laughter which the spectacle must be moving in a wicked world beyond seas. One cannot help being afraid that even in England, the home of our well-wishers, the hand which is not employed in patting us on the back is used in masking a smile at the prodigious literature which our brief warlike experiment has inspired. Is it possible that in London there are people who laugh outright, in spite of themselves, at a nation in such inextinguishable histories or hysterics? Are there some there who ask themselves with a shudder what would now be happening in the American periodicals if we had had eight or ten large battles with the Spaniards instead of two or three, which, as mortality lists go, were little ones? It was well enough to beat the Spaniards, but why avenge them afterward before that blood-stained old Europe, whose least war dwarfs our contest with Spain to a skirmish? We have had a great war of our own, a war which Europe looked on with awe; battles that raged for a week; slaughters that left the field strewn with tens of thousands of massacred and mutilated men, and made widows and orphans by scores of thousands; victories whose sum was the liberation of eight millions of slaves. In the present inkshed, in the literature poured out and still pouring out in renown of the Spanish walk-over, the tremendous memories of that struggle are well-nigh lost; and it is doubtful if the Civil War could now get a hearing in our periodicals. But if there are readers willing to contrast the four years' war for freedom with the two months' war for humanity, they can learn something of their difference in Mr. John Rope's "Story of the Civil War," where the tale of its gigantic battles is told with a quiet impressiveness, which loses, of course, beside the personal celebrations of the recent hostilities, and yet is of a quality that somehow consoles. It is true there is a growing belief that our public is wearying even of the Spanish-war literature; that readers already glance at the pictures in the war articles and fling the literature away; but in the meantime it superabounds, with whatever effect it may have upon the minds and the morals of the younger generation. Perhaps this may be somewhat counteracted by the publication of the volunteers' letters home from the Philippines, which are now finding their way into print with stories of carnage well calculated to turn the stoutest stomachs.

The psychological situation is, however, very curious, and ought to be peculiarly interesting to any student of human nature. In one short year the most peaceful nation in the world has been transformed into the most bellicose, with an insatiable appetite for stories of "war, loud war, by land and by sea, war with a thousand battles, and shaking a hundred thrones," or in default of that, war with three battles and at least one trembling throne. But possibly this is largely a part of that strange appearance produced by the outbreak of the hostilities. Up to the firing of the first shot across the bows of a Spanish merchantman in the war for humanity, one found with difficulty among one's acquaintance any who desired the war. After that scarcely a voice was raised against it. We may still be under the spell that then bound us, and may be suffering rather than enjoying our war literature.

AN OPPORTUNITY FOR AMERICAN FICTION.

SECOND PAPER.

Mr. Thorstein Veblen does not evolve his Theory of a Leisure Class from his knowledge of that class in America alone. Until very lately we had no such class, and we rather longed for it. We thought it would edify us, or, if not that, at least ornament us; but now that we have got it, on certain terms, we can hardly be sure that it does either. The good things that we expected of it have not come to pass, and perhaps it is too soon; but in Mr. Veblen's analysis our leisure class does not seem essentially different from any of the older aristocracies, which seem not to have brought to pass the good things expected of them and often attributed to them. As with these, "pecuniary emulation" and "conspicuous leisure" are the first evidences of its superiority, and "conspicuous consumption," direct or delegated in the splendid appraising and housing of its women and its dependents, is one of the gross means of striking the popular imagination. The "pecuniary standard of living" is really the only standard, and the "pecuniary canons of taste" are finally the only canons; for if the costly things are not always beautiful, all beautiful things which are cheap must be rejected because they are not costly. "Dress as an expression of pecuniary culture" is left in our day mostly to women by the leisure class; but the men of that class share in it at least as fully as in the "devout observances" and "the higher learning." Both sexes in our leisure class, as in the European aristocracies, are distinguished by the love of sport, in which they prolong their own childhood and the childhood of the race, and they are about equally devoted to the opera and the fine arts, as these minister to their magnificence. It would be hard, in fact, to draw the line between our leisure class and any aristocracy in the traits of piety, predacity, courage, prowess, charity, luxury, conservatism, authority, and the other virtues and vices which have characterized the patricians in all times. The most notable difference, and the difference which would most invite the study of the novelist, is that hitherto our leisure class has had no political standing. It has had no place in the civic mechanism; but we seem to be at the moment when this is beginning to be less apparently so. It is idle to suppose, because the leisure class, which with us is the moneyed class, does not hold public offices, that it does not control public affairs; and possibly it has always controlled them more than we have imagined. The present proof is in the fact that the industrial classes, with all the means of power in their hands, are really powerless in any contest with a group of rich men: it is almost impossible for the people to baulk the purpose of such a group; to undo what money has done has been so impossible, with all the apparatus of the elections, the Legislatures, the Courts, that there is hardly yet an instance of the kind in our history.

All this, however, makes the situation the more attractive to a novelist of imaginative force. This is the most dramatic moment, the most psychological moment which has ever offered itself to fiction; this is the supreme opportunity of the American novelist. Hitherto our politics have repelled the artist by their want of social complexity, by their rude simplicity, as a fight between parties. But if he can look at the situation from the point of view suggested, as an inevitable result from the nature of the class which Mr. Veblen has studied, I believe he will find it full of charm. If he is psychologist enough he will be fascinated by the operation of the silent forces which are, almost unconsciously, working out the permanency of a leisure class, and preparing for it in our own circumstance the ultimatum it now seeks elsewhere. But I should be content, if he would portray the life of our leisure class without an eye to such implications, with an eye merely to its superficial facts. If he did this he would appeal to the widest general interests in our reading public. Our appetite for everything that relates to the life removed from the life of work, from the simple Republican ideal, is almost insatiable. It strives to satisfy itself, in plays and romances, with the doings of princes and nobles in realms as surely fictitious as Lilliput and Brobdignag; it gluts itself, in the newspapers, with fables almost as gross as Gulliver's concerning the social affairs of our leisure class. Seen truly and reproduced faithfully, these would be extremely interesting, and the field they offer to inquiry is almost wholly unexplored. Our fiction has brought pretty fully into literature the country and village life of the Americans of all sections. We know this from our short stories in New England, in the South, in the middle and farther West, and on the Pacific Slope; and in a certain measure our novels have acquainted us with the lower and upper middle-class life in the minor and even the greater cities. But the attempts to deal with the life of fashion, of luxury, of leisure, have been so insufficient that they cannot be considered. This life can hardly be studied by one who is a part of it, not merely because that sort of life is not fruitful in talent, but because the procession cannot very well look on at itself. The observer must have some favourable position on the outside, and must regard it neither "with a foolish face of praise," nor with a satiric scorn. Like every other phase of life, it has its seriousness, its importance, and one who studies it rightly will find in it the old elements of interest so newly compounded that they will merit his most intelligent scrutiny, often his most sympathetic scrutiny. It would be easy to burlesque it, but to burlesque it would be intolerable, and the witness who did this would be bearing false testimony where the whole truth and nothing but the truth is desirable. A democracy, the proudest, the most sincere, the most ardent that history has ever known, has evolved here a leisure class which has all the distinguishing traits of a patriciate, and which by the chemistry of intermarriage with European aristocracies is rapidly acquiring antiquity. Is not this a phenomenon worthy the highest fiction?

Mr. Veblen has bought to its study the methods and habits of scientific inquiry. To translate these into dramatic terms would form the unequalled triumph of the novelist who had the seeing eye and the thinking mind, not to mention the feeling heart. That such a thing has not been done hitherto is all the stranger, because fiction, in other countries, has always employed itself with the leisure class, with the aristocracy; and our own leisure class now offers not only as high an opportunity as any which fiction has elsewhere enjoyed, but by its ultimatum in the English leisure class it invites the American imagination abroad on conditions of unparalleled advantage.

W. D. HOWELLS.

(Copyright, 1899, in the United States of America, by Harper and Brothers.)

FROM THE MAGAZINES.—I.

One of the present needs of London as urgent as open spaces or electric light is a series of really popular and informing guides to the national collections, and we are always glad to see in a magazine such an article as Macmillan's has this month on the Rembrandt Etchings at the British Museum, by Mr. C. Parkinson. The inquiring art student should take note of it.

The following criticism of Mr. Lang's in Longman's on the German fashion of tearing Greek or Biblical authors into fragments because, forsooth, they contradict themselves in places is worth quoting in full:—

Try Esmond on these critical lines (first edition, 1852). On pp. 126—128 Colonel Francis Esmond (late Lord Castlewood) is said to have declined to join Fenwick's conspiracy. "He had broke his sword when the King left the country, and would never again fight in that quarrel." Yet (pp. 253—255) we find the Colonel entertaining the Duke of Berwick when he was over here incognito, during Fenwick's plot—not, of course, the subsidiary assassination scheme. The narrator, now, "has little doubt" that the Colonel was in the plot, and (contrary to pp. 253—255) it was after the Prince of Orange burned the list of conspirators that the Colonel swore "never to be engaged in any conspiracy against that brave and merciful man" of Glencoe celebrity. Obviously no one man wrote these contradictory pages! Again, Harry Esmond's last long vacation at Castlewood is actually doubled. There are two distinct versions of what occurred, the Jehovistic Version (p. 237 and what follows) with the Elohist Version (p. 279, with what follows). Esmond speaks Latin better than he writes it, and he also writes it better than he reads it. He is a Jacobite at college, and wears black on the day of the King's abdication. He is also a Republican at college, this statement occurring much later. These passages, and the doubled third vacation, cannot both have been written by one man. Esmond went to college at sixteen, being two years older than his fellow freshmen—a thing absurd in itself. After three years he was twenty-two, in defiance of arithmetic. When he is twenty-two, Beatrix is thirteen. He is, therefore, nine years older than Beatrix, but only eight years older than her younger brother, Frank, which is ridiculous. These are only a very few of the errors which a single writer, with proof-sheets before him, could not commit. Harry Esmond is again and again called Frank, and Frank is called Arthur! The style varies over two centuries, yet the final editor of this collection of divergent documents has the impudence to put on the title-page:—

"Servetur ad inum"

Qualis ab incepto processerit, et sibi constet."

"Let the unity be preserved from beginning to end; let all be self-consistent." In a few pages there are more discrepancies than in the whole Iliad, though the author of the Iliad had no proof-sheets. The book cannot be by one hand; yet we know for certain that it is by one hand. When will "the Higher Criticism" face these facts, and abandon the pedantic imbecility of its methods?

The Cornhill has an article on Mrs. Oliphant, by Mr. Meredith Townsend, who places her next after George Eliot and before Charlotte Brontë. "Urbanus Sylvan" continues his clever conferences on books and men, with a history of Oxford wit and humour. Wit in old days took a boisterous form, and found an outlet in the Town and Gown controversy, which was "only one, somewhat acute, form of the ancient antinomy between Clerk and Layman, which itself is only a particular shape of the eternal conflict between Form and Matter." But Urbanus Sylvan is surely lulled into a false security when he says that every trace of the old quarrel between the city and the University has now been removed. Have they not lately disputed over the body of a peccant undergraduate? Then there were the classical wits of the eighteenth century: the parodists—from the "Oxford Sausage" to the "Oxford Spectator," and the Shotover Papers and the Oxford Magazine: and the flourishing of the Epigram, which lived to the days of Jowett, "who had a unique gift of epigrammatic silence"; and, lastly, the Pun, under which may be reckoned Lewis Carroll's "Dynamics of a Particle" with its Postulates—e.g., Postulate 3. "That a controversy may be raised about any question, and at any distance from that question," and its Proposition V. "To continue a given series. Example.—A and B, who are respectively addicted to Fours and Fives, occupy the same set of rooms, which is always at Sixes and Sevens. Find the probable amount of reading done by A and B when the Eights are on." The same magazine has a clever skit, called "Don Quexote, a Pineromance. Persons, The late Lord Quex, The late Lady Quex, Sir Charles Gadabout. Scene, The Elysian Fields."

In Temple Bar an article on "Women at Cards in the Eighteenth Century" collects many references from Walpole, Swift, and others on the games in vogue, particularly "ombre," the game played by Belinda in "The Rape of the Lock." Up to the end of the century there still survived the custom of candle money, a sum put under the candlestick by every guest who sat down to play, and frequently pocketed by the hostess, who regarded it as a regular source of income. It was often, however, snapped up by the servants. Thus Anstey in his "New Bath Guide":—

I very much wonder

Why they put so much money the candlestick under;
For up comes a man on a sudden slap-dash,
Snuffs the candle, and carries away all the cash.
And as nobody troubles their heads any more,
I'm in very great hopes that it goes to the poor.

BOOK PRICES.

The high prices realized by the rarer Stevensoniana lately make a comparison of the results arrived at in the sale-rooms of the works of Stevenson, during the past four years, interesting. A correspondent sends us a table which is worth the attention of book collectors:—

	1895	1896	1897	1898
	£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.
Pentland Rising (1896)	—	—	13 0 0	—
Edinburgh University Magazine (1871)	—	—	11 5 0	—
On the Thermal Influence of Forests (1873)	—	—	14 0 0	—
An Inland Voyage (1873)	1 0 0 10 15 0 (presentation copy)	—	5 0 0	3 3 0 3 4 0
Edinburgh (1879)	—	—	3 4 0	7 0 0 6 10 0
Travels in the Cevennes (1879)	2 15 0 3 10 0	3 3 0	4 12 0 2 2 0	2 6 0
Virginibus Puerisque (1881)	1 0 0 2 3 0 2 5 0	—	2 18 0	2 5 0 2 8 0
Studies of Men and Books (1882)	0 10 0	—	1 5 0	—
New Arabian Nights (1882)	8 0 0	6 0 0	—	7 2 6
Treasure Island (1883)	a few shillings	—	2 16 0	—
Silverado Squatters (1883)	0 7 0	0 15 0	—	—
Child's Garden of Verses (1885)	2 9 0	—	—	2 4 0 2 10 0 3 3 0 2 12 0
Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde (1886)	—	0 12 0	0 18 0	2 12 0
Kidnapped (1886)	—	0 7 0	—	—
Some College Memories (1886)	—	—	12 0 0	2 1 0 4 10 0
Memories and Portraits (1887)	0 7 0 0 9 0 0 10 0	—	—	—
Ticonderoga (1887)	—	—	—	4 0 0
Father Damien (1890)	7 10 0 (presentation copy)	—	—	—
Familiar Epistle (1896)	—	—	3 18 0	—
Charley Bazaar	—	15 0 0	—	—

In 1895 and 1896 most of Stevenson's stories—such as "Treasure Island," "Kidnapped," "The Master of Ballantrae," &c.—were rarely sold separately. As a rule, these were "lotted" together, so it is difficult to arrive at a definite price. The very rare Davos Platz tracts have only lately appeared in a sale-room at all.

Kipling's works are also receiving attention from book collectors. A table of comparative prices will show their progressive rise:—

	1895	1896	1897	1898
	£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.
Echoes (1894)	—	—	—	33 10 0 27 10 0 19 5 0 10 12 6
Quartette (1895)	—	12 0 0	5 0 0	—
Departmental Ditties (1896)	—	—	20 15 0 16 0 0	19 0 0 10 0 0 14 0 0
Plain Tales from the Hills (1898)	—	—	4 4 0	6 10 0
Letters of Marjorie (1891)	—	1 14 0	5 7 6 6 10 0	6 10 0 6 15 0
Soldiers Three (1890)	—	—	—	—
Story of the Gadabys (1890)	—	—	0 10 0	—
Phantom 'Rickshaw (1890)	—	—	1 0 0	1 11 0
In Black and White (1890)	—	—	1 10 0	—
Under the Deodars (1890)	—	—	1 3 0	1 5 0 1 10 0
We Willie Winkle (1890)	—	—	1 0 0	2 2 0
City of Dreadful Night (1891)	—	—	2 6 0	3 12 0
Barrack Room Ballads (1892, L.P.)	0 12 0	0 11 0 0 17 0 1 5 0	—	1 0 0

In no field, however, of the book collector's activities has there been such a phenomenal rise in prices as in that of the publications from the Kelmscott Press. At one time, several of these were a drug on the market, and such works as "The Golden Legend," "Historyes of Troye," Tennyson's "Maud," could be had at a substantial discount off the published prices. Indeed, "Maud" was actually cleared out as a "remainder" by the publishers. Now, it is extremely difficult to obtain any one "Kelmscott" book at anything like a reasonable figure. The very leaflets and circulars which the late Mr. Morris issued on the announcement of a publication are being eagerly sought for, and some of them can only be obtained for ridiculously high sums. The appended comparative table is interesting. The original published prices are given in brackets:—

	1895	1896	1897	1898
	£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.
Beowulf (1885) [£2 2s.]	1 18 0	—	—	2 6 0 3 3 0 3 12 0 4 10 0
Blunt's Love Lyrics (1892) [£2 2s.]	2 0 0 1 8 0 17 0	—	2 12 0	3 10 0 3 12 0 4 10 0
Book of Chivalry (1893) [£2 2s.]	1 5 0	—	4 10 0	3 15 0
Cavendish's Wolsey (1893) [£2 2s.]	—	1 18 0	—	2 2 0 3 5 0
Reynard the Foxe (1892) [£3 3s.]	1 16 0 1 1 0	3 5 0	10 5 0 (vellum copy)	4 4 0
Caxton's Godefrey of Bullyne (1892) [£6 6s.]	2 8 0	—	2 5 0	3 15 0 4 0 0 7 0 0 (bound)
Caxton's Golden Legend (1892) [£5 5s.]	3 0 0 3 5 0 3 3 0 2 10 0	2 14 0 4 4 0 3 7 6	3 16 0	—
Caxton's Historyes of Troye (1892) [£9 9s.]	2 15 0 3 15 0 3 18 0 3 19 0 3 0 0	—	3 10 0	—
Chaucer's Works (1896) [£20]	—	—	—	27 10 0 27 5 0 28 10 0 33 0 0 36 10 0
Clanvowe's Flower and Leafe (1896) [10s.]	—	—	—	1 10 0 2 1 0 2 6 0
Coleridge's Poems (1896) [21s.]	—	—	—	—
De Contemptu Mundi (1894) [Printed for Fairfax Murray, Esq.]	—	—	—	3 17 6 3 10 0 3 17 6 12 0 0 11 10 0
Herrick's Poems (1895) [30s.]	—	—	2 6 0	—
Keat's Poems (1894) [30s.]	7 15 0 (sold in U.S.A.) 3 8 0	4 10 0	4 6 0	—
Laudes Beate Marie Virginis (1896) [10s.]	—	—	—	3 3 0
Mackail's Biblia Innocentium (1892) [21s.]	—	1 16 0	—	3 7 6
Meinhold's Sidonia the Sorceress [£4 4s.]	—	—	—	3 10 0 6 19 0 3 3 0 3 16 0
More's Utopia (1893) [30s.]	—	2 6 0	1 11 0 2 0 0 2 16 0	—
Morris' Poems by the Way (1891) [£2 2s.]	2 10 0 2 4 0	—	6 0 0	6 10 0 6 15 0 6 6 0
Morris' Story of the Glittering Plain (1891) [£2 2s.]	3 3 0	—	8 16 0	16 0 0 16 10 0
Morris' Story of the Glittering Plain (illust., 1894) [£5 5s.]	—	—	3 18 0	5 10 0
Morris' Defence of Guenevere (1892) [£2 2s.]	1 5 0	2 8 0	4 0 0	2 10 0 4 0 0
Morris' Wood Beyond the World (1894) [£2 2s.]	1 3 0 1 2 0	—	2 4 0	3 7 6
Morris' News from Nowhere (1892) [£2 2s.]	0 18 0 1 8 0	—	2 8 0	3 0 0 3 8 0
Morris' Dream of John Ball (1892) [30s.]	0 16 0	1 1 0	2 8 0	2 7 0 2 17 6 3 17 6 5 7 6
Morris' Jason (1895) [£5 5s.]	—	3 7 6	—	—
Morris' Well at the World's End (1896) [£5 5s.]	—	—	5 12 0	5 5 0
Morris' Tale of K. Florus (1893) [7s. 6d.]	0 13 0 1 10 0	—	1 10 0	—
Morris' Emperor Constant (1894) [7s. 6d.]	0 8 0	—	—	—
Morris' Amis and Amile (1894) [7s. 6d.]	1 6 0	—	3 4 0	—
Morris' Child Christopher [15s.]	0 16 0	—	—	—
Morris' Sir Percyvelle (1895) [15s.]	—	—	0 17 0 1 2 0	—
Morris' Sire Degraunt (1896) [15s.]	—	—	—	0 17 0
Rossetti's Lyrical Poems (1894) [£2 2s.]	—	1 12 6 2 2 0	—	3 12 6
Rossetti's Narrative Poems (1893) [£2 2s.]	—	1 12 6 2 2 0	—	3 15 0
Ruskin's Nature of Gothic (1892) [30s.]	1 2 0	—	—	2 16 0
Shakespeare's Poems (1893) [£1 5s.]	—	2 8 0	2 8 0 3 6 0 3 8 0	3 6 0 4 14 0 4 15 0 6 0 0
Shelley's Poetical Works (1896) [3 vols. 25s. each]	—	—	6 6 0 21 0 0 (vellum)	8 4 0
Sulthan-Saba Orbelliani's Book of Wisdom and Lies (1894) [£2 2s.]	2 6 0	—	—	2 5 0
Swinburne's Atalanta (1894) [£2 2s.]	—	2 10 0	—	5 0 0
Tennyson's Maud [£2 2s.]	—	Sold as a remainder	—	1 15 0

In the present year, the price for Keats' "Poems," originally published at thirty shillings, has reached as high as £23. Seven guineas seems to be the average price now asked for the "De Contemptu Mundi"; while the Chaucer has almost trebled its original published price. Of the smaller books, such as the "Child Christopher," by far the most sought for is "The Tale of King Florus," for which as much as £7 12s. 6d. has been given. A recent sale at Sheffield of an almost complete set of Kelmescott Books amply illustrated the wisdom of collecting them. The books at this sale were disposed of by a collector, and the prices many of them brought must have made even him chuckle. Here are a few notes:—"The Story of the Glittering Plain" (1891), £23 10s.; "Poems by the Way," £10 10s.; Mackail's "Biblia Innocentium," £10 10s.; Meinhold's "Sidonia the Sorceress," £9 5s.; Swinburne's "Atalanta in Calydon," £9 15s.; Shelley's "Poetical Works," 3 vols., £17 10s.; "Romance of Syr Percyvelle," £7 10s.; Herrick's "Poems," £11; "Earthly Paradise," £17 15s.; "Story of Sigurd the Volsung," £13 13s.; "Love is Enough," £6. If we compare these prices with the original published prices, the result must tempt the most timid of speculators into the fields of book-collecting. Whether these prices will be maintained is another question.

FICTION.

The Individualist. By W. H. Mallock. 7½ × 5¼ in., 301 pp. London, 1899. Chapman & Hall. 6/-

Mr. Mallock's previous novels showed that he possesses the perceptions of the true artist in fiction, and it is a pity that he should let them be dimmed by the prepossessions of a writer with a social purpose. This is the defect from which "The Individualist," which borrows its very name from treatises on Sociology, suffers as a work of art. What is worse, the writer definitely abandons all attempt to establish on grounds of principle what he believes to be the true social philosophy, and devotes himself to the method of "abusing the plaintiff's attorney." In that brilliant but, as we pointed out at the time it was published, unconvincing book, "Aristocracy and Evolution," Mr. Mallock emphasized the part played by "exceptional" individuals in the progress of society as illustrating the necessity of the aristocratic principle. So far, most readers must have admitted that "the Court was with him." He was far less successful in the more difficult task of proving, as a corollary of his theory, the advantages derived from an aristocracy of inherited wealth and position, and, indeed, he seemed to shrink from pressing this part of his thesis to an extreme, though it clearly was included in his brief. In the present book, which may perhaps be regarded as an illustrative appendix to his argument, he simply resorts to that well-known device of a counsel in difficulties to which we have alluded. Mr. Mallock's panacea for social ills, as here set forth, is that of a distinguished member of the "Young England" party in the early forties—"Leave us still our old nobility." Over the possessions, the foibles, and even the vulgarities of the old nobility he lingers with loving reverence. The words "altruism" and "progress" shock and irritate him, and he can conceive of no means of social amelioration save those dispensed by a beneficent landlord to his tenants. His social ideal is to find every one accepting and making the best of the circumstances in which he is born—a condition of things, by the way, not favourable to the development of "exceptional men." But Mr. Mallock, the social philosopher, preaching through the medium of fiction, gives us no hint of enlightenment on any social question, and engages in the not very edifying pastime of bespattering with mud those who do seek such enlightenment. For this purpose he takes what we presume he regards as a typical "social settlement," and, with two exceptions, he treats its supporters much as Dickens treated Stiggins and his circle. The exceptions are a Mrs. Norham, a novelist, interested in social reform, who is not, so the author tells us at much length in a preface, to be identified with any living prototype; and a Mr. and Mrs. Prouse Pousfield. The latter, both in their individual characters and their domestic life, are most admirably and sympathetically drawn. The former is depicted with a spleen and animus which alone justify us in placing the book outside the sphere of pure literature.

Mrs. Norham was beyond all doubt a celebrity. She had written a novel with a purpose, which, despite its length and its solemnity, had achieved an enormous circulation, and had raised her to the ranks of a prophetess. She was now surrounded by a clique of admiring worshippers who would have taken her, were that possible, even more seriously than she took herself. She was consequently in full career of what may be called ethical dissipation; and just as a frivolous young lady is miserable if she is not going to a ball, Mrs. Norham was miserable if she was not in some reforming movement. She enjoyed the delightful experience of feeling that the world needed her—that the masses needed her help, that statesmen needed her hints, and that the fashionable class, corrupt and frivolous as it was, needed the discipline of her somewhat acidulated contempt. If only her performances had come up to her hopes she would already have been weeping, like Alexander, because there were no more abuses to conquer.

Mrs. Norham is the heroine of the book rather than the pleasantly but not strongly drawn "Individualist," Lacy. All Mr. Mallock's powers of satire are expended on her. Almost all her frequent appearances on the scene give occasion to paragraphs such as we have quoted. Every speech and action of this unfortunate lady is traced to some egoistic motive. It is very subtle and ingenious, but it wearies, if it does not revolt, the reader. Mrs. Norham, of course, labours under the two serious disadvantages of not being related to a Cabinet Minister and of being a highly intellectual lady devoted to philanthropic work, but these two circumstances need not necessarily make her a monster of priggish self-conceit. The satire, in fact, is spoilt by being tedious and ill-natured, and is conceived on lines which are certainly neither artistic nor in accordance with that aristocratic spirit which Mr. Mallock so much admires. The literary quality of the book, apart from its leading motif, is of a high quality, though Mr. Mallock's phraseology and humour is tending to become somewhat too elaborate. The numerous characters of the society in which the Individualist moves are pleasantly drawn, though not strongly characterized—the most notable of them being Lord Runcorn, the chief spokesman of the author's social theories—a character who may be described as Lord Beaconsfield endowed with an historic pedigree and a villa in the Riviera. The plot mainly turns on a doubt as to Lacy's title to a property which comes into his possession early in the story, and the difficulty finds its solution in the not unfamiliar device by which the hostile claimant is found to be identical with a lady who is quite prepared to merge her claims to the property by matrimony with its present possessor. Mr. Mallock's merit as a novelist lies in his power of making ordinary social events and conversations interesting without any straining after brilliance. This is well illustrated in "The Individualist," but, as a whole, the book suffers, in comparison, for instance, with "The Old Order Changes," from a narrower and more material outlook. Admirable though much of it is from the literary point of view, it shows the writer hampered in his full development both as a thinker and as an imaginative writer by a lack of independence, of breadth of view, and of sympathetic insight.

Ragged Lady. By W. D. Howells. 7½ × 5¼ in. + 357 pp. London, 1899. Harper. 6/-

In Mr. Howells' latest novel we seem to catch sometimes an echo of Mr. Henry James' tricks of style. Otherwise it cannot be said that "Ragged Lady" marks any notable development in the author's artistic career; but it does show him at his best in that manner, which, since the days of the "Rise of Silas Lapham," has earned him the allegiance of so many readers. Mr. Howells is a past-master in the art of delineating the characters and points of view of the New England bourgeoisie. He has the insight of a Maupassant into the foibles and the vulgarities of the newly rich, the Mrs. Laphams or the Mrs. Landers of his novels. But Guy de Maupassant describes the French bourgeoisie with a mordant veracity, and through the truth of his picture of them gleam always the hatred and contempt with which they inspired him. Mr. Howells is a more tolerant and sympathetic painter, and he requires a larger canvas—too large, it is often objected—for the very small amount of action which he provides. So, we expect, it is not everybody who will have the patience to persevere through the three hundred and fifty closely-printed pages of "Ragged Lady." But those who do not will miss a character-study of peculiar penetration and power in Mr. Howells' description of the aimless, nomadic hotel-life and the querulous self-indulgence of Mrs. Landers. The other interest of the book lies in the history of the love affairs of Clementina, her companion—a girl whom in real life a harsh world would almost certainly have dubbed a flirt, but in whose heart the author would have us see no guile. Clementina is interesting; but the men in this book are, without exception, vague and colourless.

The second volume of the Over Seas Library is THE CAPTAIN OF THE LOCUSTS, by A. Werner (Unwin, 2s.). It consists of short stories, of only moderate merit, illustrative of life in South Africa. There is some falling off from the high standard set in the first volume of the series by Mr. Cunningham Graham.

There is evidently more than a suspicion of autobiography in the sketches of early married life which Mr. Cosmo Hamilton calls, not very happily, THROUGH A KEYHOLE (Chatto and Windus, 3s. 6d.). They are cleverly written, and the lady's character is inconsistent enough to be quite delightful. We have read something very much on the same lines several times before, but this is brightly done, and, after all, the subject is one of perennial interest. A bull-pup, Gargantua by name, provides a running commentary upon the follies of mankind or rather womankind. The whole is a light and amusing piece of trifling, containing some touches that are very true to nature.

A SON OF THE SEA, by John Arthur Barry (Duckworth, 6s.). is a good, fresh tale of the sea. Judging from internal evidence we imagine it is founded mainly on personal experiences. This does not detract from its interest, for truth is often more interesting than fiction, and sometimes even truer to life. Mr. Barry gives us the adventures of a young "gentleman midshipman" in the merchant service, and his wanderings through the bush and sheep-farms of Australia. Incidentally he touches on many of those points which have recently been raised in connexion with the manning of our merchant fleet. And he speaks as one having authority on the subject.

Mr. Howard Pears gives us in TALES OF NORTHUMBRIA (Methuen, 6s.), as in his former volumes, some excellent stories of "Geordie Pitman" and of hard and heather-bred Northumbrian squires, whose good conceit of themselves is pleasantly salted by their North Country humour, so shrewd and so racy. The result is that any reader who has a drop of North Country blood in his veins, more especially if his lot is cast among the shrill-voiced cockneys and he longs to hear once again the broad vowels of the North, will read these tales with unalloyed pleasure.

The collection of six "true tales of lowly lives," entitled LA STREGA AND OTHER STORIES (Sampson Low, 3s. 6d.), by Ouida, is written in that popular novelist's most vital and convincing manner, and over all there is that sensitiveness to the pathos of humanity which arrests the attention of the most casual reader. The sketches of the beautiful jealous village girl, Fedalma; the young shepherd, Avellino; and La Strega, the old witch, Pià, are firm and vivid. Many a newer novelist might turn to the later work of "Ouida" for a lesson in his craft.

"When the fight begins within himself a man's worth something," quotes "E. Livingston Prescott" in the novel HELLO AND HERO (Simpkin, Marshall, 6s.), in which once more the author of "Scarlet and Steel" tells the story of a good man fighting against adversity. Colonel Niven's eldest son dies suddenly while gambling with a card-sharper named Blount, who also dies shortly afterwards. To prevent a younger brother from taking the same course of life the Colonel captures Blount's orphan son of about the same age and makes a helot of him. If the reader will accept the fact that such an idea can be conceived by an honourable man, he will find much in the book of stirring interest, though the writing is occasionally slovenly, and there is a general tendency to exaggeration. The dénouement of the story has a touch of hope where the helot at last becomes a hero.

RIDÁN THE DEVIL, AND OTHER STORIES, by Louis Becke (Unwin, 6s.). We should not be surprised if among the books of the present day read with most interest by later generations were numbered those of the group of writers who deal with the romance and realities of seafaring life in the uttermost parts of the world. To Stevenson, Kipling, Bullen, Conrad, and Jacobs must be added, in this category, the name of Mr. Louis Becke. At his best Mr. Becke tells a story or relates an experience with a vigour and finish that are admirable, and in some half-dozen tales of the present collection he is at his best. So vividly does he impart to us his memories of convicts, "South Seamen," Pacific Islanders, and South Sea loafers that we are almost persuaded that we have lived and traded with them ourselves. But, first-rate as some of these stories are, the rest of the sketches that go to make up the volume are mere careless journalism, not devoid of lapses both in grammar and in taste. And Mr. Becke is too good a writer and has too much to tell us that is worth hearing for us to be content with anything but his best.

Mr. T. Baron Russell in THE MANDATE (Lane, 6s.) has in no way stultified the promise of his previous book, "A Guardian of the Poor," but has produced an excellent work with one portrait, at least, which should become of historical value. The character of Henry St. Kelvin, the city journalist and husband of the striking heroine, is treated in a manner, perhaps at times crude, but always firm and clear. The murder by mesmeric suggestion is well employed and convincing enough, but one is rather shy nowadays of a plot containing suggestive hypnotism, a form of thrill which has already been exhausted in a hundred novels. Mr. Russell, while making his hero, Massie, "suggest" to St. Kelvin that he shall die on the morrow, leaves it an open question whether the death which follows may not be a mere coincidence, but the tragic close of the story grows legitimately out of the earlier incidents. "The Mandate" is sombre, often almost cruel in method, but it is a book which deserves to be widely read.

A BATCH OF HISTORICAL NOVELS.

IN DEFENDER OF THE FAITH (Lane, 6s.) Mr. Frank Mathew proves—that, indeed, one knew already—that he can reproduce the atmosphere of a past period convincingly, and with little visible effort. He makes no display of learning, but, at the same time, he avoids all anachronisms save the necessary one of slightly modernizing the mode of speech that prevailed in Tudor times, and leaves us with the impression that he has actually lived, in imagination, in the age of which he writes. The only thing which breaks the illusion is an unnecessary preface wherein the reader is referred to "State Papers" and informed of the particulars in which the author has deviated from the established facts of history. It would be better to read the story first and the preface afterwards. The book deals mainly with Henry VIII. in his relations with his numerous wives. Wolsey, Cromwell, Ashe, Norris, and the Earl of Northumberland are also introduced; and there is an account of the rising of the Pilgrims of Grace. That the book will be popular we hesitate to affirm. The great public likes emphasis and exaggeration, and Mr. Mathew gives us neither. He does not take the reader's interest by storm like Charles Reade and Dumas, and aims neither at dramatic surprises nor melodramatic effects. But his work has a subtle charm and a delicate literary flavour. Whatever the great public may think of it, it will not fail to give pleasure to the elect.

BLUE AND WHITE, by Edith M. Power (Moran), announces itself as "a tale of Brittany in 1796." We found it dull at first, but perseverance in reading it rewarded us with some graceful writing, and here and there a spirited bit of description.

Mr. Frederic Breton is always a conscientious writer, and his GOD SAVE ENGLAND! (Richards, 6s.) is a creditable piece of work, laid down on the safe lines of the mediæval romance with the First Person Singular Hero. The scene of his last novel, "Trueheart," was placed in Germany, if we remember rightly, in the fourteenth century. The present story takes place in the Cinque Port of Rye at about the same period, and ought to achieve a greater popularity.

MA MÈRE, by Vicomte Jean de Luz (Smith, Elder, 6s.), deals with the fall of the Second Empire, and is a book that teaches unawares. It opens with a vivid account of the French "flesh-market" and the marriage of a girl still in a convent to a man whom she has scarcely seen; and it shows how much more a Frenchman's mother is to him than his wife. As a novel written in good taste and not without dramatic power it may be commended. The English is pure, though in places it reads a little like a translation.

Mr. Arthur Paterson's CROMWELL'S OWN (Harper, 6s.) is an interesting addition to the "Cromwell boom" caused by the tercentenary of his birth. It is a character-sketch of Cromwell before the war and up to the Battle of Marston Moor. The hero, Ralph Dangerfield, is an officer in the "Ironsides," who has joined the Parliamentary cause from hatred of the Royalist party owing to the treatment of his father by the Star Chamber. The story of his passion for Cromwell's ward, the generous rivalry of young Oliver, and the objections to him on account of his religious principles form the basis of the story. Despite two excellent descriptions of battles, it is not a "blood-and-thunder" novel, but a picture of Cromwell the man and the father, and will endear Cromwell to the reader far more than the histories of the iron-willed Protector. Mr. Paterson has produced a book of real literary merit and great interest.

People who are going to the Lyceum and have no clear notion what the piece is about will probably find it worth their while to read ROBESPIERRE, "the story of M. Victorien Sardou's play adapted and novelised" by M. Ange Galdemar (Pearson, 6s.). It is not literature, and originality is, of course, the last quality M. Galdemar has sought to display. But he is readable; he shows a certain ingenuity in avoiding textual coincidence with his original, and has contrived, in conveying the plot from one medium into another, to introduce some useful elementary information about the revolutionary period, the possession of which M. Sardou's drama necessarily assumes.

Mr. Ewan Martin has selected the reign of Edward III. as the period of his historical romance THE KNIGHT OF KING'S GUARD (Pearson, 6s.), and introduces Crécy and the siege of Calais. The story is well written and well constructed. Without too much unnecessary archaism of language, Mr. Martin realizes the times of which he writes; and, although his knights and barons move somewhat stiffly in their armour, the hero is man enough to engage our sympathy throughout. Some of the minor characters—in particular the burly forester Andrew Privett—are excellently touched in. On the whole, a book that is worth reading for those who still retain an affection for a sort of writing that is beginning to show signs of wear.

There is a gloomy appearance, at first sight, about the funereal black, with blood-red lettering, of the ROMANCE OF THE LADY ARBELL (F. V. White, 6s.). "Alastor Graeme" (Mrs. Frederick Townshend Maryat) is the author, and she takes her mission very seriously indeed. We have seldom read a book in which the note of pathos is sustained throughout at so shrill a pitch. The "Prelude, Vindication, and Appeal" is enough to appal most readers with gloomy forebodings. These are its opening words:—

'Mid the shadows of these dark ages—for dark they were—none is more visionary to trite mind and prosaic vision than the slight passing shade of "Arbella Stuart"—Shadow which doth fall on the dial of time like ray of autumn sunlight, falling, but to fade.

There is a prodigious amount of this sort of fine writing in "Alastor Graeme's" book, and it is rendered the more ridiculous by an occasional sudden descent to modern colloquialisms. Yet there is the saving grace of sincerity about the author. She evidently has been moved to deep sympathy with her unhappy heroine, and in spite of her many absurdities she has not entirely spoiled the story. The titles of her chapters, or "scenes," as she prefers to call them, read like the play-bill of a third-class melodrama. It is a curious book.

Correspondence.

ILLICIT COMMISSIONS.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—I have some doubts whether the letter of your correspondent "Amicus Curiae" deserves a reply. He is obviously but ill-acquainted with the facts of the case, and he has not the courage to sign his name.

As he, however, appeals to me, I will tell him frankly that I do not regard his personal opinion as to illicit commissions in the publishing trade of any weight whatsoever when set against that of the Lord Chief Justice.

In regard to his second point, I am happy to inform him that the question he raises has been fully discussed by the Publishers' Association. In some draft forms of agreement which we drew up after long and careful deliberation more than a year ago (and which, I am told, have been very severely criticized by certain individuals who have never grasped their meaning or sought an explanation of their purpose) the following words occur:—

In ascertaining the net profits of the work all discounts and allowances received and allowed by the publisher for cash payments or otherwise shall be brought into account and be credited or debited to the work.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

JOHN MURRAY.

50, Albemarle-street, May 26.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—I have read "An Enemy of Busybodies'" letter on this subject, and need only point out, in reply, that his argument rests upon a false analogy. He says:—

When you buy a bottle of wine at a restaurant you do not expect to be told what the proprietor paid for it.

Therefore, he suggests, when you have a book published on commission you have no right to know what terms the publisher has made with the printer and the binder.

The two cases are not on all fours. The publisher is your agent, and the caterer is not. The caterer is merely a tradesman who sells you something; when you have paid your money and received your goods the transaction is at an end. The publisher is administering your property on your behalf, and is therefore under a common law obligation to render an accurate account of his stewardship, without suppressing the fact that he has received discounts and rebates. This is not a matter of opinion, but a matter of fact which can be verified from any legal handbook.

A publisher may, of course, contract to produce a book for a stipulated sum; and in that case he is legally entitled to any profit on the cost of production that he can make. But in such a case he does not furnish "printer's estimates," but merely quotes his own price as a contractor. Such cases, therefore, are outside the present discussion.

A publisher is also within his rights in stipulating that his emoluments shall include certain specified trade discounts. This is the line taken in the model agreement drawn up by the Publishers' Association. Thus:—

2. The publisher will supply the author with estimates for the printing, and will charge a commission of — per cent.

on the trade prices for printing, paper, binding, advertising, and other disbursements, and reserve to himself the right to take the usual credit or the equivalent cash discount for cash payments, but no such discount shall exceed $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.

Here, of course, the amount of the profits is disclosed, and, if the author agrees to them, there is nothing more to be said. What "An Enemy of Busybodies" claims is the right to take these profits without disclosing them, and without giving the author the opportunity of agreeing to them. I can only repeat that this is precisely the offence which the Lord Chief Justice proposes to make punishable by two years' imprisonment and a fine of £500.

Your correspondent says that he does not think it probable "that Mr. John Murray would pursue this course." In that I agree with him. And I will go further and add that I shall be very much surprised if he can persuade Mr. John Murray, or any other publisher of equally honourable reputation, to endorse his view that, in such a course, there is not "anything to complain of."

Obediently yours,

AMICUS CURIAE.

SHAKESPEARE'S SONNETS.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Will you grant me the privilege of a very few words in reply to your reviewer's comments on my book, "The Mystery of Shakespeare's Sonnets"? (1) My erudition, he observes, is devoted to "the quite superfluous task of castigating the moribund Pembroke theory." I am glad that the Pembroke theory is moribund—but it is alive and vigorous in Dr. Brandes' volume, and in Mr. George Wyndham's work on Shakespeare's poems; and it had not even been repudiated by Mr. Sidney Lee at the time I wrote my chapters (August, 1898). And has Mr. Tyler abandoned the theory yet? (2) The reviewer says that I ought to have "paused" before saying that Shakespeare had no mistress, because "many poets who have similarly erred" have written good poetry. My own contention, a fair one I think, is that others should "pause" before saying that Shakespeare had a mistress when there is not a tittle of biographical proof of the statement. Excellent literary men have been robbers and forgers, but that is no reason for ascribing the same vices to any one particular literary man. Unless facts are forthcoming, let us believe the best we can of our great poet. This is my brief rejoinder to the two points in the first paragraph of the review.

I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

CUMING WALTERS.

[With reference to the Pembroke theory, we should say that the coup de grâce was given to it, at least in its modern form, when Lady Newdigate's "Gossip from a Muniment Room" made it clear that Mary Fytton was not a "black" woman, but had a fair complexion with brown hair and grey eyes. This was in 1897. Dr. Brandes' book was published in 1895; the English edition is a translation only. We do not think the theory can be fairly said to be "vigorous" in Mr. Wyndham's "Poems of Shakespeare." His last word on the subject appears to be:—

I am not, therefore, bound to accept Tyler's identification of the youth with William Herbert and of the dark lady with Mary Fytton. But neither am I precluded from doing so. And Tyler, at least, has proved that in the last years of Elizabeth's reign, some such a drama as that which we guess behind certain of the Sonnets was possible among the most highly-placed of her play-loving courtiers and court-ladies.

This is not very "vigorous." Nor can we admit that Mr. Sidney Lee had not repudiated the Pembroke theory in August, 1898. He did so in Vol. LI. of the "Dictionary of National Biography," published in 1897. Very likely Mr. Tyler has not yet abandoned the theory. Mais que voulez-vous? It is his bawling. As to the other point raised in Mr. Cuming Walters' letter, what we ventured to protest against was biasing the interpretation of the data contained in the Sonnets themselves by any a priori theory whatever as to the probable chastity or unchastity of a "great poet."]

"ENGLISH AS SHE IS SPOKE."

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—In ascribing to Mr. James Millington the introductions to the series of little shilling books published by my old firm, Field and Tuer, your correspondent is not quite accurate.

For a long time I hunted in vain for a copy of Jose de F. Pedro Carolina's amusing Anglo-Portuguese Guide, and when one fell into my hands I compiled from it the little book referred to by Mr. Spielmann, to which I asked Mr. Millington to contribute an introduction—the only one he wrote. From his pen, however, came more than one of these booklets.

Perhaps I may add that the title, "English as She is Spoke," is not due to the much be-named Portuguese linguist, but to

ANDREW W. TUER.

The Leadenhall Press, E.C.

ENGLISH HEXAMETERS.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—I trust that the discussion of this form of verse, and of quantitative metres generally, is not exhausted. Many points remain to take up. It seems unwise to assume, as does one of your correspondents, that long lines are in themselves distasteful. Recent poets have markedly favoured lines of great length—often much longer than the hexameter—and their readers have made no protest. Some other cause must be found for the unpopularity of the hexameter.

In a pamphlet published two years ago I suggested two probable causes:—(1) That our "accentual hexametrists" have too entirely ignored quantity, forgetting that neglect of this, though it does not make English verse unmetrical, does make it unmusical; (2) that in pretending to construct exact feet they have sinned against the genius of a language whose prosody does not depend upon rigorous syllabification, but rather on a succession of uniform periods, which may be occupied either by syllables or by pauses. The latter question is too large to embark on here, but both points seem to me exemplified when "taciturn" is presented to us as a dactyl. Surely the scansion which puts forward such a specimen is self-condemned already.

On the narrower question of "quantity" Mr. Stone's pamphlet contains much that is fresh and new. His analysis seems to me an advance on any that has gone before. Not only does he assert English quantity as a fact, but he lays down (more clearly than, I think, has ever been done previously) that it depends on phonetic laws, not on accidents of spelling. Whether we write one penie or one penny, the first syllable of "penny" is short, and must not be accounted long in obedience to an inapplicable Latin rule. All that he says under this head well deserves study, and will come as a revelation to those whose notions of quantity derive from a hazy remembrance of rules in their Latin grammar. This mere insistence on the true nature of English quantity should be enough to secure a hearing for Mr. Stone's pamphlet, especially from those who remember how some great critics have denied that, apart from accent, English quantity has any existence at all.

With some of Mr. Stone's dicta one may not agree. His theory of accent may seem questionable, his proposed rules here and there open to challenge. Nor can I believe that such verse as he proposes will ever be naturalized in English. But his question is fairly put, logically and consistently argued, and demands an answer from those who pretend to copy classic models. If that is to be done at all it should be done completely. Mr. Stone's is the only real way of doing it. As he says himself, no compromise is possible. Our "accentual hexameters" are neither one thing nor another, neither classic metre nor English; they fall between the two stools. My own wish would be precisely the reverse of Mr. Stone's. I want our poets to discard the classic simulacrum entirely, and write this metre, as they would do any other, in obedience to English laws of verse. This thesis, expounded at some length in my pamphlet, I would especially commend to young writers like Mr. Taralli, who have it in their power to make this metre a reality and a glory of the English tongue. But in the meantime, so long as we hold by the attempt to reproduce classic metres, Mr. Stone's theory imperatively demands examination. Can we escape the conclusion that thus and thus only may classical metres be imitated in English, however unwelcome this result may be, however grotesque and inharmonious it may appear on first trial?

I am, &c.,

Edinburgh, May 27.

T. S. OMOND.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Seeing that the hexameter is naturalized in German—witness Voss's "Luise" and "Ilias," as well as Klopstock's famous epic in twenty books—it seems strange that in English, a kindred language, this metre should meet with such doubtful recognition. In your "Note" of May 6th, while fully recognizing the fact that "it is only by a coincidence that the English bears a deceptive resemblance to the classic hexameter," you nevertheless claim that it is essentially English, "as representing almost perfectly the cadence natural to English sentences."

Will you allow me to illustrate or justify this remark by presenting a score out of some hundred or two of sentences (or parts of sentences) that might be extracted from the Authorized Version of the Bible—sentences the rhythm of which falls naturally and undesignedly into the form of the hexameter? It should be premised that I regard this metre, like all our other English metres, as based solely on accent, and not at all, like the classic hexameter, on quantity. I select, of course, the best specimens I have as yet found; but there may be others not at all inferior to them. Some of them, no doubt, have already been noticed by others:—

How art thou fallen from heaven, O Lucifer, son of the morning!
Isa. 14, 12.

God is gone up with a shout, the Lord with the sound of a trumpet.
Ps. 47, 5.

Looseth the bond of kings, and girdeth their loins with a girdle.
Job 12, 18.

So King Solomon sent, and they brought him down from the altar.
I. Kings 1, 53.

Tarry, I pray thee, here, for the Lord hath sent me to Jordan.
II. Kings 2, 6.

Why doth thine anger smoke against the sheep of thy pasture?
Ps. 74, 1.

Mischief shall come upon mischief, and rumour shall be upon rumour.
Ezek. 7, 26.

At thy rebuke, O Lord, at the blast of the breath of thy nostrils.
Ps. 18, 15.

But ye shall die like men, and fall like one of the princes.
Ps. 82, 7.

When I shall send upon them the evil arrows of famine.
Ezek. 5, 16.

Therefore they shall not prosper, and all their flocks shall be scattered.
Jer. 10, 21.

Show me a token for good; that they which hate me may see it.
Ps. 86, 17.

And ye shall tell my father of all my glory in Egypt.
Gen. 45, 13.

Cease then, and let me alone, that I may take comfort a little.
Job 10, 20.

Be as the sand of the sea, which cannot be measured nor numbered.
Hos. 1, 10.

Wall of the daughter of Zion, let tears run down like a river.
Lam. 2, 18.

Have not I chosen you twelve, and one of you is a devil?
John 6, 70.

And they took him, and killed him, and cast him out of the vineyard.
Mark 12, 8.

And they shall see his face; and his name shall be in their foreheads.
Rev. 22, 4.

Now unto God and our Father be glory for ever and ever.
Phil. 4, 20.

The above selection of Scripture hexameters might easily be supplemented by examples from the A. V. of the Apocrypha, and the P. B. V. of the Psalter. Two from each will here suffice:—

Do ye not labour and toil, and give and bring all to the woman?
1 Esdr., 4, 22.

Whom ye have taken and slain, and torn their bodies in pieces.
2 Esdr., 1, 32.

So shalt thou make their image to vanish out of the city.
Ps. 73, 19 (P. B.).

Leddest thy people like sheep by the hand of Moses and Aaron.
Ps. 77, 20 (P. B.).

All the above twenty-four examples are taken ~~exactly~~ from the text. But there are a few passages where, by a very slight verbal alteration, two, three, or even four consecutive hexameters, or quasi-hexameters, may be formed. Our first example, for instance, from Isaiah 14, 12, will be found to be virtually followed by three others, if we simply change the last word "God" into "Jehovah."

I confess I am not able to say whether this hexametric rhythm is peculiar to the older translators of the Bible or whether similar lists might be made from the prose writings of Milton or any other of our great writers, ancient or modern, but its occurrence in the A. V. has been often noticed. It is but fair, however, to admit that the following remark made by a writer in the Saturday Review is unquestionably true:—"Those fortuitously beautiful hexameters—why could not the revisers have let them alone?—that crystallized themselves into the Authorized Version of the Scriptures are likewise unsatisfying in this respect"—i.e., the difficulty of achieving a perfect spondee in English.

But this difficulty has, to a very great extent, been solved by Kingsley, who, as you have said in your "Note," "alone made a conscientious attempt to avoid trochees." This it is which makes Kingsley's "Andromeda" so much superior to Longfellow's "Evangeline" as an approximate reproduction of the classic hexameter. Yet even in "Andromeda" it is possible to find at least a dozen lines in which a trochee does duty for a spondee, and that not at the end of the line, where even in the classic hexameter it is tolerated. And I think it will be found that, on the whole, Kingsley's art, by which he produces such exquisite effect, consists less in the introduction of spondees than in the heaping up of dactyls. And is not this the key to the true structure of the English hexameter?

I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

Bath.

C. LAWRENCE FORD, B.A.

SHAKESPEARE'S "TEMPEST."

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—In your issue of April 22nd Mr. E. S. Alderson suggests that Caliban's speech, Act I., ii., 338:—

"When thou camest first
Thou strok'st me, and mad'st much of me; would'st give me
Water with berries in't;

may be of use in fixing the date of the Tempest, inasmuch as it is generally conceded to be an allusion to coffee. But, again, I can contend that Strachey's Narrative explains this curious speech in the most satisfactory manner, for we read: "They (the Bermuda Islands) are full of Shawes of goodly Cedar . . . the berries whereof our men, seething, straining, and letting stand some three or foure daies, made a kind of pleasant drinke." This coincidence did not occur to me until after I had despatched my article published in yours of April 8th and 15th.

It is most curious and interesting to find so many difficult passages in the Tempest resolve themselves when read side by side with the early accounts of Sir George Somers' shipwreck at the Bermudas. Does it add to or detract from our appreciation of Shakespeare's genius to find that he did not evolve all of his wondrous details out of his inner consciousness, but got up his subject and local colour with quite modern industry and research?

W. G. GOSLING,

St. John's, Newfoundland.

DAVID, EARL OF HUNTINGDON.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Permit me to correct a slip which I made, and which has just been pointed out to me, in the note "from a correspondent" which appeared in your issue of May 13th regarding the error made by the Huntingdon Grammar School Committee. Prince David, Earl of Huntingdon, who founded the school was the brother, not the son of William the Lion. This, of course, does not in the slightest degree affect the question as to which I wrote. This particular David never was King of Scotland, nor is our Royal Family descended from him, as was stated by the committee. I regret, however, that in correcting this I should myself have fallen into an inaccuracy.

I am, &c.,

THE WRITER OF THE NOTE.

Authors and Publishers.

The historian of the latter half of this century will certainly require as part of his equipment a life of Lord Granville derived from authentic sources. We are glad to be able to state that the task has been undertaken by Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice, in whose hands the necessary documents have been placed. Lord Edmond is well qualified to write such a life, not only by his connexions and his political experience, especially in the field of foreign affairs, but by his proved capacity as a political biographer.

The purchasers of the original large paper edition of "Præterita" will be interested to know that next November there will be several other parts issued in uniform fashion. In one part will appear Dilecta I. and II. Part III. will be Dilecta containing unpublished matter, together with an elaborate and comprehensive index to "Præterita" and "Dilecta," and a plate, "The Grand Chartreuse," originally intended for a frontispiece.

A limited edition de luxe of Canon Ainger's edition of "Charles Lamb," which has been carefully revised by the editor, will be published in the autumn by Messrs. Macmillan, together with the memoir of Lamb which appeared in the "English Men of Letters Series." Arrangements have been made with Messrs. Smith, Elder to include the letters from Lamb to Charles Lloyd, published last year under the editorship of Mr. E. V. Lucas.

The life of Sarah Bernhardt is to be published by Messrs. Chapman and Hall just at a time when that actress presents her "Hamlet" to English audiences. M. Jules Huret is the author, and M. Edmond Rostand, the author of "Cyrano," has written an introduction. The book will be elaborately illustrated.

The series of the great French Romancists of the present century, contemplated by Mr. Appleton, the American publisher, with Mr. Edmund Gosse as editor, will certainly be an interesting study in evolution, with Dumas and Zola under the same heading.

Two more new biographies de luxe coming from Messrs. Goupil are to be a monograph on Bonnie Prince Charlie by Mr. Andrew Lang, which should be considerably enriched by the author's researches among the Stuart papers at Windsor, and a French book on Catherine de Medici by M. Henri Bouchot, the Keeper of the Prints in the Bibliothèque Nationale at Paris. We believe that an English translation will probably succeed the French edition of M. Bouchot's book.

We understand that Mr. F. C. Montague, of University College, London, is about to add to the numerous editions of Macaulay's Essays. Whole volumes have been filled by commentaries on single essays, such as that on Olive or Warren Hastings, and in preparing a fully annotated edition of all the essays Mr. Montague has no small task to achieve. Messrs. Methuen will publish the book.

Messrs. Reeves and Turner have in the press a book on French hall marks on silver, by Mr. Christopher A. Markham F.S.A., forming a companion work to the two handbooks on English and foreign hall marks already published by the same author. It will contain a large number of facsimiles of the marks used by the Farmers General of Paris and the French makers, and also the marks indicating the assay. The only English books at present dealing with French hall marks are those by Mr. Cripps and the late Mr. Chaffers; the latter forms the foundation of Mr. Markham's work.

A new book by Mr. Edward Jenks in the Clarendon Press Series of Law books is on Modern Land Law. It is uniform with Sir William Anson's well-known work on the Law of Contract. It is intended to give a clear and comprehensive outline of the subject, which can afterwards be filled in by the study of larger and more technical treatises.

Under the presidency of Sir Theodore Martin, the Dante Society will hold its next meeting at Albemarle-street on Wednesday evening, June 7, when H. E. Baron de Renzia, the Italian Ambassador, will give an address on the rather bizarre subject of "Dante as a Business Man." All Dantists will be interested in this new point of view. A work likely to be of value to those who are this poet's especial followers will be found in the volume which the author of "Dante's Ten Heavens," Mr. Edmund Gardner, is preparing on "Dante's Lyrical Poems." It will contain a somewhat full study of all Dante's authentic Canzoni, Ballate, and Sonnets. Mr. Gardner is working upon the manuscripts of these poems in the Florentine libraries, and hopes to publish his work next spring, on the occasion of the sixth centenary of Dante's Vision.

One department of the International Exhibition of Pictures at Knightsbridge contains the original drawings by various artists of book illustrations. Among these is an excellent collection of drawings in colour by Miss Alice B. Woodward for an edition of the "Pied Piper" which Messrs. Fletcher and Son, of Norwich, are going to produce. Miss Woodward is busy with several books for Messrs. Blackie, among them being the illustrations for a fairy tale by Miss Sheila E. Braine, called the "Princess of Hearts," and a collection of short stories about children and animals by Mrs. Talwin Morris, entitled "The Elephant's Apology."

A new book by Mr. Hamlin Garland is forthcoming, called "The Trail of the Gold Seekers." It is the record in prose and verse of a thousand-mile journey made with a pack-train during the summer of 1898, starting from the Canadian Pacific Railway in British Columbia. The verse was often written in the saddle, or at night in a tent, or before the camp fire. The author took nearly three hundred photographs of scenes on the way, and some of the best of these are to appear in the book. "The Trail of the Gold Seekers" is to be followed by a book called "Boy-life on the Prairie," which will deal with the life of a boy on the Prairies of Iowa thirty years ago. Both these books, together with a volume of short stories, are to be issued by Messrs. Macmillan.

The next addition to Messrs. Macmillan's "Foreign Statesmen Series" will be Miss K. Ewart's "Life of Cosimo de' Medici."

The third volume of Messrs. Dent's Haddon Hall Library is "Wild Life in the Hampshire Highlands," by Mr. George A. B. Dewar, author of "The Book of the Dry Fly" and of "South Country Trout Streams" in Messrs. Lawrence and Bullen's Anglers' Library, which we reviewed the other day. Messrs. Dent also announce a primer of entomology entitled "Insects, their Structure and Life," by G. H. Carpenter.

Leland's Itinerary, edited by Mr. Laurence Gomme, is to be added to Bohn's Antiquarian Library. In the Standard Library Messrs. Bell announce Gray's Letters and Gaspar's History of Italian Literature.

The next two volumes in the Famous Scots Series—a Life of James Frederick Ferrier, the nephew of Miss Ferrier the novelist (just published), by Miss E. S. Haldane, and the forthcoming "King Robert the Bruce," by Professor Murison—illustrate the wide field covered by the Series.

Professor Saintsbury's volume on Matthew Arnold, which opens Messrs. Blackwood's "English Men of Letters," is to appear forthwith.

"A Life of Sir Thomas Urquhart of Cromartie," the celebrated translator of Rabelais, by the Rev. J. Willcock, Lerwick, will probably be published by Messrs. Oliphant, Anderson, and Ferrier in the course of this year.

In the course of the next few weeks Messrs. Macmillan will issue a cheaper edition of Dr. Moritz Busch's "Secret Pages of Bismarck's Life," which we reviewed some months ago.

Mr. Edward Step has now ready the first part of the edition of Anne Pratt's well-known work on the flowering plants of Great Britain which he is preparing for Messrs. Warne.

"Bye-ways of Crime" is the title of a forthcoming book by Mr. R. J. Power-Berrey, who has collected many stories of the Black Museum at Scotland Yard.

We understand that a book dealing with social life in Scotland in the eighteenth century is to come from Messrs. Black. The author, the Rev. H. Grey Graham, also devotes some space to religion in Scotland a hundred years ago, with the aid of contemporary records.

"Islam in Africa" is to be the title of the Rev. Mr. Patterbury's work, in which he describes Mahomedanism generally and the Mahdists of Northern Africa in particular. Messrs. Putnam are the publishers.

The New Century Press is about to issue the "Reminiscences of a Professional Politician." Some chapters have appeared in the New Century Review. The volume will contain a good many additional chapters, reminiscences of Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Goschen, Mr. Parnell, and others, and will be illustrated.

Another portrait gallery of famous cricketers is about to be published by Messrs. Newnes, under the title of "The Book of Cricket," with a descriptive text by Mr. C. B. Fry, in about fourteen sixpenny weekly parts. The full-page photographs will be supplemented by snapshots taken on the field.

"L'Œuvre de Eugène Carrière" is the title of an art work which is to be published by subscription in October next, containing a hundred large reproductions from the artist's works. Only 500 copies will be issued. Messrs. Williams and Norgate are the publishers.

Messrs. Hurst and Blackett are publishing an English edition of Edmund Planchut's "China and the Chinese," the first of the series of the "Livres d'Or de la Science" now being issued by Schleicher Frères, of Paris. It has been translated and edited by Mrs. Arthur Bell (N. D'Anvers), the well-known author of the "Elementary History of Art," the "Heroes of African Discovery," &c.

Mr. Zangwill's next long story will appear serially in Harper's Magazine.

"Zack," the anonymous author of "Life is Life," has finished a novel entitled "On Trust," which will be published in the autumn by Messrs. Blackwood.

"Silence Farm" is to be the title of the new book on which Mr. William Sharp has been engaged for some time past. It will be published by Mr. Grant Richards on the 13th of June.

Mrs. Comyns Carr's new novel, "The Arm of the Lord," will be published by Messrs. Duckworth next week.

Mr. Lloyd Bryce has recently finished two books, the first of which, "Lady Blanche's Salon, a Story of Some Souls," will be published simultaneously in England and America. The other is a revised edition of "Friends in Exile," a satire on the American diplomatic service.

There was a legend current in Calcutta at the end of the last century in regard to a lady who was supposed to have survived the horrors of the Black Hole and was carried to Murahidabad as a prisoner and eventually rescued and restored to her friends. This idea forms the basis of a new novel by Mr. Sydney C. Grier which Messrs. Blackwood are bringing out under the title of "Like Another Helen," during the early autumn. It is written in the form of letters. Mr. Grier is at present engaged upon the sequel to his last book, "A Crowned Queen."

LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

ARCHÆOLOGY.

Authority and Archaeology. Sacred and Profane. Ed. by David G. Hogarth. 9½x6in., xiv.+440 pp. London, 1899. Murray, 16s.

ARCHITECTURE.

The Cathedral Builders. The Story of a Great Masonic Guild. By Leader Scott. Illustrated. 9½x6in., xiii.+435 pp. London, 1899. Sampson Low, 21s.

BIOGRAPHY.

The King's Mother. A Memoir of Margaret Beaufort, Countess of Richmond and Derby. By Lady Margaret Domville. 7½x5in., 213pp. London, 1899. Burns & Oates, 3s.6d.

C. H. Spurgeon's Autobiography. Vol. III. 1856-1878. Compiled by His Wife and His Private Secretary. 11½x9in., 376 pp. London, 1899. Passmore & Alabaster, 10s. 6d.

CLASSICAL.

The Correspondence of M. Tullius Cicero. With a Revision of the Text, &c. By Robert V. Tyrrell, Litt.D., and Louis C. Purser, Litt.D. Vol. VI. 9x5in., cxvii.+347 pp. London, 1899. Longmans, 12s.

DRAMA.

Ezra. A Drama in Verse. By A. Duncan Goody. 9½x6in., 50 pp. London, 1899. Simpkin Marshall, 3s. n.

Caliban. A Philosophical Drama Continuing "The Tempest" of William Shakespeare. Translated from the French of Ernest Renan by Eleanor G. Vickery. 9½x6in., 68 pp. New York: Shakespeare Press. London: Kegan Paul, 7s. 6d.

EDUCATIONAL.

La Vieille Cousine, La Loterie de Francfort, Le Testament de Madame Paternal. Ed. by Marguerite Nivet. (Dont's Modern Language Series.) 6½x4in., 131 pp. London, 1899. Dent, 1s. 6d. n.

Cæsar: Gallic War. Book IV. Ed. by A. H. Alcroft, M.A., and T. R. Mills, M.A. (The University Tutorial Series.) Introduction, Text, and Notes. Cr. 8vo., iv.+84 pp. With Map. London, 1899. Clive, 1s. 6d.

FICTION.

The Dominion of Dreams. By Fiona Macleod. 7½x5in., 37 pp. London, 1899. Constable, 6s.

Frivolities. By Richard Marsh. 8x5in., 336 pp. London, 1899. Bowden, 6s.

In Vain. By Henryk Sienkiewicz. Translated by Jeremiah Curtin. 7½x5in., 237 pp. London, 1899. Dent, 4s. 6d. n.

The Day of Reckoning. 2nd Ed. By Silas K. Hocking. 8x5in., 137 pp. London, 1899. Warne, 3s. 6d.

Bearers of the Burden. By Major H. P. Drury. 7½x5in., 241 pp. London, 1899. Lawrence & Bullen, 3s. 6d.

The Captain of the Locusts. By A. Werner. (The Overseas Library.) 7½x4in., 256 pp. London, 1899. Unwin, 2s.

Mistress Content Crackdock. By Annie E. Trumbull. 7½x4in., 306 pp. London, 1899. Allenson, 6s.

Castle Czervarg. By Archibald Bird. 7½x5in., 226 pp. London, 1899. Longmans, 6s.

Ronald and I; or, Studies from Life. By Alfred Pretor. 7x4in., 188 pp. Cambridge, 1899. Deighton Bell.

Transgression. By S. S. Thorburn. 8x5in., 447 pp. London, 1899. Pearson, 6s.

The Little Legacy, and other Stories. By L. B. Watford. 8x5in., 307 pp. London, 1899. Pearson, 6s.

A Pauper Millionaire. By Austin Fryers. 7½x6in., 255 pp. London, 1899. Pearson, 3s. 6d.

In the Shadow of the Crown. By M. Bidder. 7½x5in., 335 pp. London, 1899. Constable, 6s.

Tattle Tales of Cupid. By Paul Leicester Ford. 7½x5in., 264 pp. London, 1899. Constable, 6s.

HISTORY.

Acts of the Privy Council. New Series. Vol. XVIII. A.D. 1589-90. Ed. by J. R. Dainton, C.B. 10½x6in., xxiii.+492 pp. London, 1899. Eyre & Spottiswoode, 10s.

Scottish Kings. A Revised Chronology of Scottish History. 1005-1625. By Sir A. H. Dunbar, Bt. 8½x5in., xv.+420 pp. Edinburgh, 1899. Douglas, 12s. 6d.

LAW.

First Steps in International Law. By Sir Sheraton Baker, Bt. 8x5in., xxxi.+428 pp. London, 1899. Kegan Paul, 12s.

LITERARY.

The Religion of Shakespeare. By Henry Sebastian Bowden. 7½x5in., xvi.+428 pp. London, 1899. Burns & Oates, 7s. 6d.

MILITARY.

The Oxfordshire Light Infantry Chronicle. 1898. Vol. VII. Compiled and Ed. by Major A. F. Mockler-Ferryman. 8½x5in., 292 pp. London, 1899. Eyre & Spottiswoode, 6s.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Mr. Dooley in Peace and War. 7x4in., 237 pp. London, 1899. Grant Richards, 3s. 6d.

The British Empire Dictionary of the English Language. Ed. by the Rev. & D. Price, F.G.S. 7½x5in., 826 pp. London, 1899. Newnes, 3s. 6d.

Kensington Palace. The Birthplace of the Queen. By Ernest Lavé, B.A. 7½x5in., 140 pp. London, 1899. G. Bell, 2s. n.

NATURAL HISTORY.

The Earth Life. By E. Longworth Dames. 7½x5in., 196 pp. London, 1899. Hedway, 5s. n.

PAMPHLETS.

The Question of Anglican Orders. By A. Bulgakov. Translated by W. J. Birkbeck, M.A. S.P.C.K. 6d.

The Origin of the "Original Hebrew" of Ecclesiastical. By D. S. Margoliouth, M.A. Parker.

Shakespeare converted into Bacon. An Extravaganza in Two Acts. By Samuel A. Cox. Dublin. Seely, 6d.

The Relations of Church and State. By Morris Fuller, D.D. Skeffington, 1s.

PHILOSOPHY.

The Psychology of Reasoning. By Alfred Binet. 7½x5in., 191 pp. London, 1899. Kegan Paul, 3s. 6d.

POETRY.

The Little Land. With Songs from its four Rivers. By Laurence Houseman. 8x5in., 97 pp. London, 1899. Grant Richards, 5s. n.

The Way of the Kingdom, and other Poems. By William Hall, M.A. 7½x5in., 232 pp. London, 1899. Sonnenschein, 2s. 6d. n.

Lyrics. By "Nemud." 7½x5in., 73 pp. London, 1899. Jarrold, 2s. 6d.

Poems of Love and Home. By George Washington Moon. 5½x4in., xiv.+267 pp. London, 1899. Longmans, 2s. 6d.

Odd Rhymes Verses; Imitations; Jingles. 7x4in., 64 pp. London, 1899. The Ideal Pub. Co. 1s. n.

Translations from Pushkin. In Memory of the Hundredth Anniversary of the Poet's Birthday. By C. E. Turner. 7½x5in., 323 pp. London, 1899. St. Petersburg: Ricker. London: Sampson Low.

The City of the Soul. 7x4in., 110 pp. London, 1899. Grant Richards, 5s. n.

REPRINTS.

Lady Audley's Secret. By M. E. Braddon. 8½x6in., 188 pp. London, 1899. Downey, 6d.

Black Beauty. By Anna Sewell. 7½x4in., 262 pp. London, 1899. Jarrold, 6d.

Barnaby Rudge. By Charles Dickens. Temple Ed. Two vols. 6x4in., 442+442 pp. London, 1899. Dent, 3s. n.

SCIENCE.

The Hereford Earthquake of Dec. 17, 1896. By Charles Davidson, Sc.D., F.G.S. 9x6in., x.+303 pp. Birmingham, 1899. Cornish.

Tables for Quantitative Metallurgical Analysis for Laboratory Use. By J. J. Morgan, F.C.S. 8½x6in., London, 1899. Griffin, 4s.

Gospel of the Stars; or, Wonders of Astrology. By Gabriel James Kingston, A.B. 7½x5in., 194 pp. New York, 1899. Continental Pub. Co. $1.00.

The Geography of Mammals. By William and Philip Lutley Selater. 8x6in., xviii.+335 pp. London, 1899. Kegan Paul, 12s. n.

SOCIOLOGY.

Le Crime. Causes et Remèdes. Par Cesare Lombroso. 9x5in., 583 pp. Paris, 1899. Schleicher, Fr. 10.

Critique de l'Economie Politique. Par Karl Marx. Traduit de l'allemand par Léon Remy. 7½x4in., 273 pp. Paris, 1899. Schleicher, Fr. 3.50.

THEOLOGY.

An Introduction to the Fifth Book of Hooker's Treatise of the Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity. By the Very Rev. Francis Paget, D.D. 9x6in., x.+205 pp. Oxford, 1899. Clarendon Press, 7s. 6d.

Le Nouveau Testament de Notre Seigneur Jésus-Christ. Version D'Ostervald Illustrée. 7x5in., xv.+576 pp. London, 1899. Nelson, 3s.

The Legend of St. Mark. Sunday Morning Talks to the Children. By the Rev. J. Rykes. 7½x5in., 188 pp. London, 1899. Unwin, 3s. 6d.

The Oxyrhynchus Papyri and the Apocryphal Gospels. By the Rev. C. Taylor, D.D. 8½x6in., 105 pp. Oxford, 1899. Clarendon Press, 2s. 6d. n.

A Sketch of Medieval Church History. By the Ven. S. Cheetham, D.D. 6½x4in., 128 pp. London, 1899. S.P.C.K. 1s. 6d.

TRAVEL.

Hints and Notes for Travelers in the Alps. By the late J. Ball, F.R.S., &c. New Ed. Prepared by W. A. B. Coolidge. 7½x5in., 164 pp. London, 1899. Longmans, 3s. n.

Norway, Sweden, and Denmark. By Karl Baedeker. 6x4in., lxxx.+463 pp. London, 1899. Dulau, 10s.

Three Pleasant Springs in Portugal. By Commander the Hon. H. N. Shore, R.N. 9x5in., 396 pp. London, 1899. Sampson Low, 12s. 6d.

Russia in Asia. A Record and a Study. 1556-1899. By Alexis Kraussé, 9x6in., xii.+411 pp. 1899. New York: Holt. London: Grant Richards, 2s.

The Cyclist's Guide to the English Lake District. By A. W. Rumney, M.A. 7½x5in., 94 pp. London, 1899. Philip, 2s. 6d. n.

Literature

Edited by H. D. Traill.

Published by The Times.

No. 86. SATURDAY, JUNE 10, 1899.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
Leading Article —The Publicity Department.....	589
"Among my Books," by the Rev. W. H. Hutton	602
Poem —"In the Churchyard," by Mr. Stephen Gwynn....	602
"Consequences," by Mr. E. F. Benson	604
Reviews —
A History of American Christianity	591
The Flora of Cheshire.....	592
A Thousand Days in the Arctic.....	593
The Works of Lord Byron	594
Prof. Arber's Anthologies—
The Shakespeare, Jonson, and Milton Volumes.....	594
The Cathedral Builders	595
The Column and the Arch	596
Oriental Books —
Zoroaster, the Prophet of Ancient Iran.....	596
A Century of Indian Epigrams.....	597
Lidzbarski's Handbuch—The Quran—The Epic of Ancient India—
Parsi, Jaina, and Sikh—The Ecclesiastical History of Eusebius—
First Steps in Assyrian—The Travels of Sidi Ali Reis	597, 598
Other New Books —
Pleasure and Leisure Boating—Dinners and Dinners—Our Gardens
—China and the Chinese—Imperial Rule in India—First Steps in International Law—The Romance of a Pro-consul—Robert Raikes —Memories of Half a Century—A Country Schoolmaster—New French Books—Urbs et Orbis—The Roman Primacy—Rome from the Inside—History of Dogma—Elements of the Science of Religion—Abraham and His Age—Sketch of Medieval Church History—Little's Annual Pleasure Diary—The Oxfordshire Light
Infantry Chronicle.....	598, 599, 600, 601
Fiction —
The Dominion of Dreams.....	612
A Literary Causerie [C. K. S.]	609
Foreign Letter —Italy	610
Literature in the Salon	611
From the Magazines, II.	612
Correspondence —Esmond and the "Higher Criticism" (Mr. Leslie Stephen)—Bohemian Literature (Count Lützow)—English Hexameters (Mr. C. C. Tarelli, Mr. W. J. Stillman, &c.).....	613, 614, 615
Notes	590, 607, 608, 609
Authors and Publishers	615, 616
List of New Books and Reprints	616

THE PUBLICITY DEPARTMENT.

The announcement that the illustrious Hungarian novelist, M. Maurus Jokai, has secured a special stall for the display of his literary wares at the forthcoming Paris Exhibition is, in the first place, merely of antiquarian interest. It reminds one of the glorious days of the Revival of Learning, when the book fair was no less respectable an institution than the cattle fair, and celebrated scholars made pilgrimages to Frankfort and other centres of the printing industry to look for new chronicles, new editions of the classics, and new volumes of theological disputation. The usefulness of fairs, however, as central bureaux of literary information belongs to a period which no living man remembers, or has even heard of from his grandfather; and we may take it that the scholars who make pilgrimages to the great French fair of 1900 will have quite other plans for their amusement than the inspection of a bookseller's stock-in-trade. Consequently, the new departure of M. Jokai can only be looked at from two points of view. We may regard it as a scholarly endeavour to reconstruct the Middle Ages—an author's humble contribution to "Old Paris." Or we may regard it as a bid for publicity of a characteristically modern kind. As advertisement is certain to result, it does not seem unfair to assume that advertisement is, in some measure at all events, intended; and this suggests the whole question of the limits within which advertisement is consistent with the dignity of letters.

VOL. IV. No. 23.

It is an important question, and one which daily increases in importance. But it is also a question beset with more difficulties than usually attend the problems of minor morals. The trouble is that the proverbial thin end of the wedge has inevitably to be admitted, and that—as is usual in the cases of conduct to which this metaphor applies—there is no absolutely conclusive reason why the progress of the wedge should be stopped at one particular point rather than another. Admitting that the simpler and more straightforward kinds of advertisement are permissible, one soon finds that the very same reasons which justify them can equally well be cited in support of the other kinds of advertisement which excite the horror of the man of taste. The casuist with his sovites can lead us on from one advertisement to the next, until he has proved that it is proper for the man of letters to make all the noise and employ all the wiles of the cheapjack; and we have no better answer than that we find his views revolting, and that, as theologians have contended, no man can fairly be held responsible for the logical conclusions of his own premises.

Let us observe how insidious is the chain of reasoning by which these terrible conclusions are substantiated. We have only to assume that there is no harm in writing books, and that a given man has written one. The action itself is a bid for publicity, though it is not generally considered incompatible with a modest and retiring disposition. Mindful of the Scriptural maxim that a lighted candle should be put in a candlestick and not under a bushel, he announces the fact by means of advertisements in newspapers. No one—least of all the editors of newspapers—will hold that he is to blame for doing that. Nor is it the custom to censure him for preferring to make his announcement in a newspaper with a large circulation, or for paying a special price to have it conspicuously displayed. He wishes it to salute the eyes of as many people as possible; and this is the most obvious means to an end that is generally admitted to be legitimate. But the most obvious means are not always the most efficacious. An author might easily feel that his announcement was more likely to burn itself into the public mind if it were made through the medium of the town crier or the sandwich-man; and though this method of advertisement would be better suited to a romance of crime than to a synthetic system of philosophy, it is hard to see how, on other grounds than those of expediency, objection can be taken to it. Sandwich-men, however, can only circulate advantageously by daylight, and the general public is most at leisure to attend to advertisements after nightfall. It follows that the case is complete for the advertisement of new books by flash-light in Trafalgar-square. To be informed of the best books is no less important—is perhaps even more important—to the community than to be informed of the best kind of beef-tea.

It remains to be considered how far an author is justified in using the charm of his personality for advertising purposes. In view of the reluctance of the public in general to accept any message to the world without examining the credentials of the messenger, it seems necessary, in this respect also, to allow considerable latitude. One author, on the eve of the publication of a new novel, gave a "private view" of himself to all the most influential journalists of the United Kingdom, bringing them down in a special train, and hiring a whole hotel to put them up in. Another author, purposing to lecture in America, let his hair grow until his impressario told him that it "would do" for the æsthetic audiences of the United States. Why not? Neither author, of course, increased the value of his message by his eccentricity. But, in each case, the hearing for it was successfully obtained, and its merits, if they had existed, could not possibly have escaped observation.

The situation, then, is roughly speaking this: that there is no extravagance of self-advertisement which the casuist cannot successfully defend, but that there are many kinds of self-advertisement which are a stumbling-block to that large majority of literary men in whom the instincts of the artist prevail over those of the mountebank. When a popular novelist, a little while ago, informed an interviewer that his forthcoming novel was, in the author's opinion, colossal, there was a very general complaint that this was not playing the game according to the rules. The advertiser, other authors said, was challenging them to a competition in which, as gentlemen, they did not feel inclined to engage, and taking an unfair advantage of their reluctance to spend the best part of their time in banging the big drum. They might, of course, as the Americans say, "go one better" than their rival by riding on the tops of omnibuses in canary-coloured suits, or having themselves cinematographed while in the throes of composition; but they would be very sorry to be compelled to do anything of the sort. They were, in fact—and still are—in a dilemma out of which one would be glad, if it were possible, to help them; but it is hard to see what profitable suggestion can be made. The appointment of a committee of prominent authors to inquire into and report upon the proper functions of the advertisement department of the literary industry is, perhaps, as practical a proposal as can be made; but one would hardly dare to be sanguine of the result of even that heroic measure. If such a committee could agree upon a report, it might, of course, successfully set a much-needed standard of good form; but would the assembled authors ever succeed in coming to an agreement? The picture, for example, of Mr. George Meredith and Mr. Hall Caine meeting at a round table to draft by-laws relating to the reception of interviewers is more calculated to excite the laughter of the profane than to inspire serious persons with any confidence as to the result.

There is an important article in the Author on the bearing of Lord Russell's Bill on the alleged "illicit profits" of the publishing trade. It shows that a publisher, who, acting as an author's agent, takes from printer, binder, or advertising agent any commission that is not disclosed and agreed to, will find clause 9 of that bill an awkward nut to crack. In another column Sir Walter Besant announces the existence of secret profits as a "certainty"; but the allegation that they exist has, we are told, "caused some consternation" among the members of the council of the Publishers' Association, who are anxious to investigate the matter. It is the attitude that would have been expected from a body of honourable men; and we hope it may soon be announced that the Publishers' Association (with the assistance, if necessary, of the Society of Authors) has set on foot an inquiry which will probe the matter to the bottom.

The practice of telling an author's story under pretence of reviewing his novel is evidently a growing one. In the Glasgow Herald Mr. John Bickerdyke complains that "out of the fourteen reviews of my last novel which have appeared up to the time of writing, seven tell practically the entire story"; and he protests that this is unfair. It certainly is; and—what is more important—it is also bad reviewing. The test of value of a piece of literary criticism on a book is that it shall be more interesting to those who have read the book than to those who have not, and that is a test which the story-telling review cannot stand. The former class find it dull; the latter class regard it with contempt. Reflection on this point will probably do more to induce indolent critics to mend their ways than any representations based upon the sacred principles of abstract justice.

Several papers have mentioned the discovery among Captain Dreyfus' papers of certain critical notes on M. Zola's naturalistic novels. The criticism, on the whole, is unfavourable; but the curious thing is that, though the prisoner critic was writing in perfect ignorance of the novelist's efforts for his deliverance, he brings into relief those very literary qualities which were so conspicuous in M. Zola's polemic on his behalf. He complains that he takes degrading views of human nature, and that "all that can in general be said of his bonhommes is that they are either brutes or fools"; but he adds that "one thing that no one can deny to Zola is imagination." Brutes and fools, it will be remembered, were the only characters that figured in the famous indictment of the general staff; while the imagination which enabled M. Zola to divine the story of the Dreyfus drama before the evidence had been produced, so accurately that the inquiry has borne out his conjectures even in matters of detail, is to-day the admiration of the world. We trust that author and critic will soon have the opportunity of exchanging compliments and congratulations.

Reviews.

A History of American Christianity. By Leonard Woolsey Bacon. With Preface by the Right Hon. James Bryce, M.P. 8½ x 5½ in., xliii. + 420 pp. London, 1899.

J. Clarke. 10/6

Though Dr. Bacon's work is quite good enough to stand on its own merits, Mr. Bryce's lucid, if somewhat over-didactic, preface forms an acceptable introduction to it, and none the less so because Mr. Bryce's pages bristle with generalizations of a more or less questionable description, over which the polemically-disposed reviewer might well work himself up, in default of self-command, to some degree of controversial heat. Few whose reading has followed the general lines of modern Church history and literature will agree with Mr. Bryce's opening statement that "little is known in Great Britain of the ecclesiastical and religious history of the United States"; and Dr. Bacon's volume, which is occupied to the extent of one-half with the Church history of the "Colonial Period," when the Churches, whether established or unestablished, of Great Britain and her American colonies stood in close connexion, shows that during that period the study of their history on this side of the Atlantic demanded some knowledge of their history in America as its indispensable complement. Nor has this mutual interest ever ceased, though it may have undergone some modification since the era of independence. And as Mr. Bryce, in his next page, notes the remarkable and increasing closeness of touch which exists between the religious thought and the theological scholarship of the United States and Britain, it may reasonably be concluded that English people still take considerable interest in the matter of such works as Dr. Bacon's, which is in itself so excellently arranged and written that we predict for it in this country a most favourable reception.

Dr. Bacon's literary skill almost makes the reader forget that the work is professedly an epitome. The epitome has been called "the moth of real history," because it spoils the whole fabric by eating out its choicest parts. Lament it as we may, the epitome is a necessity of our age; and this is especially true of the United States, where a public eager for knowledge has no time or energy to waste, must pass as quickly as possible through the school in which it learns—assimilating what it picks up as well as it can—cares less for methods than for results, and wants the net outcome of everything stated in about a dozen lines. Dr. Bacon's thoroughly readable volume is a miracle of compression, and is as nearly as possible a model of impartiality. Yet in such a subject every competent writer must needs be to some extent and in his heart of hearts a partisan, and the temptation to shoot a furtive Parthian arrow at opponents may exousably prove irresistible. Dr. Bacon now and then succumbs to this temptation, and he can afford to do so. His brief sketch of early Catholic Christianity in Spanish America is, from the historical critic's point of view, the weakest part of the book. Here he follows with somewhat irritating obsequiousness in a well-worn and not very correctly engineered track. He designates the concurrent extension of the Spanish domination and the Catholic faith "a strange, but not unparalleled story of attempted co-operation in the common service of God and Mammon and Moloch—of endeavours after concord between Christ and Belial." Such expressions savour rather of the heated fume of pulpit and platform than of the placid atmosphere of the historian's cabinet. Dr. Bacon also regards the "subsidizing of the Church by the Spanish Government"—in other words, its establishment in America on the footing then universal throughout Christendom—as "a serious injury inflicted on the cause of the Gospel." It would be interesting to know by what other method he thinks the Gospel could have been spread with equal rapidity and security among savages and semi-savages, fanatically attached to their own hideous superstitions. No dispassionate reader of aboriginal American history can doubt that the Spanish conquest and the spread of Christianity were for the mass of the natives an inestimable boon, and that, despite the cruelty and injustice which the conquest in some of its aspects involved, both Mexico and Peru were immeasurably happier and more prosperous after it than before it.

In Dr. Bacon's methodical and well-written outline of the progress of the established and unestablished Churches of English America, during a period now close on three hundred years, we shall not stay to remark occasional deficiencies. An epitome—and the volume contains only 420 pages in fairly large and very legible type—is in its nature a work in which much interesting matter is necessarily passed over or merely hinted at. We rather dwell on the fact that the writer evinces the true historian's instinct of giving prominence, in a few pregnant facts, to the leading features, whether favourable or reverse, in the character of men and movements. Thus, in the height of the "Great Awakening," as the Methodist movement has been somewhat pompously styled, Whitefield's indifference to truth is well illustrated from his Journal at Boston:—

The critical historian has the unusual satisfaction, at this point, of finding a gauge by which to discount the large round numbers given in Whitefield's Journal. He speaks of preaching in the Old South Church to 6,000 persons. The now venerable building had at that time a seating capacity of about 1,200. Making the largest allowance for standing room, we may estimate his actual audience at 2,000. Whitefield was an honest man, but 66 per cent. is not too large a discount to make from his figures; his estimates of spiritual effect from his labour are liable to a similar deduction.

Everybody who remembers the inside of the disused "Old South"—happily preserved and now utilized as a museum—will feel sure that in these figures its capacity for accommodation is not under-estimated. "Honest man," forsooth! We suppose Dr. Bacon to mean, by the words we have italicized, that Whitefield's sincerity as a religionist is above suspicion. That has nothing to do with the point. No theatre manager forms a better estimate of the numbers in the "house" on a given occasion than does the professional pulpiteer. To suppose that Whitefield honestly believed himself to have preached to 6,000 people at once inside the "Old South" is surely to practise the most excellent gift of charity to an extent far beyond its proper limits. Dr. Timothy Cutler, once rector of Yale College, describes, in terms which are probably none too strong, the effect of his harangues:—

It would be an endless attempt to describe the scene of confusion and disturbance occasioned by him; the division of families, neighbourhoods, and towns, the contrariety of husbands and wives, the undutifulness of children and servants, the quarrels among teachers, the disorders of the night, the intermission of labour and business, the neglect of husbandry and of gathering the harvest. . . . In many conventicles and places of rendezvous there has been checkered work indeed, several preaching and several exhorting and praying at the same time, the rest crying or laughing, yelping, sprawling, fainting; and this revel maintained in some places many days and nights together without intermission; and then there were the blessed outpourings of the Spirit! . . . After him came one Tennent, a monster! impudent and noisy, and told them they were all damn'd, damn'd, damn'd; this charmed them, and in the most dreadful winter I ever saw people wallowed in the snow night and day for the benefit of his beastly brayings, and many ended their days under these fatigues. Both of them carried more money out of these parts than the poor could be thankful for.

Such was the "Great Awakening." There was nothing particularly novel about it. "To preach loud, long, and damnation," one John Selden had remarked many years before, "is the way to be cry'd up." Seventy years pass, and we come to the "Revival" period, of which Dr. Bacon gives a graphic description:—

Sudden outcries, hysteric weeping and laughter, faintings, catalepsies, trances, were customary concomitants of the revival preaching. Multitudes fell prostrate on the ground, "spiritually slain," as it was said. Lest the helpless bodies should be trampled on by the surging crowd, they were taken up and laid in rows on the floor of the neighbouring meeting-house. Some lay quiet, unable to move or speak. Some talked, but could not move. Some beat the floor with their heels. Some, shrieking in agony, bounded about, it is said, like a live fish out of water. Many lay down and rolled over and over for hours at a time. Others rushed wildly over the stumps and benches, and then plunged, shouting "Lost! Lost!" into the forest.

Dr. Bacon quotes from contemporary authorities some curious particulars of the pathological effect commonly produced by the "revival" mania. A nervous epidemic set in, taking several distinct forms, one of which was known as "the jerks." It began in the head, and spread rapidly to the feet. "The head would be thrown from side to side so swiftly that the features would be blotted out and the hair made to snap. When the body was affected the sufferer was hurled over hindrances that came in his way, and finally dashed on the ground, to bounce about like a ball." An eye-witness says:—

"I have passed a meeting-house where I observed the undergrowth had been cut for a camp-meeting, and from fifty to one hundred saplings were left breast-high on purpose for persons who were 'jerked' to hold on to. I observed where they had held on they had kicked up the earth as a horse stamping flies. . . . I believe it does not affect those naturalists who wish to get it to philosophize about it, and rarely those who are the most pious; but the lukewarm, lazy professor is subject to it. The wicked fear it and are subject to it. But the persecutors are more subject to it than any; and they have sometimes cursed and sworn and damned it while jerking."

American Christianity, of course, has better things to show than this. It has never displayed much originality, for the Mormons are the only strictly original sect which America has produced. It has followed, with close fidelity, the movement of religious thought and feeling in England. It has adopted Unitarianism and Theism, has felt, and felt strongly, the reaction in favour of Catholicism, and has been influenced, in a larger degree than many in this country are aware, by Tractarianism. Those most familiar with the story of the "Oxford Movement" know well how confidently Newman and his followers anticipated a parallel movement in the Episcopal Church of the United States, and how sedulously they strove to draw its bishops and clergy into the fold of the new Anglicanism of which they aspired to be the founders. Nor were they altogether disappointed. But a Tractarianism having any real vitality can scarcely be anything but a halting-place. As Newman flung himself into the gulf of Catholicism, and his most distinguished henchman ended a long life of vigorous thought by advocating Arianism, so in America the function of "high" Anglicanism seems fated to be that of feeding either the stream of Romanism on the one hand, or that of Unitarianism on the other.

The Flora of Cheshire. By the late Lord De Tabley. Edited by Spencer Moore. With a Biographical Notice of the Author. By Sir Mountstuart Grant Duff. 8½ x 5½ in., xxiv. + 308 pp. London, 1890. Longmans, 10/6

The chief contents of this elaborate botanical catalogue are for botanists alone. Its publication, at the instance of the author's sister, is due, we learn from the preface, to the advice of "several distinguished men of science," and also to the hope that "a fitting memorial would thus be perpetuated to the memory of one whose name will now live evergreen among the scientific annals of the country and in connexion with the plants he loved so well." The hope may be fulfilled; but if so, its fulfilment will not be wanting in a touch of irony. For we can hardly doubt that if Lord De Tabley loved plants well he loved poetry better; and little as he strove for a fame to which he had more right than many of the contemporaries of his who attained it, it is probable that he would have preferred to survive even for a few years as a remembered poet than to "live evergreen among the scientific annals of the country." This memorial of him is, of course, to anybody but an expert, not to say an enthusiast in the subject, as unreadable as a Post Office Directory; but Sir Mountstuart Grant Duff has happily taken the opportunity of its appearance to furnish a short biographical memoir of the author, a friend of many years' standing, united to him by community of literary and scientific tastes. It is an attractive but a too brief sketch of an interesting and engaging personality, which we confess we should have been glad to study in more detail and on a larger canvas.

Lord De Tabley suffered like more than one of his poetic contemporaries from the circumstances of time and public taste in which he first presented himself to the literary world. His earliest volume, "Præterita," appeared in 1863, his latest—if we except the one last volume published after a silence of twenty years—in 1873, and there is perhaps no decennial period in the second half of the century which was less propitious for the advent of a new poet of merit. Sir Mountstuart Grant Duff institutes rather a fanciful comparison between Lord De Tabley's poetry and the second of three different kinds of Tokay. Of these varieties

The first [he says] was made of the juice that flowed from the ripe grapes thrown together; the second was made by the ordinary operations of the wine press out of grapes from which the husks and all extraneous matter had been carefully removed; while the third was the product of grapes, husks, and stalks all crushed up together. To these three kinds of Tokay correspond three kinds of poetry. The first is that spontaneous, inevitable poetry, which, once read, becomes a possession for ever; the second is the product of high intelligence, great cultivation, and infinite art, acting on the material supplied by fancy, imagination, and a highly emotional nature; the third is the kind of poetry which men sit down to write deliberately, thereby from time to time achieving something good, but for the most part loading our shelves with printed matter which had better be at the bottom of the Atlantic.

"Lord de Tabley's poetry," says his biographer, "seems to me to belong to the second of these classes." In saying this he of course accords it, while obviously intending to deny it, the highest place; for the so-called "spontaneous and inevitable poetry," which is supposed to flow forth without the assistance of intelligence, cultivation, and art, is in truth an imaginary kind of poetry, undiscoverable, at least to the extent of more than a stray line or two, by any one save those who insist on confounding Walt Whitman's (often magnificent) raw material of poetry with the completed artistic product. That Lord de Tabley failed to produce great poetry is not due, then, to the fact that he comes into his biographer's second class, which, as we have said, is really the highest category: it was for the eminently simple and commonplace reason that the matter of his poetry—the theme, the thought, the emotion—is rarely of the highest order, and that his poetic manner, though it seldom fails in dignity and distinction, has no very conspicuous charm. Its faults of technique, which are sometimes distressing, might be forgiven, though the quality of merey has indeed to be strained on behalf of a poet who rhymes "hover" with "Jehovah"; but the trouble is that when the workmanship is without serious blemish it seldom attains that pitch of excellence which the thought requires. Nevertheless, and without claiming a place for Lord De Tabley in the first flight of poets, there can be no sort of doubt that he has never got anything like his deserts in the matter of poetic reputation. The poem which his biographer quotes in full, "An Ocean Grave," is one of singular beauty—as rare and admirable in its restrained power of expression, as in the intensity of its underlying pathos; and had it been published under the more favourable auspices which to-day attend new ventures in poetry, it could hardly have failed to gain a hearing. But Lord De Tabley left off writing poetry in the seventies, and only resumed it again with the publication of "Poems Dramatic and Lyrical," a few years before his death. And the world does not readily reverse its estimate of a poet, especially when to do so would involve an admission of its having done him grave injustice in the past.

The letters of Lord De Tabley which Sir Mountstuart Grant Duff has selected for publication are well chosen, and enable us to form a very pleasing picture of the writer. His scattered observations on literary subjects are always acute and interesting, and even the botanical lore on which he exchanges ideas with his fellow-botanist is often illuminated by a touch of humour or fancy, which saves it from wearying the uninitiated. Here is a good specimen of him in his lighter mood:—

It is really very good of you to return with a piece of Dittany in your portmanteau. You remember our experience with the cat and the root of Valerian—and this is evidently a case for repeating something of the kind. The ingredients are simple and I must merely ask you to borrow a goat and a bow and arrows from any of your neighbours who have a turn for archery. In the cause of science you must not allow the inconvenience of the animal to weigh with you for a moment. Take the goat into the centre of your lawn and riddle it with arrows, some of which must stick, like St. Sebastian. Then show the goat the Dittany, and if he is a classically minded goat and worthy of his Cretan ancestors who nursed Jupiter he will or ought to rub his wounded portion against the Dittany and by so doing extract the arrows. If he does you will have covered yourself and family with eternal honour.

ARCTIC EXPLORATION.

A Thousand Days in the Arctic. By Frederick G. Jackson. With a Preface by Admiral Sir F. L. McClintock. With Illustrations and Maps. Two vols. 9½ x 6½ in., xxii. + 551 + xvi. + 580 pp. London, 1899. Harper. 32/-

In these two handsome volumes we have the long-promised narrative of the Jackson-Harmsworth Expedition to Franz Josef Land. It appears in the form of extracts from Mr. Jackson's journal—modestly described by the author as a statement of "plain facts penned by a plain man." The work will appeal in different ways to two classes of readers. As a story of life and adventure in the uninhabited regions of the Far North it will delight thousands who care little about the advancement of science; while the few who know that Polar exploration is more than a mere bootless and perilous pastime will rejoice at the solid additions which it makes to our knowledge. The former class will, no doubt, find it less thrilling than Dr. Nansen's second volume, and it lacks much of the human interest which Peary's relations with the Eskimo gave to his book; but as a record of perseverance under difficulties it is inferior to neither of these works, while the illustrations are very well chosen and are, many of them, of exceptional merit. Mr. Jackson's description of his adventures and of the explorers' daily life convey as clear an impression of his surroundings as his own excellent photographs, and the most experienced writer need wish for no higher praise. There is some repetition that might have been avoided, as in the daily record of the weather and the aurora, of which there is a quite sufficient summary in the appendix; but this defect is less noticeable in the second volume. The maps compare most favourably with those of some recent explorers. If any one would appreciate the importance of this part of the work, he has only to contrast the map of Franz Josef Land, as known in 1894, at the beginning of the first volume with the final map, which embodies the discoveries of the expedition. Mr. Jackson may claim, with Dr. Nansen's help for a small part of the area, to have revolutionized our knowledge of the whole region. Instead of large masses of land with an indefinite extension to north and west, Franz Josef Land is now shown to be but a small archipelago, with no single island of any great size. Had this been known earlier, the plans of the expedition for pushing north, and those of Dr. Nansen in his retreat to the south, would have been materially modified. The previous expeditions of the Austrians and of Mr. Leigh Smith were precluded by their misfortunes and by inadequate sledging equipment from accurate surveying work; and perhaps the too lively imagination of Payer, practised observer though he was, contributed to cause some trouble to his successors. Mr. Jackson himself, with all his praiseworthy zeal for fact, explains the difficulties of the situation:—

Anything I am not absolutely sure of I am omitting entirely from the map. Better have nothing than have it wrong. It is an extremely difficult country to survey owing to the constant mists, refraction, the abominable climate generally, and also to the fact that some of the basaltic rocks . . . are magnetic and cause local deviation of the compass.

The net result of the expedition may be said to prove that Franz Josef Land, owing to its small extent and the constant prevalence of open water, is a very unsuitable base for approach to the Pole. Preconceptions, however, die hard in Arctic as in other matters; and hence it is, we must suppose, that last year an American, and now an Italian, expedition have selected this route for an advance to the north. Mr. Jackson had intended to devote a fourth year to this object, but we fancy that his own and Dr. Nansen's experiences could have left him little hope of success.

The most striking incident in these pages is, of course, the meeting of Nansen and Jackson off Cape Flora. Dr. Nansen, indeed, in his ignorance of the route that lay before him, seems hardly disposed to look upon his reception in the light of "a rescue." But Mr. Jackson, who already knew something of the steep inhospitable western coast, and was soon to know much more, is of a different opinion. This is what he says upon the subject:—

Providence alone brought him to such a spot, failing which the end of his expedition . . . would have been very different. Had he missed meeting with us he could not have left Franz Josef Land, for the extension of that country towards Spitzbergen is quite unlike what Nansen and every one else believed it to be; and a stretch of practically open sea of more than 160 miles in extent (as we found it to be in 1897) lying between Cape Mary Harmsworth and the nearest known land—White Island or Cape Leigh Smith—cannot be crossed in leaky canvas canoes. I consider a retreat by way of Novaya Zemlia to be infinitely preferable; and Nansen and I have had numberless arguments upon this point without either party changing his opinion. . . . I only trust that Dr. Nansen's extraordinary immunity from penalty will not lead the inexperienced to suppose that one may go lurking about within the Polar circle with merely a dog and a gun, and that all things will be well with them. If they should fall into this error they will be sadly—I almost said fatally—deceived.

Abundant details are given of the numerous bear and walrus hunts, in which the camera played as large a part as the gun, or of the sledging expeditions, where Mr. Jackson introduced a novelty in the shape of Russian ponies. One extract will show the metal of which the expedition was made. The incident occurred during a voyage along the western coast in an im-seaworthy whaleboat, when a fearful storm sprang up just at a point where landing was impracticable.

The sea rapidly increased, and huge breakers threatened to swallow us up every moment. They rose like mountains over our heads, and each one seemed about to engulf us. Snow and sleet continued throughout the night, and we could not see the land at all. It was bitterly cold, and we were very tired and hungry, but the boat required such constant attention in baling out seas and other work, and there were such difficulties in the way of getting food that taking any was out of the question. Thus we rode out the night, expecting every moment to go down. . . . Every one was more or less cheerful, although one or two looked very much concerned; but I saw no fear in any one's face, and all obeyed orders promptly.

ANOTHER BYRON VOLUME.

The Works of Lord Byron. Poetry. Vol. II. Edited by Ernest Hartley Coleridge. 8½ x 6 in., xxiv. + 525 pp. London, 1899. Murray. 6/-

In the new volume of Mr. Murray's definitive edition, as we suppose it should be called, of Byron's works (Poetry Vol. II.) the editor has given us "Childe Harold" in as complete a form as regards both text and annotations as any one, whether critic, student, or admirer "unattached" of the poet, could reasonably desire. That is to say, it would be possible for any one of these three persons to gather from it all the information he is likely to need on the following points:—(1) the form of the poem as finally approved by the author; (2) the original draft of it as it left his hands for his publishers; (3) the observations with which, by way either of note or preface, he thought fit to accompany it; (4) the remarks which were appended to a portion of it by the poet's friend and adviser, Hobhouse; and, lastly (5), the critical and other elucidations which the present editor has judged both text and notes to require. But though information on each of these various heads may, as we have said, be extracted from it, we cannot say that the process of extraction is easy. We fully appreciate the difficulties with which Mr. Ernest Coleridge was confronted in his heroic endeavour to group all this explanatory and commentarial matter round the text of the poem, but it is impossible to approve of the particular method by which he has essayed to grapple with them. He has attempted too much on the page, and has not relegated enough to the appendix. Thus, although he tells us in the preface that "Byron's notes to the first, second, and third cantos are printed, according to precedent, at the end of each canto," this statement does not apply to the notes which the poet appended to certain stanzas of the original draft which were rejected in the final revision. These are printed as footnotes, and the consequence of this is the too frequent occurrence of such chaotic pages as, for instance, p. 40. Here we begin with two lines of the finally approved text, which are followed by five lines in italics forming a portion of a rejected stanza. Next follows an eighteen line note within square brackets, which is the editor's comment on an allusion in one of the first of the italicized lines. Then comes a four-line note which the fifth of the italicized lines suggested to Byron, and which itself suggests three more square-bracketed notes to the editor. Here, then, we have no fewer than five different sorts of printed matter on the same page—namely, first, approved text; secondly, rejected draft; thirdly, editor's annotation of rejected draft; fourthly, author's annotation of rejected draft; fifthly, editor's note to author's annotation of rejected draft. It is fortunate—or from the "record making" point of view, perhaps unfortunate—that Mr. Coleridge did not require to annotate either of the two lines of the approved text, since in that case the addition of a sixth ingredient to this witches' caldron of text and commentary would have made the charm complete. Even as it is, however, the reader is left with Roman and italic type, bracketed notes and unbracketed whirling wildly with numeral and asterisk, obelus and double dagger, through his confused brain. Surely this tumultuous performance might have been easily avoided by strictly reserving the page to approved text and editorial annotations, which are generally judicious and useful and rarely superfluous, and by consigning the rejected portions of the draft with the authorial and editorial notes thereon to an appendix.

These are quite interesting enough to deserve separate study, representing as they do the poet's design, which he was happily induced to abandon, of introducing variations in his poem of "a droll or satirical character." There are good things in these attacks on the Convention of Cintra, on Lord Elgin of the Marbles, &c., but undoubtedly the poem, as a whole, is well rid of them. And we agree with Mr. Coleridge that Childe Harold should not be regarded merely as a "treasury of brilliant passages," but should be read as a whole "continuously and with some attention to the style and message of the author." Only thus, indeed, can we appreciate the extraordinary superiority in poetic quality—surely a greater disparity than exists between any two parts of any other famous poem—of the third and fourth cantos to the first and second. One can hardly believe that the prosaic doggerel of much of the earlier cantos came from the same brain and hand as the splendid rhetorical declamation of the two later, where the poetry of Byron, still, as always, rough, careless, and inartistic, is informed over long stretches of its flight by a force and fire that irresistibly carry the reader captive. We are glad to see that Mr. Coleridge is wisely sensible of the poet's technical defects, and does not add another to the list of those apologists who expended so much futile ingenuity in the newspapers some years ago in the defence of the famous "there let him lay." Mr. Coleridge's simple, and no doubt perfectly correct, explanation of the grammatical solecism is that Byron "wrote as he spoke, 'with the careless and negligent ease of a man of quality.'"

SEVENTEENTH CENTURY LYRICS.

British Anthologies. Edited by Professor Arber, F.S.A. IV. The Shakespeare Anthology, 1592-1616. V. The Jonson Anthology, 1617-1637. VI. The Milton Anthology, 1638-1674. 7½ x 5 in., 312 + 312 + 312 pp. London, 1899. Henry Frowde. 2/6 each. Vol.

In this series, three numbers of which are now issued, Professor Arber intends to give representative selections from English poetry which are to cover the whole field from 1400 to 1800. The compiler has confined himself to pieces which are complete in themselves, or, at least, such as can be taken out of their context without injury. Accordingly, though the title-page does not say so, this is practically a lyric anthology. It differs, however, from others in that the aim is not to select the best poems of the best kinds, but typical examples of all kinds, special attention being given to authors and kinds which are little known. There are few byways of English literature which Professor Arber has not found out; and all who love England owe him a debt of gratitude for rescuing from forgetfulness many a poem or story that stirs the blood. The fruit of his wide knowledge is seen here also. Many of the writers are but names to most of us; many are not even mentioned in the ordinary histories of literature; and some very interesting pieces are reprinted from anonymous broadside sheets.

It will be noted that each volume is named after the most prominent figure of the period it deals with; but this does not mean that the name-poet occupies a large part of the book. Thus in the Shakespeare Anthology Shakespeare has sixteen pages; Ben Jonson has thirty, and Milton twenty-two in the books named after them. There are forty or fifty known poets in each book. Some poets appear in more than one volume, since each volume has a definite time-limit. Each volume has a list of the poets prefixed, with birth and death dates, and at the end two indices—(1) first lines, with bibliographical reference; (2) glossary and index of names.

Such is the plan of the work: it remains to consider how far it has been successful. As regards the selection of verse, we miss a few of our own especial favourites, but that was inevitable. We realize more fully, each time we see a new anthology, the almost boundless wealth of English poetry. Out of three nine hundred pages there are very few which are not worth reading as poetry; and these are generally worth reading for some other cause. There are political pieces, for example, or social satires, or the criticism of a poet on poets. Others have an interest from the circumstances in which they were written, or from what came of them. Thus Raleigh writes on the eve of execution; and Henry Vaughan in 1650 writes a poem which, a hundred and fifty years later, suggested to Wordsworth his "Intimations of Immortality."

The Shakespeare volume opens with a burst of song which fairly takes one's breath away. Those sixteen pages alone would make a poet immortal—as true a singer as any throstle or lark. The same volume contains some charming country songs of Nicholas Breton's, Constable's love ditties, and others by Raleigh, Marlowe, Heywood, and Campion. There are spirited hunting and drinking songs, and Beaumont's Epistle to Ben Jonson. Some of the finest pieces in the book are without names—"Fain would I change that note," for example, which, ever since Mr. Bullen discovered it, has taken rank among the noblest of English lyrics; and "I saw my lady weep." In the volume named of Jonson we have fewer men of mark: but there are some remarkable broadsides. "From Oberon in Fairyland" has the real magic in it; there is humour in "Blue Cap for me" and "When this old Cap was new"; the poem "Love will find out the way" shows a fine ear for rhythm. However, we could have spared Patrick Hannay. The Milton volume has also its fairy song, one worthy of the best age, the "Queen of Fairies." Milton and Herrick would make any volume rare and fine; but how had Professor Arber the heart to leave out that little gem of perfection—

Here a solemn fast we keep,
While all beauty lies asleep.
Hushed be all things: no noise here
But the toning of a tear,
Or a sigh, of such as bring Cewslips for her covering.

Waller, Lovelace, and Davenant are well represented; and there are some excellent songs—"The Leather Bottel," "Come Lasses and Lads," "To all ye Ladies now on Land." The broadsides here are chiefly political.

We would offer one or two criticisms on the editorial part. Why does Professor Arber affect the mark of exclamation to such an extraordinary extent? It is positively a disfigurement to the book. There are sometimes six in a single line, thirty or more on a page. Again, the spelling should not be modernized if this injures the scansion. Thus in Shakesp. Anth., p. 21, we must read "commandement"; p. 18, probably "heartes renying." Explanations look uncouth in the middle of a line, thus: "I, I [Aye, Aye]." Children would inevitably read straight ahead. The Glossary is not nearly full enough. Thus "manured" means "tilled" (Shakesp. Anth. 32), and if unexplained the suggestion is ludicrous. We have noted a number of such phrases, which are sure to be misunderstood or not understood, in each volume. We hope Mr. Arber will revise the Glossary; there is plenty of room in the pages.

For the student these books have a value. They are of little use in estimating a poet; but of great use in tracing a tendency or estimating the quality of a period. To take the love poems, for example. The Shakespeare volume is full of conceits, but there is passion too; by degrees the passion wanes, the lover laughs at himself, and the whole thing becomes a joke. Campion sings: "Shall I come, sweet love, to thee When the evening beams are set," so as to impress us that the thing is real. With Suckling and Wither, love is a game: "Out upon it! I have loved Three whole weeks together!" But side by side with this is another change. The Elizabethan love is largely the love of the healthy animal; Shirley and Cartwright strike a new note and sing of the love which grows not old:— ἔσται κἀν πολιταίν ἔρω.

So, too, the political unrest of the seventeenth century reacts upon poetry to its hurt. We do but glance at these points, there is no time to go into them fully. We took up these books rather inclined to think they were not wanted; we lay them down, convinced that they are. We believe, moreover, that they will excite a great interest in the less-known parts of our literature; and we wish Prof. Arber's "Anthologies" all the success they deserve.

ARCHITECTURE.

The Cathedral Builders: the Story of a Great Masonic Guild. By Leader Scott. 9½ x 6½ in., xlii. + 435 pp. London, 1899. Sampson Low. 21/-

The title of this work is an attractive, but inaccurate, one. The "Comacine Masters," to whom "Leader Scott" would attribute every important development in Christian architecture, are mentioned in a Lombard document of the seventh century; but they were not specially builders of cathedrals. The authoress not only dwells at length on their humbler churches, but devotes chapters to their civil architecture, and even to the painting and sculpture which she supposes to have been done by members of the guild. She is the prophet, or the victim, of a theory; she bases her large and learned treatise on the must-have-been. How did all the noble monuments of the great church-building era spring up simultaneously all over Europe? she asks. There must have been a "huge universal brotherhood of architects and sculptors," and this brotherhood must have been the Comacine Guild. That the artists of the Middle Ages formed themselves into guilds is known to everybody; and the information which is here given us about these early trade unions is extremely thorough and useful. The bond of union between architects no doubt led to the similarity between the development of various styles; but it is just where we look for traces of the Comacines that the evidence breaks down. "Leader Scott" would have them to be a mysterious brotherhood, in the discovery of whose importance "the chain of art history takes a new and changed aspect," and "becomes one continuous whole from early Christian Rome to the Rome of Raphael and Michael Angelo." It is strange, she remarks, that art historians have made so little of the Comacine masters. To us it is not less strange that she should have made so much. Considering the nimbus of legend that envelopes the history of masonry, from the Freemasons downwards, we are always prepared for new wonders; but the continued existence of a "universal fraternity" through the cataclysms of a thousand years does call for some little proof. There is a gap, as the writer coyly admits, of a "century or two" between Constantine and the real seventh century Comacines of Lombardy, and another between that Lombard Guild and the "early cathedral builders" of the eleventh and twelfth centuries: and all the evidence we are given of the continuity of the all-powerful "brotherhood" is a certain vague similarity of organization and nomenclature. As for organization, it would be a miracle if there were no similarity between societies of artists at different periods; and the survival of a few very general words like magister proves nothing. What else could a master workman be called in an age when Latin was freely used? It would be as safe to argue that our English Universities are "Lodges" of the Comacine Guild because they retain not only magister but collegium.

But our authoress would see a further proof in the continuance of "Comacine" ornament. Wherever an abundance of symbolism is to be found, there we may be sure one of the mystical and mythical masters has been at work; and besides, there is a certain interlaced style of ornament made up of a single strand; it is found, of early date, in Rome, and on all the genuine Comacine work in Lombardy, which proves that the Comacine artists had come from Rome. Nay, it may prove that this wonderful guild was founded by Solomon, for is not the interlaced strand called Solomon's Knot? Nevertheless, it disappears after the eleventh century, and so we must look for the guild's mystic signature elsewhere. The "Lion of Judah" comes to our relief, and links the medieval builders with the Lombards of the dark ages, or perhaps again with Solomon himself. Whenever we see a pillar resting on a lion we may think unutterable things. Nay, masonry itself may be a sign of these wonderful masters who had so many ways of making themselves known. Of our own St. Bartholomew's, Smithfield, we are told that "the masonry is the true Comacine style." For ourselves we have a suspicion that the great guild may be eternal as well as universal, and that the Science Museum at South Kensington is one of its modern triumphs.

The fact seems to be that "Leader Scott" has been carried off her feet by a recent Italian work of the late Professor Merzario, which she has taken as her basis. Its very title is enough to raise suspicion—" I Maestri Comacini. Storia Artistica di Mille duecento anni, 600—1800." Even in the present book the Professor is accused of being "bewildering in his redundancy, confusing in his arrangement, and not sufficiently clear in his deductions." After conscientiously working through this volume we cannot avoid the conclusion that the writer has borrowed not only the Professor's theories but his faults. Yet "The Cathedral Builders" contains much interesting criticism and useful historic information, not to mention its eighty-three excellent illustrations. It might have become a standard work upon architectural guilds if the writer had never seen the Professor's book, or heard of that ancient employers' liability act of November, 643, in which King Rothar dealt with the building accidents of certain "Magistri Comacini" and their colleagues.

The Column and the Arch: Essays on Architectural History, with Illustrations. By William P. P. Longfellow. 8½ x 5½ in., 301 pp. London, 1899. Sampson Low. 10/6

Mr. Longfellow, an American writer, has given us a work of real technical value which will yet be found of great interest to all those who care (and who does not nowadays?) for architecture. He begins with the Egyptian lotus, the flower which fitly gave birth to the column among the flower-loving fathers of civilization. Yet even here architecture did not escape the cruel law of decline; the lotus column lost its exquisite conventionalism, became bloated, and died of the jerry-builder on the Theban plains. The Greek took up the column and founded on it his own architecture, limited in its perfection, perfect in its limitations. Then came the Roman, whom Mr. Longfellow deprives of his popular laurels. This person took the arch from his Etruscan and the column from his Greek subjects; he was a practical man, and he combined, or allowed his foreign artists to combine, the column with that humble creation of the bricklayer, the arch. The arch was set between the columns; and this was the first great development in architecture, giving an enormous increase of power and flexibility, such as the Roman, a heaper up of palaces, desired. With it came many new details—the brackets, window-caps, and, above all, the keystone, a member which harmonized the arch with the "order," and the senseless modern use of which (both in building and literature) Mr. Longfellow justly criticizes.

Architecture still remained "classical"; the entablature still crowned the column and its lowly ally the arch. In conservative Rome, indeed, it always held its own, as Mr. Longfellow shows in his chapter on St. Maria Maggiore; for, from the architect's point of view, M. Zola is right—Rome, obsessed with the spirit of the Cæsars, has admitted less of distinctively Christian architecture than any other city. It was elsewhere, in the East, that the next development arose; and still the vital points are the column and the arch, for it was the setting of the arch directly upon the column that killed the "order," and broke up the classical style. Rome went on faithfully reproducing the past, while life returned to the East and then passed to the North. But the Eternal City kept the magic of her name, and the next great development in the North was called "Romanesque," one of the worst acts of injustice which a great nation has had to endure. For it was the Germans who invented Romanesque architecture; even the Lombard style is really, of course, Teutonic, and that curious style apart, Tuscan Romanesque, so beautiful in its refined sobriety, owes much to German elements. In Romanesque architecture took its largest step; the whole classical idea of design was changed; for now size was reached by increasing the number of elements, and not as heretofore their scale; the column became the builder's "pet child"; the bay was invented and occupied much the same place as the order; the tower appeared, and many other new things.

The last scene in this strange eventful history of the column and the arch is the Renaissance. Greek architecture had been religious, the German had been also popular, but the Renaissance was of the princes of this world. The plebeian arch returned to its humble position between the columns, which had now forsaken romance for Rome; the formal entablature triumphed. It was an age of pedants who loved the new style for its rules, of despots who rejoiced in its haughtiness and needed it for their pageantry. The Renaissance could not fail to produce great works, since it was an age of great artists; but its architecture had been dug up from the grave. Dust it was, and when Michael Angelo was gone, dust it very soon became. No mistress ever attracted so many famous men as did this proud child of fashion; even in England she was nobly served. But the seventeenth century saw the end of her, and only her pale ghost remained; till the columns of Rome made a last shadowy appearance around Regent's-park, and threw a gloom over the portals of Bayswater.

ORIENTAL BOOKS.

Zoroaster, the Prophet of Ancient Iran. By A. V. Williams Jackson, Professor of Indo-Iranian Languages in Columbia University. 9 x 6 in., xxiii + 312 pp. London and New York, 1899. Macmillan. 12/6 n.

Since the time of Spiegel and Justi a distinct advance has been made in the study of the Avesta and kindred subjects. This is due largely to the labours of Geldner, whose magnificent volume of the text must be in the hands of every Avestic scholar. But he is by no means alone. To leave aside other German investigators whose theories in this particular subject are often both rash and constantly changing, the Zoroaster literature has been laid open to Englishmen by the hands of the late lamented J. Darmesteter, of Mr. E. W. West, and of Dr. Mills. The last named has also edited a facsimile of a fine MS. of the Yasna, with Pahlavi commentary, presented to the Bodleian by a high priest of the Parsees in Bombay, Dastur Jamsajji Minocheherji Jamsap Asana. Three years ago Geiger and Kuhn began to sum up our present knowledge in the inevitable Grundriss; and here now lies before us the last contribution to this store, a life of Zoroaster, by one of Geldner's most distinguished pupils.

The book is thoroughly well done; in fact, it is a book to rejoice the scholar's heart. The arrangement of the material could not be improved upon. We have first a bibliography of the more important works; next follows the main narrative, Zoroaster's life described in connexion with his antecedents and his mission; a short chapter on the years just succeeding his death; and, finally, a general summary and conclusion. This part is confined, as far as may be, to the simple statement of what is generally accepted as fact; full references are given in notes at the foot of the page, and all doubtful points are reserved for special appendices. Thus we have a plain story, which any one can read and understand, filling about half the book; the student who doubts any point may at once satisfy himself, confirm or controvert, with the aid of the references; and in the appendix he may see in the minutest detail the course by which Mr. Jackson gets to his conclusions. If we add that there is no trace whatever of literary style in the book, it is but to get quit once for all of an unpleasant duty.

Mr. Jackson, we are glad to see, accepts Zoroaster as a historical person, and places his date between 660 and 583 B.C. The story of his life is but fragmentary, but the Biblical student might examine it with benefit. The parallels to be drawn with other religious teachers are often instructive. Zoroaster's pedigree is traced upwards through a royal line to the first man; there were prophecies of his coming, and miracles before his birth; at his birth miracles attested the Prophet. Of his childhood nothing is known; and little of the training days between the ages of fifteen and thirty. Then comes the Revelation, heavenly visions, wanderings abroad in the world, a temptation, and, after ten years' work, one disciple to show for it. At last the faith triumphs in the conversion of King Vishtaspa, whose son becomes a Holy Warrior for the spread of it; and, finally, Zoroaster dies, but his faith goes on. Very little is said of the religion, which is not the subject of the book. But there is some curious information about Zoroaster's supposed scientific knowledge, and about the alleged influence of his doctrines on Plato, Pythagoras, and other Greeks.

The appendices deal with Zoroaster's name, date, native place, with the scene of his work, allusions to Zoroaster in other literatures (the classical allusions are very numerous), and sculptures supposed to represent him (with plates). Everything is tabulated at the beginning, summed up at the end, and there is a full index and a map. In fact, the book is a compendium of all that relates to the subject presented in the most convenient form possible for use.

A Century of Indian Epigrams: Chiefly from the Sanskrit of Bhartrihari. By Paul Elmer More. 7x4½ in., 124 pp. London and New York, 1899. Harper, 5/-

Bhartrihari was a Hindu King who abdicated his throne in favour of a younger brother and passed the remainder of his life in a cavern writing poetry. The cavern is still shown to travellers, and Mr. Paul Elmer More offers a translation of a selection of the poems. His verses flow melodiously, but raise the question—How much of the poetry is Bhartrihari's, and how much is Mr. More's? For here, as it seems, we have a Sanskrit singer writing as if he were the heir of all the ages, and not only borrowing the great thoughts of the early Greeks, but also anticipating the turns of phrase of Wordsworth and Mr. Matthew Arnold. In one epigram he presents the Greek doctrine of ἀνάγκη, the necessity which compels the Gods themselves:—

Before the Gods we bend in awe,
But lo, they bow to fate's dread law.

On the very next page we find him almost paraphrasing the Lines on the Terrace at Berne. He writes:—

For as a log at random tost
On the wide waves perchance is crost
Here by another drifting spar—
So on this sea of life our meetings are.

And what is this but:—

Like drift wood spars, which meet and pass
Upon the boundless ocean plain,
So on the sea of life, alas!
Man meets man—meets and quits again.

Plunging into metaphysics, Bhartrihari speaks of the One almost in the words of Parmenides, though with an indication that he is also familiar with the Adonais; but then he is back again at once with Matthew Arnold, indebted this time to Empedocles on Etna:—

Through all the world thou rankest, O my soul,
Seeking, and wilt not rest;
Behold, the peace of Brahma and thy goal
Hideth in thine own breast.

Which, if Bhartrihari were a new writer, would be voted an echo of:—

Once read thy own breast right,
And thou hast done with fears;
Man gets no other light,
Search he a thousand years

Search in thyself! there ask what ails thee, at that shrine!

And then there is Wordsworth. The epigram beginning—

O World! I faint in this thy multitude Of little things and their relentless feud is identical in thought, and almost in expression, with "The World is too much with us," the poet's concluding desire to bathe in Ganga being the Brahmin equivalent of the English singer's wish to—

Have sight of Proteus coming from the sea;
Or hear old Triton blow his wreathed horn.

If space permitted, one could continue with a long list of similar parallel passages. On the subject of solitude, in particular, the Sanskrit is constantly saying the things that Matthew Arnold was destined to say after him, and in almost exactly the same words; and the coincidence would be one of the most puzzling mysteries of literature, if the frequency with which Mr. More quotes Matthew Arnold in his preface did not suggest a method of explaining it. Leaving this branch of the subject, however, we will conclude by quoting an epigram which pleases us, and of which we have, so far, failed to find a modern analogue:—

I saw an ass who bore a load
Of sandal wood along the road,
And almost with the burden bent,
Yet never guessed the sandal scent;
So pedants bear a ponderous mass
Of books they comprehend not—like the ass.

Students who may be desirous of obtaining trustworthy information on the historical and linguistic contents of the inscriptions that have been found in Phœnicia, Cyprus, North Africa, Palestine, and other parts are no more without a thorough and trustworthy guide on the subject, for Mark Lidzbarski's HANDBUCH (Emil Felber, Weimar) is both full and accurate. It is, of course, meant for Semitic scholars in the first instance, but the introductory chapters, containing no fewer than 172 pages, are full of general information on the bibliography, history, chronology, and topography relating to the inscriptions dealt with. The work is accompanied by an atlas containing forty-four facsimile plates.

In the HISTORICAL DEVELOPMENT OF THE QURÁN (Madras S.P.C.K. Press, 3s. 6d. net), Mr. Edward Sell tries with some success to show how various parts of the Koran were composed at certain periods of the Prophet's life, or at least have reference to these. The book is not interestingly written, but it will be useful for reference. Controversialists will find some barefaced privilegia made to dispense with moral laws for Mahomed's benefit. The book has an Index of quoted passages.

The third and last volume of KINGS OF KASHMIRA, a translation of the Sanskrit works, Jonarāja, Shrivara, Prājyabhatta, and Shuka, by Jogesh Chunder Dutt (published by the author at the Elm Press, Calcutta, 2 rupees), is better than many English translations by natives of India.

Messrs. Dent have sent us an illustrated edition of THE EPIC OF ANCIENT INDIA, by Romesh Dutt, C.I.E. (12s. 6d. n.). We have already noticed the volume in the Series of Temple Classics which contains the text only. In this tastefully got up book we have an introductory note by Max Müller and twelve photogravures from drawings by E. S. Hardy. Mr. Dutt's verse, if a trifle commonplace, has a pleasant and even flow, and the rhythm chosen is not unlike that of the Sanskrit. The story has, of course, been condensed. Some of the most interesting episodes are given, and what comes between is told in prose. The pictures are very good, and add much to the value of the book. The cream-white cover bears a decorative trophy of Indian arms, and print and paper are excellent, as in all Mr. Dent's books. We note a curious misprint on the plate opposite p. 67, where Satyavan appears as Satyarean.

PARSI, JAINA, AND SIKH is the title of the Maitland Prize Essay for 1897, now published by Mr. Douglas M. Thornton (Religious Tract Society, 2s.). It is a very clear and very much condensed summary of the history, tenets, and present condition of the three. The work has been thoroughly done, and is scholarly and accurate. Mr. Thornton wisely confines himself to giving accepted beliefs, and does not propose new theories, or try to "show off" in any way. There is more in the book than might be thought from its title. For example, there is an account of the Zend Avesta, its discovery, its contents, and the scholars who have worked upon it. This information for the Avesta may be easily got elsewhere; in the new life of Zoroaster, for example, reviewed above. But the same can hardly be said of the essays on Jaina and Sikh. We can cordially recommend this unpretending little book.

THE ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY OF EUSEBIUS IN SYRIAC, edited from the MSS. by the late W. Wright, LL.D., and Norman McLean, M.A., comes from the Cambridge University Press (25s.). The materials for a complete Syriac text of Eusebius are unhappily lacking. In the two MSS. used by Dr. Wright and Mr.

McLean only the first five books of the History exist almost entire. The sixth book is missing in both MSS., and there remain only fragments of Books VII. to X. The present editors have not followed the example of Dr. Paul Bedjan who, in 1897, published an editio princeps of the Syriac texts. Dr. Bedjan's edition combined the texts of the two available MSS. Dr. Wright and Mr. McLean have preferred to print in extenso the text of the British Museum MS. (B), giving at the foot of each page the variants found in the St. Petersburg MS. (A), and filling up, where necessary, the lacune of B. In an appendix are printed three chapters of Book VI., taken from a British Museum MS. of the ninth century. A useful feature of the Cambridge edition is its inclusion of variants from the ancient Armenian version, which probably represents an older form of the Syriac text than that of A and B. The collation of this ancient version is the work of Dr. Adalbert Merx. It is possible, as Dr. Wright has pointed out, that this version belongs to a group of Syriac translations which were made "in the life-time of the authors themselves or very soon after." Mr. McLean concludes that "our best authority for the text of the first five books is the combination of B (the British Museum MS.) and the Armenian version. The work has been executed with the usual skill and accuracy displayed by the Cambridge University Press.

Mr. L. W. King has brought out, as a companion volume to Mr. Budge's "First Steps in Egyptian," a very useful grammar and reading book. FIRST STEPS IN ASSYRIAN (Kegan Paul, 15s.). He calls it "a book for beginners, being a series of historical, mythological, religious, magical, epistolary, and other texts printed in cuneiform characters with interlinear transliteration and translation, and a sketch of Assyrian grammar, sign-list, and vocabulary." The sub-title is typical of the book, and beginners must reconcile themselves to mastering a stout volume of 540 pages if they wish to learn Assyrian. In the study of Oriental languages it is emphatically the big books that "pay." More Arabic scholars have been turned out by the great tomes of de Sacy and Lumsden than by all the concise primers put together. You want ample elbow room for acquiring Eastern tongues as a scholar acquires them. Mr. King does not under-estimate the scope of his work. Its aim, he says, is "to furnish the beginner with all the materials which he will require in his earliest studies of the Assyrian language and the cuneiform inscriptions." For this purpose it supplies an account of cuneiform writing, a brief grammar of Assyrian, a list of the most usual signs and ideograms, a long series of extracts for practice in reading, and a full vocabulary. He has transcribed the Babylonian texts (such as the Creation and Deluge legends) in the Assyrian character, for he holds that the student ought first to master the Ninevite script, for the very good reason that almost all the writings in the famous library of Ashur-bani-pal are in that character. The introductory matter is clearly arranged, considering the complicated system of cuneiform writing, and the texts are selected and translated with care and judgment. The beginner who essays to learn Assyrian by means of this volume will not, indeed, find it a "royal road," but he could not follow a better guide in English, and by studying it with attention he will be able to decipher the easier texts for himself. He will find a knowledge of Hebrew a considerable help.

Mr. A. Vambéry has done his best to translate the TRAVELS AND ADVENTURES OF THE TURKISH ADMIRAL SIDI ALI REIS, in India, Afghanistan, Central Asia, and Persia, during the years 1553-1556 (Luzac, 5s.). He has made an interesting little book, though it is tantalizing to read now and again that "the noise of the . . . and the . . . was deafening," but that "after cutting the . . . from the . . . we continued our way." It is fair to say that there are not many passages like this; but it is a pity Mr. Vambéry could not have got some clue as to the omitted words. The book is a favourite among the Turks, and there are Turks in London; do they not know the meaning of what they read? We might make other small criticisms: a lakh is the number ten thousand, not "£100,000" (p. 99). The chief value of the book lies in its geographical indications, and in the light it throws on the foreign policy of Turkey three hundred years ago. The influence of the Padishah seems to have spread very widely over the East at that date. He seems to have been very much like what he is now; we read that the soldiers grumbled, not having had any pay for two years. The narrative impresses on the reader very strongly how wild and lawless life was at the time; every man's hand was against his neighbour, and travellers had to fight again and again for life. Sidi Ali Reis was a doughty seaman, who had taken part in the capture of Rhodes under Suleiman the Magnificent. He was also a devout man, and made a point of visiting the tomb of every saint within reach. He has many wonders to tell of: a spring of fresh water under the sea at Bahrein, whence they got water in skins by diving for it; ants "as big as sparrows," and so forth. He fancies himself as a poet, and presents a ghazel to such as will appreciate the honour. One of his quatrains saved him from captivity. Of another of them, "By God!" said the Emperor of Hindustan, "that is truly sublime!" "I mention this (says our author) not to praise my own poetry, but to show his Majesty's good taste." Our readers may see this sublime versicle, together with much that is humorous and quaint, when they buy the book.

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

The author of PLEASURE AND LEISURE BOATING (Innes, 3s. 6d.) should have added to his title the words "on the Thames," for his purview is confined solely to that river. But the number of people who explore other rivers is not, comparatively, large, and the crowds who frequent the Thames will find here a book they much need both for their comfort and their safety. Mr. Sydney Crossley, the author, understands his business, and his advice throughout is well and clearly given, and may be taken as thoroughly sound. He is, we are glad to see, concerned not only for comfort and safety but for good form. His rule 8, under the heading "Watermanship," is as follows:—"Chaff is an excellent thing in its proper place, but not elsewhere. Its proper place on the Thames is between Kingston Waterworks and Moulsey Lock." The only thing we regret about the book is the absence of illustrations and of a map of the Thames.

Colonel Newnham Davis' very entertaining little book on DINNERS AND DINERS (Grant, Richards, 3s. 6d.) is reprinted from the pages of the Pall Mall Gazette, whose editor contributes a preface. The dinners discussed are those provided at the chief London restaurants, and the book is written on the kindergarten principle, conveying its information by means of practical illustration. Serious instruction is, indeed, given as to the more intricate details of menus, prices, and appropriate wines, but the gravity of the subject-matter never finds Colonel Newnham Davis dull. His method is the narrative one, and in the record of his little dinners at London restaurants he manages to convey a very good idea, not only of their cooking and their wines, but of their atmosphere. The book leaves something to be desired by those who are mean spirited enough to glance anxiously at the bill, but diners who are "careful" in another sense will derive both profit and amusement from it.

Dean Hole speaks with authority on all matters floricultural, for he was the originator of rose shows, and has done much to promote all other horticultural exhibitions. His OUR GARDENS, which forms the second volume of the Haddon Hall Library (Dent, 7s. 6d.), is a book to be recommended to young gardeners. The information is imparted in a pleasant style, and if the author now and again wanders off in praise of his friend, Mr. William Robinson (the only fault we have to find with the Dean), he has much to say that will be of real practical use to gardeners in the laying out, stocking, and cultivation of gardens. Thus, among the gardens treated in detail are the rose garden, the rock, the water, the wild, the cottage, the children's, and the town gardens, for all of which the requirements to ensure a happy issue are given succinctly, and, in many instances, the costs of the flowers are added. Among the illustrations are plans for rose gardens, one being from Mereworth Castle, sent by Lady Ealmouth, and another from the Swanley Horticultural College, as laid down by the author, which brings the ancient and modern methods into juxtaposition. The book is entirely free from pedantry, and should be in the hands of all persons interested in gardening who wish to have sound information agreeably conveyed.

IN CHINA AND THE CHINESE (Hurst and Blackett, 2s. 6d.) Mrs. Arthur Bell, without entering into the questions of commerce or diplomacy, gives a varied account of her own personal experiences, interspersed with references to Chinese history and tradition. It is written in a work-a-day style and passes easily from an interesting account of the great Chinese dynasties, or of the philosophies of Lao-Tze and of Confucius, to the modern Chinese dinner table. On one of the few occasions when Mrs. Bell becomes contentious, she shows that opium is no worse than tobacco when taken moderately, and that it is most beneficial as a medicine. The book is quite readable.

IMPERIAL RULE IN INDIA (Constable, 3s. 6d.) Mr. Theodore Morison's idea of the ultimate object of our rule in India—viz., so to govern India that she may one day be able to govern herself—is not, perhaps, one which many people share with him. But though his horizon is a little misty Mr. Morison, who is engaged in educational work in India, takes a practical view of his immediate surroundings. So far from upholding the principles of the Indian National Congress, he shows how even existing institutions such as the freedom of the Press, the right of public association and debate, the principle of representation in provincial councils, and trial by jury have not been an unmixed blessing in a country so disintegrated as India. He has much that is practical to say as to the danger of over elaborating the machinery of administration at the expense of the personal influence of the civilian over the native, which used to be greater when the time of the former was not so much taken up by purely secretarial work. The book is written in a clear and unimpassioned style.

Sir Sherston Baker has scarcely been well advised in adding, in FIRST STEPS IN INTERNATIONAL LAW, prepared for the use of students (Kegan Paul, 12s.), yet another treatise to the already bulky literature of international law. The keen interest which he tells us was manifested by the general public, and especially by the mercantile community, in the lecture on the rights and duties of neutrals, delivered by him at the Guildhall during the recent war, will hardly extend to his book. It probably passes the wit of man to make international law a subject of widespread interest for the general reader, and students are already better provided for by Hall and Lawrence. With regard to execution, the discussions on the nature of international law, sovereignty, &c., are by no means models of clear thinking. In a science where so much is doubtful, authorities should have been cited to a much greater extent. The author has, however, gleaned some curious information not readily accessible in larger treatises. He is distinctly better in the department of Prize Law, though even here the references to the cases cited are not always given. This defect is not supplied by an appendix which contains a digest of some of the leading cases in international law.

BIOGRAPHY.

THE ROMANCE OF A PRO-CONSUL (Chatto and Windus, 6s.) is the title given by Mr. James Milne to his "personal life and memoirs of the Right Hon. Sir George Grey"; and the word "romance" is certainly more appropriate, for several reasons, than any other. The book begins, as novels so often do, in the middle, and tells what went before by way of episode; and it leaves out many essential facts, whether because the writer was unaware of them or because he thought the reader would be bored by them. Sir George Grey's mission as Governor of South Australia, for example, is vaguely described as "the undoing of a tangle," but there is hardly a word about the nature of that tangle, though, as a matter of fact, it is a very important episode in South Australian annals, and one about which much ink has been spilt in angry controversy. Still, though "The Romance of a Pro-Consul" is not so good a book as it might have been if more trouble had been taken with it, and though the author has made a mistake in adopting the impressionistic method without possessing in any marked degree the gifts of the impressionist, it has a certain interest. Mr. James Milne knew Sir George Grey fairly well during his later years, and must be thanked for having preserved a good deal of his table talk, including some luminous criticisms on political problems. Sir George Grey was a shrewd observer of tendencies, and some of his observations seem particularly appropriate at the present juncture. He believed in the federation of the Anglo-Saxon race, and he also believed that in the accomplishment of that federation, rather than in conferences with the European Powers, lay the secret of universal peace.

If it were possible to solidify the English-speaking people for common purposes the gain to them and to mankind would be splendid. The blessings of federation were a hundredfold.

"Why," said Sir George, "war would probably die off the face of the earth. The armed camp, which burdens the Old World, enslaves the nations, and impedes progress, would disappear. The Anglo-Saxon race, going together, could determine the balance of power for a fully peopled earth. Such a moral force would be irresistible, and debate would take the place of war in the settlement of international disputes."

Sir George Grey's thoughts on death, spoken in his extreme old age, will also be read with interest:—

"Death! I do not believe in death except that the flesh dies; for the spirit goes on and on. Terror of death is necessary, in order to keep men and animals from killing themselves. That is all."

"The future is mystery, for none have returned to inform us what is there. But our knowledge of the Creator teaches us that His goodness will be greater and greater towards His creatures. If the babe leaves the womb to come into such a beautiful world as ours, how beautiful a world may we not pass into? It was terrible to the babe to be torn from the womb, but it had no idea what loving hands were waiting for it."

On the whole, Mr. Milne gives his readers a very fair idea of Sir George Grey himself, though a very inadequate idea of the events in which he played his part.

ROBERT RAIKES: THE MAN AND HIS WORK (Arrowsmith, 7s. 6d.), edited by J. Henry Harris, with a preface by Dean Farrar, has much biographical value. Some private information about the Gloucester journalist who is generally described as "the founder of Sunday schools" was collected by Mr. Gregory for his Life of "Robert Raikes," published in 1877 (which Mr. Harris does not mention), but there remained still unused much evidence drawn from the recollections of Gloucester residents who knew Raikes. These were collected by the late Mr. Josiah Harris, who intended to write a history of the Sunday school. He died in 1880 without having accomplished his purpose, and his son, who came into possession of his papers, has now carried out a less ambitious design in editing all of these papers which bear on Raikes' life. Mr. Harris' method is, to a great extent, the very laudable one, which we wish were more often pursued, of giving in their original form the sources of his information. Thus we have, besides many unpublished letters, a number of interviews, set out at length, with old Gloucester residents, from which one gets a very vivid picture of the eminently prosperous and rather vain and "buckish" citizen; the enterprising journalist and printer, not ashamed to work on Sundays, though he was called a hypocrite for his pains; and, above all, the keen and practical philanthropist whose idea was to help Howard's work in prison reform by educating prospective criminals and keeping the prisons empty. The other chief point of value in the book is the discussion of the vexed question whether Raikes was really the original founder of Sunday schools; on which the evidence goes to show that, though others conceived the idea or collaborated with him, he has not, on the whole, had more than his deserts. Mr. Harris collected nearly twenty years ago a number of letters from eminent ecclesiastics on the subject of Sunday schools, with a view to the present work. One of them he curiously describes as from "Lord Arthur Dr. Hervey," and another erroneously from "Dr. Jackson, Bishop of Chester, Aug. 1, 1870." He must mean Dr. Jacobson. This book is certainly an interesting one, and it is the more welcome because Rukes' memory is not perpetuated as it should be in his native town, though we may remind Mr. Harris that a memorial appealing to a wider public now stands on the Thames Embankment in London.

The Rev. Richard W. Hiley, D.D., Vicar of Wighill, near Tadcaster, Yorks, has written out his recollections under the title of MEMORIES OF HALF A CENTURY (Longmans, 15s.). The book consists of anecdotes of the celebrities whom Mr. Hiley has known, and most of the anecdotes have the charm of familiarity. Some of them, however, are less well known than they deserve to be. We will quote one about Dr. Bull, of Christ Church, who enjoyed celebrity as a pluralist, and who went to visit some property belonging to the college, and ordered dinner to be prepared for him at a neighbouring hotel:—

After waiting a little time he entered the dining room, and observed the table elaborately laid out for fourteen. He inquired of mine host how it was his own dinner was not ready, as it was long after time. "It was ready punctually," quoth Boniface, "but I have been waiting for the rest of the company to arrive." "The rest of the company!" exclaimed the astonished visitor. "I am alone!" "Oh, I was written to that you would be accompanied by several other officials, and to prepare accordingly." Boniface produced the letter. There was, sure enough, a catalogue of all the offices monopolized by Dr. Bull: Canon of Christ Church, Treasurer of Christ Church, Curator of the University Chest, &c., &c. Dr. Bull was silent, saw he had been the victim of some wag's contrivance.

Dr. Hiley's book may not be worth reading through, but it is well worth dipping into.

Mr. James Shaw was a Scotch dominie who contributed to many periodicals—from Good Words to the Agnostic Journal. His fugitive writings are collected in a book bearing the title A COUNTRY SCHOOLMASTER (Oliver and Boyd, 6s. n.), to which a sympathetic biographical introduction is contributed by Mr. Robert Wallace, the Edinburgh Professor of Agriculture and Rural Economy.

NEW FRENCH BOOKS.

The Temps has lost no time in filling the place left vacant by the death of Francisque Sarcey. M. Gustave Larroumet, like his predecessor, professor and journalist, will continue to comment in that journal upon the French stage in the proper bourgeois temper. M. Larroumet belongs to a younger generation than M. Sarcey, and aims less at popular renown and more at the suffrages of the Parisian writers. MM. Hachette have just brought out a volume of "studies in dramatic history and criticism"—ÉTUDES D'HISTOIRE ET DE CRITIQUE DRAMATIQUES (3fr. 50c.)—which shows that M. Larroumet sees the necessity of reconciling the traditional standards, Racine and Molière and Corneille, with the modern efforts of MM. Hervieu, Dounay, and Richépin. M. Larroumet has never had, like Sarcey, the courage of his convictions. Rather he has disregarded his own preferences and sought only to find the most agreeable formula to render his pages intelligible to readers who rejoice in ready-made ideas, already consecrated by time. He has written an agreeable book on Racine, which we have already introduced to the readers of Literature, and an able one on Marivaux. In the present volume the best thing is the reprint of a long-forgotten play by Marivaux, "La Femme Fidèle," which M. Larroumet had resuscitated on the Odeon stage five years ago. This is a sort of service which he does well.

An important service was rendered by the house of Alcan to the systematization of scientific facts in the publication of L'ANNÉE SOCIOLOGIQUE, by M. Durkheim, professor of sociology at Bordeaux. The second volume has just appeared, comprising the bibliography of sociologic facts and publications from July, 1897 to the end of June, 1898 (Alcan, 10fr.). It does the greatest credit to French science. The second section in the classification adopted by M. Durkheim comprises the literature of "Religious Sociology," and under this head we have elaborate studies of recent books, in French, English, and German, on totemism, on primitive religions in general, on magic, sorcery, and popular superstitions, on beliefs and rites relative to the dead, on popular forms of worship, on myths and legends of various peoples, on ritual sacrifices, prayers, &c., on ascetic institutions, &c. And this is only one section, others being entitled "Moral and Juridical Sociology," "Criminal Sociology," "Economic Sociology," and so forth. A score of scholars have contributed to the volume and sign their articles. Few have time to read Frazer and Seidel; Lehmann, Leonard King, and Danon; Rohde, Kuno Meyer, de Groot, and Maspero; Smirnov, Fewkes, and Walsh; Lang, Macdonnell, and Gruppe; but these French scholars present us with the results of the investigations of those and other searchers. There are two original memoirs which add to the importance of the work. In one M. Durkheim attempts to define religious phenomena and to point out their essentially sociological character. In the second MM. Hubert and Mauss investigate the nature of sacrifice as a social fact.

M. Ollendorff has just brought out an illustrated edition of LA MAISON TELLIER of de Maupassant, which, although far more attractive than the old editions of this masterpiece, is published at the regular price of 3fr. 50c. The drawings by René Laloux have been engraved on wood by Lemoine.

A much-needed work on the sculptor Rodin has been brought out, regardless of expense, by M. Floury, the publisher of the periodical devoted to the interests of French wood-engravers, L'Image. It is the first of a series of "Études sur quelques artistes originaux," by M. Léon Maillard. The illustrations are abundant. M. Maillard's text is more than adequate in its sympathetic interpretation of Rodin's masterpieces, but a slight forcing of the note is excusable in the case of a sculptor who has been so misjudged.

THE ROMAN QUESTION.

The purpose of Father Humphrey's URBS ET ORBIS, or The Pope as Bishop and as Pontiff (T. Baker, 6s. 6d. n.), is "to set forth the Papacy in action, with some account of the machinery by means of which the supreme Pontiff . . . governs the visible Church." The book is full of curious information respecting the functions, manner of life, dress, &c., of the various officials attached to the Roman curia and of the cumbrous and complicated machinery of the Papal system.

The late Rev. Luke Rivington, whose recent death entails a great loss for Roman controversialists, constituted himself a champion of the Papacy, and his THE ROMAN PRIMACY, A.D. 430-451 (Longmans, 7s. 6d.), is an endeavour to show that at the council of Ephesus the guardianship of the faith was already practically entrusted to the successor of St. Peter. It is a controversial pamphlet directed chiefly against Dr. Bright, the professor of ecclesiastical history at Oxford, with whom the writer is evidently very angry. The author makes a bold claim for his "cumulative argument"—namely, that it justifies the statement "that the Vatican decrees were admitted in substance in A.D. 451." The argument is certainly, in a sense, cumulative, but we doubt whether it is likely to convince any one who is not already an ardent Papalist. The argument of the last chapter seems to us to attach a quite undue significance to the rhetorical and diplomatic language addressed to Leo by the Oriental prelates.

In spite of its somewhat sensational and misleading title, ROME FROM THE INSIDE, or The Priests' Revolt, compiled and translated by "J. B." (Clarke, 1s.), is of great interest. It consists chiefly of letters and statements written, for the most part, by priests and ex-priests of the French church. They display very little of the vehemence that might be looked for in men who have broken with a system that has come to seem iniquitous and intolerable. We may call special attention to the declarations of M. Bourrier, the present editor of the Chrétien Français, the description of monastic experience by M. Percheron, and of seminary life by M. Joanny Patel. One of the letters points out with pathetic force how insurmountable are the obstacles which stand in the way of secession from the priesthood, the incapacity of seminary-trained priests for any other career, the dread of giving scandal, the tyrannical power of public opinion. "What can one do?" writes a country curé, "Where go? What is the issue? Nothing, nothing. We must just stop where we are—in irons, in anguish; stay there, to sleep and to die." Another noticeable point is that the cry of the French priesthood finds an echo in other countries—Germany, Italy, Belgium, Corsica. We must, however, protest against the "moral" which the editor draws from his own compilation, and his reference to "a great party in the National Church straining every nerve to bring back the Roman domination," &c., is a mere exaggeration.

THEOLOGY.

Two volumes are before us of the translation of Dr. Harnack's HISTORY OF DOGMA. The fifth volume translated by Mr. J. Milfar (Williams and Norgate, 10s. 6d. each) covers the period of Augustine and of the Carolingian Renaissance, and includes a minute and luminous criticism of the former's character and system. Dr. Harnack recognizes in "the Augustinian reformation" one of those Pauline reactions of which the system of Marcion is perhaps the earliest. He points out that Augustine's contribution to theology is rather ethical than dogmatic. "His importance . . . consisted essentially in the fact that he gave to the West, in place of stoic Christian popular morality as that was comprised in Pelagianism, a religious and specifically Christian ethic." In the teaching of Gregory the Great the teaching of Augustine, viewed as an exposition of the popular system, is reproduced in a somewhat crude and materialized form; on the other hand, "by his unique power of portraying himself, of expressing the wealth of his genius, and giving every word an individual impress, by his gift of individualizing and self-observation," Augustine "contributed to the rise of the Renaissance and the modern spirit." In the sixth volume, translated by Mr. W. M'Gilchrist, Dr. Harnack is concerned with the Middle Ages—that bewildering period in the history of dogma during which "the Christianity of the early Church came to its completion." For many readers the sections on the "History of Piety" will prove most attractive. The sketch of St. Bernard and the description of the Franciscan movement are sympathetic and suggestive. Wyclif is tersely characterized as "a second Francis, of more understanding, but less resolute; more cautious, but less free." For the history of dogma the period is of secondary importance. A good deal of space is devoted to an examination of Anselm's doctrine of satisfaction in the "Cur Deus Homo"—that striking example of the application of legalistic conceptions to theological doctrine. Dr. Harnack recognizes some real merits in Anselm's theory. He points out, for instance, that what Anselm calls "reason" (ratio) is really identical with "moral" necessity. Anselm refuses to admit the conception of Divine arbitrariness; "with deeper insight and more courage than Augustine, he rather assumes everywhere that God's omnipotence is in inner subjection to His holy will." In his second chapter Dr. Harnack incidentally gives a brilliant description of the fifteenth-century Humanism in its relation to theology. "Theology," he remarks, "was put aside with a respectful recognition, or with an air of cool superiority, or with saucy ridicule." By the scholar theology was regarded as "something indifferent." But "the avenger was at the door; the following 150 years showed the terrified scholars to a frightful extent that theology will not be mocked."

We have already noticed the first series of Professor Tiele's Gifford Lectures, ELEMENTS OF THE SCIENCE OF RELIGION. In them he was concerned with the "morphological" part of the science of religion. In the Second Series (Blackwood, 7s. 6d. n.) he deals with the "ontological" part—the essence and origin of religious ideas, the constant elements found in every living religion. According to Professor Tiele, "a careful analysis of religious phenomena compels us to conclude that they are all traceable to the emotions—traceable to them, but not originating in them." The essence of religion lies in man's faculty of adoration. "In adoration are united those two phases of religion which are termed by the schools 'transcendent' and 'immanent' respectively, or which, in religious language, represent the believer as 'looking up to God as the Most High,' and as 'feeling himself akin to God as his Father.'" In a later lecture the origin of religion is discovered by Professor Tiele in the sense of infinity—"the infinite within us," the consciousness of which stimulates the intellectual, æsthetic, and moral faculties, not less than the spiritual aspirations of man. This seems to us the most suggestive point in these lectures. Professor Tiele also makes an important remark about the scientific study of doctrine:—

For every religion that desires to stand on the solid foundation of truth the examination of its creed is an imperative necessity. . . . It has been seriously maintained of late that ministers of the Gospel would do better in future to devote themselves to the study of political economy, or of social questions, rather than to that of theology and the science of religion. Were such a view to find acceptance it would be fatal, not only to the Church, but to the whole development and prosperity of religion.

The present series of Gifford lectures, the tone of which is always considerate and tolerant, are a powerful contribution to the cause both of science and faith.

The Rev. H. G. Tomkins, the writer of ABRAHAM AND HIS AGE (Eyre and Spottiswoode, 3s. 6d.), has made ample use of recent archaeological discoveries, but he overrates the strength of the external evidence that is supposed to confirm some of the early narratives of Genesis. He follows the guidance of Professors Sayce and Homme, and mentions with appreciation the recent work of Pastor George Stosch on "The Origin of Genesis," of which so good a judge as Prof. Bennett said that it might be almost regarded as "a reductio ad absurdum of the principles of traditional criticism." But he deals with a very limited section of the book of Genesis—some three chapters at most, and parts of the volume resemble rather a collection of archaeological notes than a connected treatise. It is, however, a painstaking work with much interesting illustrative matter, and its tone is studiously moderate.

Archdeacon Chestham's SKETCH OF MEDIAEVAL CHURCH HISTORY (S.P.C.K., 1s. 6d.), though the style and treatment is somewhat solid, is a useful and trustworthy summary of a little-known period.

LITTLE'S ANNUAL PLEASURE DIARY (Simpkin, Marshall, 1s.) informs the visitor to London how he can amuse himself at all seasons of the year, and also instructs the Londoner as to the facilities for getting away. It is a useful compilation, and it should be noted that it gives, among other things, the dates of all the river regattas.

THE OXFORDSHIRE LIGHT INFANTRY CHRONICLE (Eyre and Spottiswoode) is the seventh volume of an annual record of the regiments better known as the 43rd and 52nd Light Infantry. Together with information about annual dinners, athletic meetings, and so forth, it contains, by way of feuilleton, some interesting contributions to old military history. This, from the diary of an officer who flourished about 1778, throws a pleasing light upon the manners and customs of the military in those early times:—

I was soon ordered to join at Wakefield. We all quarrelled with the gentlemen of Wakefield, and writs were out every day against some of us for beating the inhabitants or some outrage. The non-commissioned officers that we brought home with us had been so long accustomed to kill their own mutton in America that they thought they might do the same in England. Hen-roosts did not escape them, and three were sent to York jail for sheep stealing. . . . I was a member of the Ugly Club, Lieutenant Ood, of the 50th, president. We had also a Wig Club, in which every member was obliged to appear in a wig, to smoke, and drink porter. This meeting always produced a great deal of humour. George Pitt, brother to Lord Rivers, was president. . . . We had cold meat, porter, punch, and pipes.

IN THE CHURCHYARD.

The plumed black horses pacing go
 In formal hideous pomp of woe.
 Lo, this man's mother there :
 So must my mother fare.

Rough hireling hands, that have not known
 Her living, lift the coffin down,
 And ranged on either hand,
 Strangers and kin, we stand.

They there; we here, and she between,
 So near me I could almost lean
 And touch her bed; yet thus Remote how far from us!

All changed, all passing—save her hair :
 Death sets no sign of lordship there.
 Years frosted it before,
 Now it shall change no more.

Why not have given her to kind Earth
 That from her daisies might have birth,
 That she into the grass
 After her kind might pass?

That cold, unsightly, pitiless box
 Never again unseals, unlocks.
 How close clamped edges fit!
 Vain to press lips on it.

Hark! the first clay in handfuls thrown,
 And then the reader's monotone.
 Out under heaven here
 It scarce arrests the ear.

It stops. With dreadful instant speed
 Men fall to work, as if indeed
 There were a life to save
 By filling up a grave.

O'er set grey eyes of men she bore
 Watching the trench fill more and more;
 Set eyes—no tear is shed;
 A strong race she has bred.

Still shovelling, shovelling on the dead,
 And then, one stroke with back of spade
 To show that all is done,
 Wage earned and resting won.

Kind hands range flowers on the loose clay,
 Poor pretty hothouse blossoms they,
 Tarnished already; Death
 Has touched them with his breath.

Is there no more, no more to do?
 No more, no more; she has her due.
 Leave her, come home again;
 'Tis cold here in the rain,

Leave her to Nature; so 'tis best,
 In that blind bosom lost, to rest.
 Her separate life is done,
 With Nature she is one.

Where Nature strikes the scar will close,
 And soon the sod together grows.
 Her balm is Lethe; yet
 We for remembrance fret,

And, as each breath men dying draw Rebels against the falling law
 And with a kind of rage
 Heaves up its bony cage,

So strive we when on Death we think
 Not into nothingness to sink.
 Ah! if none soothe us, still Nature is kind: Death will.

STEPHEN GWYNN.

Among my Books.

IN A DON'S LIBRARY.

I have often thought that it would be interesting to trace some of the changes in academic interests as they may be observed in the hereditary libraries, of which there must be not a few in Oxford and Cambridge. Not unnaturally, in spite of the abolition of all local restrictions, the same names tend to recur in the lists of University officials generation by generation, and it is a curious study to see how the men of to-day take after, or depart from, the ways of their forefathers. Where there is individuality so marked as to amount to genius the peculiar interest of the investigation ceases. What is interesting to discover is how the ordinary commonplace men who live in the Universities, generation by generation, show their literary interests, keep in touch with current fashions of thought, and slowly or with precipitate violence adopt the philosophical, political, or religious opinions that prevail for the time in the world outside.

I have often studied in a library which has been growing during the last century and a half in the hands of three Oxford dons. I am not to mention their names, which are, indeed, of no interest; but I may premise that the first held a Fellowship from 1737 to 1743, and then enjoyed two benefices till his death, still a bachelor, at the age of eighty-eight, in 1804. The second, a nephew of the first, was thrice married, but left no issue. He was born in 1764, and died in 1817, having been Fellow of his College (not the same as his uncle's) from 1785 to 1797. The library formed by these men—part of which had, no doubt, been twice located in Oxford rooms—then passed to a nephew of the second, who was a country parson, one loved by good men, a traveller, but not a particularly bookish man. He made a few additions to the books, and left them to his son, who brought back the books to Oxford, obtained a Fellowship at a third college, and still resides there.

The library thus formed may fairly claim to be a typical one. All three dons were clergymen. The first became a Fellow of Wesley's College just after he left Oxford, and it is very likely that the two may have known each other in Lincolnshire. The second lived in the days of Pitt and the French Revolution. The third belongs to the era of "Lux Mundi" and the Revue Anglo-Romaine; but a study of their books shows that there is a noteworthy continuity in the opinions which have been handed down.

The library, like all eighteenth-century collections, is rich in theology and sermons. For some of these, and especially a handsomely-bound edition of the works of Jones of Nayland in twelve octavos, the present owner tells me with indignation that he has been offered a penny a volume. But there are very many books which appeal to others besides divines. Among those of the first collection are the 1622 edition of Hooker's works, and the first edition of the "Anatomy of Melancholy." By their side is Sir Walter Raleigh's "Historie of the World," and the great folio, with all its extraordinary illustrations, of the "Works" of Charles, L., Fuller and Heylin and Hammond and Mede are hard by, and the works of Mr. Abraham Cowley, which, with Stowe's Chronicle and Meredith Hanmer's quaint translation of the ecclesiastical historians, formed, no doubt, agreeable recreation for the country rectory in which the first of our three dons passed the last sixty years of his life. From these he could turn to Law's "Serious Call," or Hoadly's Sermons, or Sparrow's "Rationale," whose first editions are on the shelves. There is a grim portrait of him, by the way, on the wall not far from his books—a very serious old gentleman in a white wig.

His nephew, the second of the trio, was, from his portrait, quite a different type of don—a very neat, well-dressed young man, wearing his hair in powder, and of a pink and white complexion. He was not content to read only. He addressed Mr. Fox in an indignant letter "occasioned by his speech delivered on the anniversary of his election for Westminster, October 10th, 1798," and he published an "Appeal to the Nation on the subject of Mr. Gilbert Wakefield's letter to William Wilberforce, Esq., M.P." In these the most excellent Tory sentiments are expounded with much vigour of expression and with some pleasing Shakespearian quotations. The Doctor evidently took a great pride in his library. He noted when and where he obtained a book, and what he gave for it, and in nearly every one he wrote the motto from S. Paul, fitting indeed to a divine, φιλοτιμίσθαι ἑαυτὸν — "that ye study to be quiet." He had a very fair collection of the classics, here and there a Delphin and an Elzevir among them. He had the sermons of Bishop Horne, his old president, of Porteous, and Bull, and Potter, and all the works of the saintly Wilson. But though he was well furnished with theology and the classics, it is clear that he had at least as deep an interest in history and the belles lettres. Besides Clarendon, given him by his College, he had all Robertson's histories, Watson's "Philip the Second" and "Philip the Third," Coxe's "Memoirs of the two Walpoles," Burnet, of course, and Bingham. He bought the first edition of "The Wealth of Nations," as well as of such donnish works as Warton's "History of English Poetry" and Dallaway's "Heraldry," which latter he vigorously corrected. But the characteristic feature of the good Doctor's collection is the series of the Essayists. They are all in their first editions, lovingly bound in a sober brown calf; the Guardian, Spectator, Englishman, Craftsman, Tutler, Adventurer, World, Lounger, Looker-On, Connoisseur, Observer, Mirror, down to the Rambler, the Idler, the Country Spectator, and the Microcosm. He was evidently a keen Johnsonian, for he has the octavo Boswell, the Dictionary, the Poets, "Rasselas," as well as the "Tour in Corsica," Reynolds' "Discourses," and Goldsmith. He had also all the British Critic and the Critical Review, and the Anti-Jacobin, to which he himself contributed. Fielding, Sterne, Pope, and Dryden, with Miss Burney's "Camilla," seem to represent his own tastes in literature. I suppose the noteworthy thing about these collections is that the reading of these eighteenth-century dons seems to have been confined to the Classics and English. There are a few French books it is true, La Fontaine, M. de Voiture, La Bruyère, and Madame de Genlis, and, in Italian, Tasso's "Aminta," but nothing to show a real acquaintance with foreign literature. That reproach at any rate is removed from the dons of the present day.

Here the chief attraction of this Library of dons may be said to cease; but I have been interested, too, in seeing what sort of a collection the possessor of this library, the descendant, indirect though he be, of these literary dons, has made for himself. One may go round his shelves and pick out books that he has evidently bought, and see if there is any clue to his own tastes and how far they are inherited.

There are of course books that mark his trade, the books he reads and scores, the books undergraduates will borrow and not return. There are the Thackerays and Scotts, the Dickens (in first editions I notice) and Tennyson, a volume or two of the first printed Indian books of Rudyard Kipling, some Ruskin and Church and Newman. Then there is all Pater, among them that rare little volume of reviews for the Guardian which contains his delicate appreciation of "Robert Elsmere" and rejection of its too limited view of life, and on the wall a photograph that once hung in the rooms at Brasenose, of a stalwart young warrior from the great Mantegna series at Hampton Court. If one could judge of the owner's taste in letters it must be from seeing that there does not seem to be a book missing of Robert Louis Stevenson, or George Meredith, or Thomas Love Peacock.

When I ask for personal associations, he shows me a book with some pretty Spanish verses in it, or the "Pages from a Private Diary" with the inscription ex dono authoris, or "Weeping Ferry," or a life of Laud with a letter from Mr. Gladstone about it, or learned volumes of Freeman and Stubbs with their autographs showing how they came to his shelves. But the books he has set round him are not all of to-day. There is a Second Folio Shakespeare, not quite complete it is true, but clearly a much prized possession. There is the private issue of the great Marquess of Wellesley's Primitiæ et Reliquiæ with an inscription in it to the editor of his speeches, in his clear thin hand, as steady at eighty as at eighteen. There is, in its old black leather cover, the "Relation of the Conference between William Lawd, then Lord Bishop of St. David's, now Lord Archbishop of Canterbury, and Mr. Fisher the Jesuite," printed in 1639. More rare and precious still is a very delicate little volume in red morocco, printed in the italic letter at Florence in 1556, "Il Moro d'Heliseo Heixodo, Inglese: All'illustrissimo Cardinal Reginaldo Polo." There is also the 1520 "Epigrammata clarissimi disertissimique uiri Thomæ Mori," with Holbein's title-page. By it are some rare seventeenth-century pamphlets, a medal or two which one does not often see, and Heber's Trinity Hymn, in his own MS. More modern, but of equal rarity, are a curious little print of Dr. Pusey, inscribed, "From Christ Church College, Oxford," "published for the proprietor, 202, Sloane Street, Chelsea, Oxford Theologians No. 7," and that leaflet referred to by Dean Church in his history of the Oxford Movement, but never seen, it would appear, till quite lately by any one of this generation, which tells "friends" how they may procure "Tracts for the Times on the privileges of the Church and against Popery," and how they may promote their sale. The memorandum is partly printed, partly filled in in Dr. Pusey's writing, and it is interesting not only in relation to the movement, and the methods by which its principles were spread, but also in regard to the position of the bookselling trade at the time.

It would seem as if even the modern don, so emancipate and cosmopolitan, still survived among those who can trace an ancestry of scholars. My subject to-day has a clever drawing of Aubrey Beardsley's, and a print of Holman Hunt's with an elaborate pencilled explanation by the artist, but he would seem to set as much store by a forest tree sketched on blotting-paper by Dean Liddell and a letter in the hand of Laud's secretary to the city of Edinburgh with the bold autograph signature "W. Cant."

Two other "modern instances" strike my eye as I leave the room. Here is the first edition of Mrs. Gaskell's "Life of Charlotte Brontë," which for its plain speaking was immediately withdrawn by the publisher, and is now hardly ever to be met with. Beside it is the little octavo of "Idyls and Songs," by Francis Turner Palgrave, 1848-1854. On the flyleaf is inscribed "B. Jowett, with F. T. Palgrave's love, Oct., 1854." Below this is a pencil note, "p. 48." Now on page 48 is "The Birth of Art: Introduction. To B. J." Up to that point the volume has at least been opened. After that not a page is cut.

As I turn to leave the room my thoughts go back nearly two centuries. It is most probable that none of these three done was a "man of the world," but their books show that they did not care to fall out of it. The generations seem to have given them much the same part to play, a very ordinary one, that can be played, happily, without noise and without effect. The first read and perhaps thought, the second read and wrote, the third wrote and taught. They were commonplace men, but they were types that the Universities cannot yet afford to lose. Much more in touch with books than with life, all of them, I mused: and then the door opened and an undergraduate came to tell me all about a football match, and I did not envy them any more.

W. H. HUTTON.

CONSEQUENCES.

[By E. F. BENSON.]

Jack Littledale was one of those people who never make a journey, however short, without buying several daily papers to read. He only read daily papers when he was making a journey, and he read very little of them then, though just enough to reassure himself that they were unreadable. He regarded them, in fact, in the same light in which he regarded his railway ticket, as part of the apparatus necessary to going in a train. It was impossible to make a journey without either, for the one ensured your getting to the place to which you wanted (or did not want) to go, the other, if you were travelling with a friend, ensured his not talking to you while the train was in motion. Jack was the most tolerant and amenable of mankind, but he looked on that class of person who insists on asking questions when the train is in motion with a feeling which was scarcely distinguishable from hate. And the worst of it was, so he thought, that you might know a man intimately and yet not discover for years that he talked in a train. Therefore it was well to be armed.

To-day he was travelling alone, and consequently the main function of his papers was not called into request, but the influenza was raging in London, and he read through the small paragraphs of society news with interest. Lady Grantchester had got it, that he knew, and for that he was deeply thankful, since she was to have spent the Sunday in the same house to which he was bound, and there was no one in the length and breadth of London whose absence was a matter of less regret. Oddly enough, the very next paragraph told him that Colonel Merriman, who also, as he knew, had been asked to spend the Sunday at Ascot Manor, had succumbed, and, next to Lady Grantchester, there was no one whom it was so delightful not to meet. Personally he disliked large Saturday till Monday parties, but one had to go somewhere, and a small party was always charming. He began, in fact, to promise himself a very pleasant visit.

Otherwise the papers contained nothing of interest except a bombastic telegram from a certain Imperial personage to a successful prize-fighter, and further additions to the list of distinguished forgers in the Dreyfus case. So he looked out of the window and counted telegraph posts, remembering the tens and forgetting the hundreds, and thought bitterly to himself that if it had only been Sherlock Holmes who was thus employed, it would certainly be found that an important criminal investigation would owe its success to this idle pastime. But he had the grace to confess that so eminent a detective would not, like himself, always forget the hundreds.

Ascot was reached in complete safety without any incident. The train did not run off the lines, and no escaped madman got into any carriage. Jack felt mildly inclined to congratulate the station-master, and, as it was a delightful spring afternoon, he left his man to follow with his luggage in a cab while he walked on.

His way lay across the heath, where he passed strange men, in red coats and attitudes so distorted that they looked as if they were in the agonies of strychnine poisoning, playing at golf. Jack was perfectly aware that it took all sorts to make a world, but the outrageousness of some of the sorts constantly filled him with amusement. To hit a ball for three miles and then come home again seemed to him an inglorious way of spending the afternoon, yet an afternoon spent on that delectable upland could scarcely be considered wasted. Spring was sensibly in the air; two days ago, though the weather was warmer than it was to-day, it had been as emphatically winter as to-day was spring. Some mysterious change too subtle for analysis had since then come over the face of the sky and the land in spite of the coldness. The air was as different in quality from the atmosphere of any autumn or winter day as is the red of the sky before sunrise from the red of the sky after sunset. Though the most delicate instruments might be unable to find any difference in the constitution of the two lights, any one could feel that sunrise was pregnant with light, sunset with darkness. And autumn days, however mellow, were ready to bring forth winter, but to-day winter lay about in melting, broken fragments like some thawstruck snow statue.

The house stood above a plantation of aromatic, whispering pines. His hostess, Lady Smarden, met him on the lawn, prepared, if need be, to be tragic. She, too, was suggestive of spring; she wore a large hat and carried a parasol and a book, just as if she had been reading under a tree.

"Oh, Jack, it is awful," she cried, without greeting him. "My party has completely broken down, and you and Ronald are the only bits that have been saved. May Grantchester has the influenza, Colonel Merriman has the influenza—the microbes must have been swarming—and his wife won't leave him, Mrs. Wyvis has sprained her ankle, your mother has just telegraphed that she can't come, and Lily Arbuthnot's aunt is dying. It is so selfish of people to behave like that. Ronald is already here, and you are here. By the way, how are you? Isn't it awful?"

"I am so sorry," said Jack.

Lady Smarden shrugged her shoulders and put her very pretty nose in the air.

"That is the finishing touch," she said. "Trample on me. I thought you always said that you hated Saturday to Monday parties and much preferred nobody being there!"

"Oh, if I am allowed to say that I am glad, it is quite a different matter," said Jack. "But just now you were such a genuinely tragic air that I thought it more prudent to be sympathetic till I knew. Personally I am delighted, I am really. I have been grateful more than once to Lily Arbuthnot's aunt. She is constantly dying; how fatiguing she must find it."

"I shall get an aunt," remarked Lady Smarden, putting up her parasol. "They are so useful, and so few things are useful. Do you know of one disengaged? Or shall I advertise in the Exchange and Mart?"

"Yes, I know one. Her name is Mrs. Harris. The same name as Lily Arbuthnot's."

"Yes, that is a curious coincidence. She comes in Dickens, too, does she not? Come and have tea, Jack. Ronald came an hour ago, but Smarden is in London. He is being a chairman at some dinner to-night, and he won't be back till late. So after dinner we'll all sit down with our elbows on the table and all talk at once, and not listen to what anybody else is saying. That is so pleasant. I hate being listened to. Oh, isn't it a lovely afternoon. It is spring at last!"

"I felt that, too," said Jack, "and that is why I walked. I only walk in spring. It is too hot in the summer and too wet in the winter."

"And the autumn?" asked Lady Smarden.

"I forget this minute. I think it's close time in the autumn. But how does one know it is spring? It certainly is, and if I was a bird I should build a nest at once. Yet it is colder than it has been for a month past."

"That is exactly how we know it," remarked Lady Smarden. "I wore furs for the first time since last July. One never wears fur in the winter now; it is too hot."

"Which, the fur or the winter?"

"Both, of course. But why can't your mother come?"

"I haven't an idea," said Jack. "I saw her yesterday and she said nothing to me about being unable. She looked worried, I thought, and out of gear."

Lady Smarden glanced sideways at Jack a moment.

"Indeed? I am sorry to hear that. Do you know at all what worried her?"

"Not at all. I asked her what the matter was and she was really rather angry with me. She said nothing was the matter, and advised me to get out of the habit of always supposing that something was the matter with people. She did me an injustice; that is not a habit of mine at all."

"You were probably only scapegoat for other people who had asked her the same thing," said Lady Smarden. "I quite sympathize with her. There is nothing so detestable as being told one looks ill when one is not quite well. Whenever I am out of sorts I want to wear a label round my neck with 'I was never better in my life' printed on it."

"Going to a doctor always upsets one so," remarked Jack. "If I am quite well before, the very sight of the magazines on the table of the consulting-room makes my tongue turn white."

"Then magazines are useful to doctors, at least," said Lady Smarden. "It never occurred to me before that they were useful to anybody. Well, here is tea, and here is Ronald. Ronald, you have some curious affinity with tea. I notice that you always arrive together."

Ronald nodded wearily to Jack, and sat down with extreme slowness.

"The remnant of the Old Guard," he said in a low voice, "then had tea. I feel as if the whole of London had gone through a battle or an earthquake, or something violent, and that we are the only survivors. You must except, of course, Lily Arbuthnot's aunt. She always survives—it is one of the privileges of being dangerously ill—and I will lay long odds that she will live as long as Lily herself."

Jack had found a very comfortable chair, where he lay reclined.

"This is really so much nicer than a large party," he said to Lady Smarden. "If Lily's aunt hadn't survived her last illness and everybody else hadn't caught the influenza, we should all be discussing European affairs or Australian test-matches, of which I am bold to say we know nothing whatever."

"But between us we could have invented or discovered something about it," said Ronald. "It is odd that when a dozen people talk about any subject of which they know nothing, at the end of half an hour they all know all about it."

"Yes, talking certainly is the cause of everything that happens," said Lady Smarden. "They don't discover, Ronald, they invent. In the same way if one talks about influenza, one gets it."

"Then let's talk about something else," said Jack fervently. "Let's talk about all the people who haven't come. It is an unexpected opportunity."

"I am sorry about your mother, Jack," said Lady Smarden. "I hope nothing serious is the matter."

"It is not likely. I think she is freer from worries than any one I know."

Lady Smarden looked up and caught Ronald's eye.

"I should say the same about you," she remarked. "Well, we've got to make the best of each other till Monday. In any case, the worst thing of all hasn't happened."

"What is that?"

"That the party should half break down," said she, "the only thing to hope for when it begins cracking is that it should break altogether. If half the people come, one never knows whether one is bound to make an effort or not. To-night I intend to make no effort. If I feel inclined, I shall read a book at dinner."

"I thought we were all going to talk together with our elbows on the table," said Jack.

"Nobody shall dictate to me in my own house," said Lady Smarden. Then, after a pause, "And you shall dictate to me nowhere."

Jack laughed.

"I wasn't dictating, my dear cousin," he said, "I was only repeating your own orders for the day."

"Oh, Jack, don't argue. There is nothing so enfeebling. It is worse than reading the papers. I must go and write letters of condolence to Lily's aunt and the others. It is tiresome; I can never remember when the post leaves. It is either seven in the morning or seven in the evening. So I write letters in time for both, and it is always the other one. And so they are twelve hours late for each other. You understand?" she asked hopefully.

"Perfectly. It is like the two people who mistook each other for somebody else, and found it was neither of them."

Lady Smarden rose.

"Yes, I know that class of person," she said, "it lives entirely at garden parties, it always shakes hands with me. To be a constant quantity at garden parties argues an extraordinary lack of friends. If one has any friends there are so many better ways of amusing oneself. I do not care at all to see a host of acquaintances."

"It all depends what you mean by friends," said Jack.

"People I would go bail for," replied Lady Smarden.

"That is an exalted idea of friendship."

"Is that cynical? If so, I disagree with you."

"No, it is not at all cynical," said he. "What I mean is that one knows so little of anybody. His virtues, or his seven deadly vices, if he has so many, are the last things a man shows one. For one does not choose one's friends for such reasons."

"Oh Jack, you are talking nonsense," said Lady Smarden quickly. "All the same, there is a grain of truth in what you say. Well, will you two look after yourselves or each other for an hour? I simply must write these unnecessary letters!"

Without being exactly singled out as a favourite of fortune, Jack Littledale had material enough to guarantee a hope that his life would be undistinguished by unpleasant shocks or hideous surprises. His mother had been the second wife of Lord Godalming, and had been left a widow with one son, young, and with the faculty of pleasure still unimpaired. She was supposed to be fairly well off, she was certainly very pretty, and immensely popular, and, as far as the world knew, she had as little to worry her as even Jack had. His leisure time, so he said, was occupied at the Foreign Office, the bulk of the day was passed in congenial society. He had a delightful set of rooms in town, he appeared regularly at all the places where money is habitually thrown about, he dressed immaculately, and lived with all the studied insouciance of a young man of large fortune. Exactly how he managed to do this was a puzzle to those who knew that he had been left only some £12,000 by his father, and it was not conceivable that he was meditating a short course only on his capital, or even a shorter one by the aid of negotiations with those amiable gentlemen who lend money on note of hand only. He had a slight tinge of secretiveness about him which to a certain extent he cultivated. For the rest he was popular, well-looking, and well looked on; he was welcomed wherever he went, and he went everywhere. Life at present had held for him nothing more serious than toothache, and an absence of trumps at "bridge."

Lady Smarden did not bring a book to dinner, but she brought a good deal of vivacity, and criticized the place which had been assigned to her in the universe.

"It was all right to make me a woman," she said, "and yet five years ago, if I had had the disposal of myself, I should have chosen to be a man. But it would have been a mistake—instead of doing things, I should only have thought about the things I intended to do, and I do that already. I should never have exercised the only gift in which men are more finely endowed than we."

"What gift do you mean?" asked Ronald.

"The gift of initiating things. It is no use denying it. You have it more than we have. If a man wants a thing, he goes and gets it, or tries to. If a woman wants a thing, she persuades somebody to get it for her."

"The New Woman movement persuaded nobody to get her anything," remarked Jack.

"It is a good instance of what I am saying," said Lady Smarden. "Certain women desired vague things which they called rights. They tried to get them for themselves, and in consequence nobody but a few novelists took the slightest interest in their proceedings."

"And even the skirt for lady-bicyclists is coming back" remarked Ronald.

"Well, you would now choose to be a woman" said Jack. "Is there anything you would alter? Really everything else is a detail."

"I should choose to have either a great deal more money, or a great deal less" said Lady Smarden, "and I don't really much care which. If one lives in a certain way, one should be able to do so without giving it a thought. What that way is hardly matters at all. I should be perfectly content never to go to London again, and never again to have coffee after dinner if I was sure that we couldn't afford it. Unfortunately, I believe that we just can."

"I will refuse coffee to-night, if you wish" said Ronald, "you can warm it up for breakfast."

"No, I said I thought we could afford it!"

"I neither want a penny more nor a penny less than I have" said Jack.

"Happy man! It is the rarest thing. What it means is that you have rather more than you ever want to spend. Sixpence a year more than you want is enough. Well, we'll talk about you a little. What do you want changed?"

Jack considered.

"I don't want anything changed" he said at length. "I don't want to run any experiments of that sort. I regard one's whole environment as the background of a figure which is oneself. I didn't paint the picture, and I am afraid to touch the background. One might throw the lights all wrong, and give oneself a horrible smudge over the face!"

Lady Smarden laughed.

"You have no smudge on your face" she said, "it is admirably clean. But, Jack, I have often wondered whether you don't wear a mask; whether we see your real face."

"No, I assure you I don't wear a mask," he said. "What is true is that I appreciate the value of possible privacy in one's life. If I choose to go away from London during the season, I see no reason for publishing my diary when I get back, nor for having my accounts audited by the public censor. But I am never unwilling to answer any question, and I will answer it truthfully."

"Do you mean that?" asked Lady Smarden.

"Certainly I mean it. I am at your service."

"Then, Jack, how in the name—in the name of mammon do you manage to appear so well off? Do you go to the Jews, and soften their hard hearts, or do you live on your capital? O, I love being told that I may ask impertinent questions."

Jack laughed. He would sooner that this particular question had not been asked, but he preferred to reply rather than to refuse to do so.

"There is no mystery about it," he said, "my money—if you wish to know, I have £12,000—is well invested. I invest it myself. That is all. I have never borrowed a shilling, nor touched a shilling of my capital!"

"I should like to know what your investments are," said Lady Smarden.

"I will even tell you that. People we all respect have money in concerns like the Empire Theatre—"

"The vestries do," remarked Ronald, "it keeps the streets clean."

"True; others in businesses which tend to make people drunk. Personally I lend money to a money-lender. A sort of biter-bit affair, isn't it?"

Lady Smarden stared.

"Explain. I don't understand," she said.

"It is exceedingly simple. He often requires large sums at a moment's notice. Banks and such places, I believe, do not look very kindly on money-lenders, but personally I am indifferent. He wants, let me say, £500 at once for one of those misguided people who want it at once, and who will, as long as the world goes round, continue to pay sixty per cent. for it. Then it is worth his while to give me fifteen per cent. Occasionally I have lent him upwards of £10,000. There is no risk, at least of very little. He once kept it six months. At the end he returned to me a cheque for £10,750. At the present moment he is paying me fifteen per cent. on £5,000. It makes a difference to a person of only very moderate income."

"It trebles it," said Lady Smarden.

"Yes; it more than trebles it. Now, that is the sort of information about myself I don't employ a street crier for, though I am not ashamed of it. Other people have prejudices, and I respect them. That is all."

Lady Smarden sat quite silent a minute, playing with her dessert knife.

"It is a surprise to me, Jack," she said at last. "You were quite right when you said how little we knew about people. Oh, I am a blunt woman. I don't say it's wrong, but simply I shouldn't do it. Have you considered? Have you thought what your money does? How, indirectly, it may drive people to despair? Supposing I was in the hands of that man—O, Jack, do stop it. Every time you get your fifteen per cent. it means that somebody else is paying, as you say, sixty."

"Yes, I have thought of that. But I don't see how it concerns me. People who pay sixty per cent. for money are fools."

It really is no business of mine. If I did not invest money in such a way, would fewer people go to the money-lenders?"

Lady Smarden felt seriously about this point. She again glanced at Ronald, who shook his head.

"I don't like it, Jack," she went on, "and I wouldn't do it if I were you. You might find that—that any one was being ruined by the man to whom you lend this money. Supposing Ronald or I had been in his debt, you would not like that."

"Ronald and you, I am sure, don't go to money-lenders. I suppose somebody is underpaid in every stitch of clothing we have on, but that doesn't make us go about in towels. Yet if you were secretly an underpaid needlewoman, I should quite dislike the thought that you had sewed in the lining of my coat. I grant that."

Lady Smarden laughed.

"Well, I said that it was enfeebling to argue. Let us stop. Come, we'll go into the other room and play bridge with a dummy. It is far more amusing than talking about investments."

Jack wandered to the window while the servant was putting out the table, and Lady Smarden went across to the table where Ronald was looking at a paper.

"Shall I tell him?" she asked in a low voice.

"Yes, tell him to-morrow," he said. "But after all it is only a suspicion."

Lord Smarden came home before they had been playing for very long. They heard the wheels of his carriage on the gravel outside, and before many minutes his man came to tell Lady Smarden that he would like to see her for a moment. She had just dealt, and left her hand without looking at it.

Lord Smarden was standing in the hall.

"Who is in the house?" he asked.

"Jack Littledale and Ronald only," she said. "What is the matter, Smarden?"

He drew the last edition of an evening paper from his pocket.

"Read that," he said, pointing to a small paragraph. She read it, and her face grew white to the lips.

"Will you tell him?" he asked.

"One of us must. If you like I will. O, poor Jack! Poor Jack!"

"Poor Jack?"

"It is worse, more complicated, I am afraid, than you know."

"What do you mean?" he asked.

"I can't tell you. Perhaps it is nothing."

They went back together to the drawing room. Ronald was sitting at the piano, playing softly, Jack at the card table, looking through the hand which had just been dealt him.

Lord Smarden walked quickly over to the piano, and took Ronald out of the room. Jack was left alone with Lady Smarden.

"Aren't we going to finish this hand," he said, "or are we all going to have interviews with Lord Smarden somewhere out of the room? Why, something is the matter."

"Yes, something is the matter, Jack. I will tell you." She paused a moment.

"It is about your mother. She was made a bankrupt on her own petition yesterday afternoon."

Jack frowned.

"It is impossible. I must have known. To whom is she in debt?"

"Smarden has just shown me the evening paper. To a money-lender."

Jack gave one little gulping breath.

"The name?" he said.

"Samuels, of Jermyn-street."

Jack rose from his chair with extreme deliberation and flicked a speck of cigarette-ash from his coat.

"Yes, that is the man," he said.

Notes.

Literature—or, rather, literary journalism—was one of the many branches of activity in which the late Dr. Robert Wallace distinguished himself. He first won fame as a popular preacher, but retired from the ministry in 1876 to become the editor of the Scotsman. Various reasons have been given in obituary notices for his resignation of that important post. The true reason, which has not been given, is that he could never bring himself to write in a hurry; the more urgent the demands of the printers for copy, the stronger the necessity he felt for polishing what he had written with the anxious care of a scholar. Consequently he made up his mind to leave the editorial chair. As a contributor to the best reviews and magazines he was more at his ease; and he also wrote the article on Church history for the Encyclopædia Britannica. It has been announced that, at the time of his death, Dr. Wallace was engaged in writing his reminiscences. We may add that Messrs. Sands had undertaken to publish them, but we believe that only a small portion of the book has been finished. Dr. Wallace was a brother of Mr. William Wallace, of Glasgow, the well-known literary critic. It is not the case, as the Westminster Gazette has stated, that his daughter, Miss Margaret Wallace, is on the stage. Miss Wallace retired from the stage two years ago.

Some interesting correspondence between Mr. T. Mullett Ellis and Messrs. W. H. Smith and Sons concerning the action of the latter firm in refusing to expose for sale Mr. Ellis' novel "God is Love" is published in the Author. The letters do not make it clear whether the book was "warned off" because of an admitted objection to the title or "purely as a matter of business." What is clear is that Messrs. Smith and Son are perfectly within their rights in protesting that they are not "bound to place on the bookstalls everything that is tendered" to them. An argument which would fix them with this obligation might also be used to prove that publishers are bound to publish every book that is offered to them, and that no editor is at liberty to reject an MS. Messrs. Smith and Son may, of course, like publishers and editors, commit errors of judgment, or allow themselves to be unduly influenced by the personal equation; but the personal equation cannot be eliminated from the conduct of any business, and there is nothing to be gained by demanding that booksellers shall be required to submit their judgment to that of any author who proposes to do business with them.

There is a pleasant literary flavour in the dialogue of Mr. Carton's new play at the Court Theatre, Wheels Within Wheels, which helps to make it something more than "an original comedy" in name alone. Having discovered his capabilities in plays of the genre of Lord and Lady Algy and The White Elephant, Mr. Carton wisely keeps to this model and has produced an excellent variant upon the same motif. It is a clever picture of modern life, artificial yet convincing, for to be cunningly artificial is the secret of comedy. The dialogue is full of touches such as "no man is very short if a woman can look up to him." Every scene is enlivened by humour. In broad contrast to it stands Mr. Clyde Fitch's The Cowboy and the Lady. Good work from America is assured a generous reception here, but this play is hardly more than a candid melodrama of crude design with faint suggestions of Bret Harte.

It seems that the house, No. 47, Leicester-square, formerly in the occupation of Sir Joshua Reynolds, and now in that of Messrs. Puttick and Simpson, the literary auctioneers, is not to be pulled down after all. Extensive internal alterations are already in progress, but the front part of the house will be left intact and is now being repainted. This is good news for all who object to the continuous destruction of old London landmarks. For the present, at any rate, the whole west side of Leicester-square remains secure.

A further sign of literary activity among the Celts is a proposal to found a permanent Welsh Dramatic Society in London. Following on the launching of the Irish Literary Theatre in Dublin, and the organization of the Breton Union, on April 14 last, a meeting was held in London to consider the project, and the objects of the Dramatic Company were approved, viz:—"For the public performance of Celtic plays, either in the vernacular or in English; and by such means, and the publicity thereby ensured, to afford encouragement to native playwrights by offering opportunities for the public representation of their works." A committee was appointed, and Elphin's "Y Bardd a'r Cerddor" was chosen for the first performance. This, we believe, is to take place at St. George's-hall some time in November.

The would-be promoters of modern Welsh drama have no great names to conjure with, and their choice of plays is also restricted for the reason that Welsh writers have hitherto had no real incentive given them for turning their attention to the drama. Occasional prizes have certainly been offered by the National Eisteddfodau, but this has been apparently done on the principle of buying an article and never using it. According to the prospectus of the new Welsh Dramatic Company, the only prize offered will be a laurel-wreath, and even that will be left to posterity to award; but the company seems to pledge itself to help the ambitious bard as much as possible towards the desired end by promising an adequate public performance of his work. As regards the comedy selected for the trial performance ("Y Bardd a'r Cerddor") it is not so much a definitely constructed comedy as it is a satirical "skit" directed against the absurdities perpetrated at a certain National Eisteddfod a few years back, plus a couple of small love-episodes. It is written colloquially, sometimes in the vernacular, sometimes in English; and its one merit lies in the fact that it gives us a faithful picture of modern Welsh Eisteddfodic life. But something better may, no doubt, be expected in the future.

In another column we review the first three volumes in the exhaustive collection of English verse which Professor Arber is editing under the title of "British Anthologies." Anthologies, besides separating the wheat from the chaff (as in Matthew Arnold's edition of Wordsworth), serve the purpose of preserving what would otherwise be lost. For example, many of the epigrams in the Palatine Anthology, and of the ballads in Percy's Reliques, would have perished or have been forgotten but for these collections. It is owing to anthologies as much as to reprints that we now know more about our medieval and traditional literature than was known to Englishmen who were some centuries nearer to it than we are. Anthologies, too, have opened up new vistas in literary research. At first editors, as Mr. Andrew Lang has said, "were content to study the ballads of their own countryside, or, at most, of Great Britain." But the efforts of early anthologists led to the discovery of parallels between the ballads of different countries and ages, and of interesting similarities in the occasions which have given rise to them. This study has been helped by anthologies preserving the traditional poetry of a country—as Chepman and Myllor preserved the Scottish ballads—and by such works as Scott and Jamieson's book showing the parallels between Tentic and Scandinavian ballads.

The anthology may be said to have arisen in England with the desire to preserve unwritten poetry after it had ceased to be sung or recited. To-day it assumes every shape which the versatile modern can devise. One, like Mr. Ward, traces the evolution of poetry from Chaucer to Rossetti; another, like Mr. Henley, that of a single branch, the English lyric. A third gathers the flowers of a special cult, as in Mr. Beeching's "Lyra Sacra," or those of one fertile age, as in the numerous collections from Elizabethan song-books, made by Mr. A. H. Bullen and others. A fourth classifies his readers, and beginning with the children, provides them with a Blue Poetry Book. A fifth gathers all the flowers which have sprung up from the same soil, in an anthology of "The Lakes" or a local history of "London in Song." Another, more ingenious still, makes a mental division of his excerpts into those of "wit and humour" or those of "fancy and imagination."

But if there is no limit to anthologies, there is a limit to their legitimacy. They are properly collections of gems which require no setting to reveal their entire beauty. This was so with the first anthology, that of Meleager. "The Hyacinth of Alcæus," "The Honeysuckle of Anacreon," "The Myrtle-berry of Callimachus," and "The Golden Bough of Plato" were self-sufficing. But the modern anthology often contains scraps from authors whose beauties cannot be fully enjoyed out of their environment. Poets such as Chaucer and Spenser, who depend for their effect upon their narrative, appear at a disadvantage. The reader gets but an incomplete idea of Chaucer from anthologies such as Mr. Cowden Clarke's "Riches of Chaucer." Just when he begins to realize how a tale was told in the middle ages, he finds himself confronted with a line of stars, after which the narrative proceeds from another point. Besides a too extended use of anthologies weakens the curiosity which impels a true lover of poetry to find out beauties for himself. The pleasure of receiving a bouquet cannot be compared with the joy of gathering the flowers, and the summit of a poet's inspiration is the more beautiful to those who have been with him upon the ascent.

A correspondent writes:—"There is another and an equally good version of the circular so well translated into elegiacs by Mr. Massey of Wadham many years ago. The circular, in this case, ran as follows:—

Reverend Sir,—You are requested to attend a meeting of the Bridge Committee on Saturday, the 5th of November, at 12 o'clock, to consider Mr. Diffies' proposal for laying down gas-pipes. We are, Rev. Sir, your obedient servants,
SMITH and SON, Solicitors.

Professor B. H. Kennedy translated it thus:—

Consilio bonus intersis de ponte rogamus
Saturni sacro, vir reverende, die.
Nonas, ne frustre, dies erit ille Novembres,
Sextaque delectos convocat hora viros.
Carbonum luci suadet struxisse canales
Diphilus; ambitur prosit an obit opus.
Hæc tibi devinoti Fabri, natusque paterque,
Actores socii, vir reverende, dabant.

As a further illustration of the base uses to which elegiacs may be put, I may perhaps mention that a year or two ago Sir E. Ashmead Bartlett gave notice of a motion to the effect that, in the event of the disintegration of the Chinese Empire, it would be the duty of the Government to acquire a naval base in the Gulf of Pechili, to control the valley of the West River, and to bring the Yangtze Kiang within our sphere of influence. One of the reporters translated the resolution:—

Si pereant Seres, tardeque labantia regna
Viribus Anglorum non bene fulta ruant,
Ilicet, O Patres, tutum conquirite portum
Quo possit Pechili classis adire sinum.
Occidui rivi subigat deinde Anglia valles,
Necnon Yangtze fluat sub juga nostra Kiang."

All who are interested in modern German letters will learn with regret that Klaus Groth—whose place among the dialect poets of the Fatherland is, perhaps, beneath that of no other writer except Fritz Reuter—has just died at his residence in Kiel. He had recently celebrated his eightieth birthday in excellent health. He was born in 1819, at Heide, in Holstein, where his father was a poor miller. He attended the village school, but was chiefly self-taught, and became an excellent classical scholar. At the Isle of Fehmarn, where he went to recover his strength after a period of overstudy, he completed his first volume of poems in the Ditmarsch dialect. Highly recommended by Ernst Moritz Arndt, and with a preface from the pen of Klaus Harms, the famous theologian, the work appeared, under the title "Quickborn," in 1855—prior, therefore, to the publication of Reuter's maiden effort—and at once established his reputation. His next production was a book of High German verse, and he also wrote an historical treatise, "Ueber Hochdeutsch und Plattdeutsch," and an entertaining volume of "Lebenserinnerungen." After the "Quickborn," however, the most popular of his works are a series of charming prose tales, entitled "Vertellen." In Kiel, Groth was not more famous as a writer than as a professor of the German language and literature and a lover of classical music. Among his closest friends was Joachim, the violinist, and his "musical Saturday evenings" were for a long time the principal social functions of the Baltic seaport town. He lived there for two-and-forty years, and, in accordance with his own wish, has been buried under a favourite beech-tree in his beautiful garden.

In New South Wales a remarkable example in literary generosity has been set by Mr. D. S. Mitchell, who has offered the Public Library at Sydney a collection of books, MSS., engravings, &c., valued at the lowest estimate at about £100,000. In consequence of this offer a new public library is to be erected, which, when completed, will be even larger than the present one. The familiar practice of supplying country centres by sending out boxes of books has a special utility in New South Wales, where the periodical arrival of these boxes must be a great godsend to the solitary inhabitants of the bush. In 1898 231 boxes, containing 17,253 volumes, and travelling a distance of 81,303 miles, were sent out.

The committee of the Boston Public Library have recently received from Miss Lilian Whiting a valuable addition to their property. This consists of a number of autograph letters written to the late Kate Field by George Eliot, Anthony Trollope, Charles Dickens, Walter Savage Landor, and the two Brownings. The late head of the Boston Library, Mr. Herbert Putnam, has succeeded to the post of Librarian of Congress. He is a son of the founder of the well-known American publishing house.

A further instalment of the late Sir Thomas Phillipps' collection has been on sale at Sotheby's. On Monday last a manuscript of the twelfth century entitled, "Registrum Epistolarum Alexandri III.," &c., written on vellum by an English scribe, produced £9 10s., while a copy of the works of Aristotle sold for £29. This MS., beautifully written on fine vellum and dating from the thirteenth century, was purchased on behalf of the Belgian Royal Library. Other MSS. sold comprised a series of works classed as "Astronomia," folio, thirteenth century, on vellum with coloured capitals, £21; and another series on the same subject, £38. The latter was written during the years 1276 and 1277 and contained numerous diagrams. A "Tractatus de reprobatione Falsae Monarchie," addressed to Graziolo di Bambioli, Chancellor of Bologna in the fourteenth century, brought £20 3s.; a MS. of the "Miracula" of Thomas à Becket, formerly in the Abbey of Pointigny, where Becket took refuge after his quarrel with King Henry, vellum, twelfth century, £31; and a volume of the Rules of the Order of St. Benedict, dated 1638, on stout vellum, £20.

The MSS. disposed of on Tuesday were not so important, though the prices realized appear good. An "Abstract of all the Administrations to Intestates," written by Sir William Betham, Ulster King of Arms in 1802, four vols., folio, sold for £14; an exposition on the Old Testament, written on vellum during the thirteenth century, and formerly belonging to the Abbé Allard, from whom Sir Thomas Phillipps obtained it, £16; a copy of the New Testament, Wycliffe's Translation, written on stout vellum by a fourteenth-century scribe, £41; a fourteenth-century MS. sermon by John Wycliffe on Matthew XV., £19; the original MS. of the "Odarum de Laude Dei Libri," written in the fifteenth century on vellum and paper for Budericus, first Prior of the Monastery of Elzegen, £15 10s.; the original "Book of Ordinances of the Household of Charles I.," signed by the King himself, £30 10s.; and a book of "Chronicles" of the twelfth century, written on vellum with coloured initials, £32. This last-named MS. comprised several distinct works, among them the "Historia de Triumphis et Bellis Alexandri Magni."

The libraries of the late Mr. C. W. Johnson and Mr. G. W. Johnson—authors of several works on agriculture and gardening—which will be sold by Messrs. Hodgson during the coming week, contain a fine collection of county histories and topographical works, with much else of interest, including a number of extra illustrated books and a collection of works on English and foreign costume. One important item is a copy of the third and last impression of Caxton's "Golden Legend," printed in 1493 most probably by Wynkyn de Worde, the date of the colophon being two years after that of Caxton's death. Though a sound and clean copy, it wants the woodcut title and some leaves at the beginning and end, which have been supplied in carefully executed facsimile. Only nine copies of the above are recorded by Blades, the only perfect one being that in the Spencer-Rylands Library.

A LITERARY CAUSERIE.

[By C. K. S.]

LONDON, June 5, 1899.

Dr. Johnson's sigh over the little learning that there is in the world must be echoed by many an editor. Plurality of reviewing, of which we have heard something of late, is frequently due to the difficulties of the editor as to a qualified person. When he receives a novel for review, or even a volume of poems, he is happy enough. There are hundreds of young men—and young women—who can review works of imagination. Most of them know little enough, it may be, of the history of literature; they may not have developed in any very strong degree the spirit for romance; but inspiration and intuition are counted the best guides when fiction is to be judged, and we all more or less claim these qualities.

It is quite otherwise when we are treating of the world of scholarship. Of course, the purely literary paper is always well provided for, and any references to pluralism in reviews have no bearings upon the purely literary journals. It is with the journal in which the literary contents play a subordinate part that the trouble arises. The journal that is primarily literary has its staff of specialists; the journal that is primarily political, religious, pictorial, or whatever may be the "note," has no easy time in its selection of reviewers. To the editor of such a journal I give a sympathy that is based upon experience. The editor of Literature has all the learning of the universities to draw upon; the editor of a political organ, of a religious organ, or of a pictorial newspaper has his government to demolish, his theology to maintain, his "stars of the footlights" to photograph, it may be. He cannot be expected to go beyond the authors of published books for his reviewers, and these he cannot always secure.

Here, for example, is a dainty re-issue of the late Dr. Plumptre's Dante. Isbister is the publisher, and the five leather-bound volumes are a treat to handle, although they do suggest Messrs. Dent's edition of Dickens, but, after all, both Dante and Dickens begin with a "D." Here, pretty well, the conventional reviewer who "does" the novels so well will be content to stop. He might, indeed, add what is obvious, that the notes to this Dante are full of sound learning and greatly enhance our enjoyment of the text. But, should I, as one of the editors in question, demand more than this of my reviewer, to whom shall I turn? I know of three Dante scholars, and of three only. I am aware that there are sundry clergymen, from Bishops downwards, who are credited with being students of the Divine Comedy, but I distrust them. But even supposing that I, in my capacity as editor, can secure one or other of these gentlemen—and one of them, I know, has frequently reviewed six copies of one Dante book for six separate newspapers—how can I have the heart to attempt to monopolize his services? The proprietor of my paper will not permit a too lavish honorarium. I must be content to share him with other editors equally discerning, and then we can none of us use his signature. It would emphasize too much our lack of instinct for editorial monopoly if his name appeared not only in our columns but in those of three or four of our contemporaries.

The undoubted success of the Literary Theatre in Dublin, with its performances of Mr. W. B. Yeats' Countess Kathleen and of Mr. Edward Martyn's Heather Field, has undoubtedly affected literary London, as, indeed, has Mr. Yeats' appeal at Trinity College against the cosmopolitan spirit in literature. Not only Ireland, but South Africa, Australia, and New Zealand must follow Americans, Mr. Yeats thinks, in making their own national literature, even though it has to be in the English tongue. Meanwhile, The Heather Field has been performed in London, and it is to be followed, in the autumn by a new play from Mr. Yeats, entitled The Shadowy Waters. The play—about the length of The Land of Heart's Desire—is to be brought out as a curtain-raiser at one of the West-end theatres. Mr. Yeats thinks it is the best thing that he has written. I am inclined to complain of the lack of astuteness of London theatre managers where a writer of Mr. Yeats' powers is concerned. The Land of Heart's Desire has already had some measure of success as a curtain-raiser. But why does not Mr. Tree, usually so intellectually alert in these matters, produce it at Her Majesty's instead of that stupid piece with the big drum, The First Night? The public is ready for a play of this kind now; it was not ready a few years ago.

Foreign Letter.

ITALY.

"To the dogs who hissed the play at Naples." Such was to be the dedication of La Gloria, Gabriele D'Annunzio's last play, the production, failure, and publication of which have lately formed the chief literary event in Italy. The dramatist apparently has recovered from his disappointment, for the tragedy, as it now appears in book form, is dedicated "Ai cipressi di Mamalus." We do not regret the change: the irritable race of writers has given already examples of petulance more than sufficient to justify the taunt implied in that phrase. Moreover, in this case, we should have felt constrained to confess that, judging the play from the point of view of the stage, we are on the side of the dogs. Not that a failure, more or less, can have any effect on the position which, as a stylist, D'Annunzio has won for himself in Italian literature. Second, but second only to Carducci, among living Italian poets, as a prose writer he is the recognized leader of an entirely new movement. In the preface to "Il Trionfo della Morte" he tabulated his creed. The Italian tongue, he says there, has nothing to envy and nothing to borrow from any other European language when seeking to describe both the outer physical world of these days and the more complicated inner, or mental world, the study of which has been brought into vogue by modern psychologists. The necessary words exist, but, he complains, they are not in fashion with modern writers, who needlessly restrict their vocabulary and cramp the flow and rhythm of their style. The remedy is to be sought in a careful study of old theological works, where the psychology of other days found a home. We may assume that he has followed his own prescription, and, if that be the somewhat humorous case, it is curious to note that his style in its sonorous cadences, exotic phrasing, and strangely haunting rhythms, distinctly suggests the coloured prose of M. Huysmans, whose knowledge of early theology is displayed, it will be remembered, in "A Rebours" and elsewhere. In his novels D'Annunzio remains the lyric poet. An exquisite painter of scenery, an adept in describing emotions, he is obviously deficient in the constructive faculty, in the creative gift, which mark the truly great novelist. The "Triumph of Death," for instance, bears something of the same relation to lyric poetry as does the "Confession d'un enfant du siècle" of Alfred de Musset.

But if in his novels he is too much the poet, in his plays he is too much the novelist. His characters analyse, discuss, and explain themselves and each other in prose of varied and extraordinary beauty, with the result that the action of the play is hopelessly spasmodic. Now and again, as in the conversation of the unnamed attendants in the second act of La Gloria, when Cesare Bronte lies dying, poisoned by his wife in an adjacent room, he borrows a device from Maeterlinck, but he has not that master's art of bringing across the footlights the vague, uneasy sense of a tragedy that is present but not apprehended. In La Gloria the dramatist has endeavoured to blend with this marvellous style of his something of the severity of the Greek manner of tragedy and a plot so modern as to borrow from recent Italian politics and to intrude on the domestic life of a prominent statesman. Practically, there are but two characters in the piece—La Commèna and Ruggero Flamma—and they were acted respectively by Eleonora Duse and Ermete Zacconi. Ruggero Flamma is represented as a windy, feverish, self-analysing reformer, possessed, yet overwhelmed, by his grand, altruistic political idea. To him La Commèna appears as the incarnation of La Gloria, he hails her as the guiding spirit of his endeavours, the fount of his inspiration. It is she who clears the way for his rise to power by poisoning her husband, Cesare Bronte, the imperious, reactionary old tyrant, who, strong, repressive, and vindictive, had cumbered the path of freedom and progress. And then Flamma, he who meant to be the herald of national regeneration, of a new life to his country—this is the tragic situation—finds himself mated with and dominated by this woman, who symbolizes the spirit of destruction, treachery, and bloodshed, the selfish spirit of personal ambition. "La Gloria mi somiglia," she says. She leads him to fight for himself and no longer for his idea; to put his faith in himself and no longer whole-heartedly in the truth of which he was the apostle; she poisons his mind against his friends; she will not have him love any one but herself, La Commèna—La Gloria. He must rule by force and fear, not love. Such is the teaching of the woman who represents the violence and personal ambition, the political tradition of the ancient world, and she stings him to cast aside his ambition for others, his idea of another and nobler glory. And when at length he tires of her, and is weary of the violence and bloodshed which has been thus forced upon him, when he wishes to renounce his power, to retire, and to start life afresh, peaceably, alone, still she dominates him. He cannot escape her; he cannot even kill her. It is she who at last, when his courage fails him in the presence of a shouting mob, kills him.

D'Annunzio works out his theme with a command of language and an insight into the workings of the emotions all his own, and for that reason the play will be read, though it could not be endured on the stage. It is characteristic that among the passages which one lingers over and reads again and again for the beauty of the language and rhythm are some of the stage directions. These are as lovely in their way as Coleridge's imaginative prose commentary to the Ancient Mariner. Listen, for instance, to this note, when La Commèna is first seen by Flamma. (Act I. Scene V.)

Dall'accento del comando la sua voce è discesa a una indefinibile nota di melodia che, interrotta, sembra prolungarsi nel più remoto mistero dell'essere, nella cieca oscurità naturale ove risiedono le leggi primitive per cui le sorti delle creature dinanzi alla vita e alla morte si congiungono nelle mille spire dell'odio e dell'amore. La sua voce sembra quasi interrogare, e tuttavia una sicurtà intrepida, una infallibile certezza la rendono affermatrice, come se dicesse: "Voi m'appartenete, voi siete mio." Ella è là, presso la porta, svelata, con quei suoi occhi pieni di destino, con quelle sue mani piene di offerta, dinanzi a colui che desidera il mondo. E sorride; ed ecco, il suo sorriso arresta il tempo, abolisce il mendo. E colui la guarda come un allucinato guarda la figura del suo dilirio, senza parola, con una specie di terrore dubitoso, non credendo alla realtà di quella presenza. "La Gloria?"

So much of the more elaborate and scholarly work of Italian writers is published in the form of occasional pamphlets, which almost inevitably escape notice, that it is comparatively seldom that we have the opportunity of welcoming a volume of research such as "L'Istruzione pubblica in Italia nei secoli VIII., IX., X.," by G. Salvioi. This book is the revised result of many years of labour, and it forms very appropriately an item in the "Biblioteca critica della letteratura Italiana," which is being issued under the general editorship of Professor Francesco Torraca. The author reserves for future discussion the methods and matter of mediæval study. In the present volume he contents himself with passing in review the schools and schoolmen who flourished throughout Italy up to the tenth century. "The culture," he asserts, and is ready to prove, "The culture of the Middle Ages is Roman, and the schools, even when they only repeat the psalmody of the monks, are the triumph of the Roman civilization. For the school, which passed through the vicissitudes of foreign conquests and dominations, surrounded by the prestige of a great tradition, was essentially a Roman school. The language, literature, and law, which it preserves as a sacred fire, are the work of the Roman civilization, to which not merely a few chosen spirits or a solitary prince are devoted, but a whole people."

A very readable volume of light, literary essays is Giuseppe Lesca's "Leggendo e annotando." To those who care for books about books and their authors—and who in these days does not?—we can cordially recommend it. As a critic, indeed, the author is not profound, and as an historian he has little that is new to tell us, but he writes very agreeably about interesting people such as Caterina Sforza, Carducci, Marradi, Tasso, and a dozen others, so that most English readers would find this collection instructive without being dry. But they should not trust too blindly to Signor Lesca's critical judgment. The publication of an Italian translation of part of General Church's memoirs has already been noted in Literature, "Brigantaggio e Società Segrete nelle Paglie dai Ricordi del Generale R. Church, 1817-1820." "Ricerche e Note dantesche," by Paget Toynbee, is another recent translation from the English.

There is always a certain small demand in England for wholesome Italian fiction. I shall therefore conclude this letter by drawing attention to a volume of half-a-dozen short stories by Grazia Deledda, entitled "Le Tentazioni." The stories are indeed of very unequal merit, but three of them are distinctly good. The eponymous tale, a very clever character study, is the most elaborate and the most successful, but almost equally good in their way are "I Marzu," a pretty idyll of bourgeois family life, and "Un piccolo uomo," a story with a plot of considerable originality, the interest of which is mainly psychological. The author has the gift of observation, and, if he writes with a little more self-criticism and sense of style, he should succeed in the manufacture of the short story. C.H.

LITERATURE IN THE SALON.

[FROM A CORRESPONDENT.]

It is the fashion nowadays to speak slightly of the literary quality in works of art, the "anecdotal" quality, as it has been called by one critic, the "illustrative" quality, as it has been called by another. Of course it is true that the first duty of a work of art is to be enjoyable as a thing of beauty, while its second, and, perhaps, higher duty is to be instructive as a revelation. None the less, the greatest popularity has been achieved by work, which, if deficient in decorative and interpretative qualities, has appealed to the passer-by simply as picturesque and lucid narrative. Of this incontrovertible fact the professors of the high doctrine of "art for art's sake" take small account. That doctrine itself originated in France. Yet nowhere else do we find so many artists of real talent giving themselves mainly to the production of the conte on canvas or in marble. This year's Salon is full of such work, and though to many the landscapes of MM. Pointelin and Harpignies may seem far more perfect, and the laughing maidens of M. Chabas, splashing in the sunny water, far more enjoyable, it is the literary pictures that draw the admiring crowds.

It has been said somewhat cynically that, judging from their pictures, the only books that French painters read are the Bible and the History of France. Whether they read these may be doubted, but, at any rate, they are their most frequent sources of inspiration. The classics, however, are not quite forgotten. M. Sieffert (a pupil of M. Gérôme) has painted the horror of the Eumenides, lying on the steps of the crypt of Delphi, awakened by the bitter cry of Clytemnestra's ghost, "What need have we of sleepers?" M. Roche-Grosse, too, has gone to Dion Cassius, and in his "Murder of the Emperor Geta" has given every possible detail, expressed or implied by the historian, even to the share taken in the assassination by Caracalla, and the blood that spurted on Julia Domna, the mother of both murderer and victim. But it is the story from the Bible or the tale from the French Wars that prevails. The finest example of this sort is M. Tattegrain's "Exodus from St. Quentin" after the storming by the army of Philip II. For two days the city has been given up to pillage, massacre, and outrage, and unspeakable cruelties have been perpetrated. As the Spanish officer puts it, in the quotation from the memoir affixed by M. Tattegrain, "Les Allemands, les Anglais, même les Espagnols ont commis de graves cruautés sur les femmes et les enfants—les hommes ont été tués." Nothing can be more naïve than the "même les Espagnols" unless it be the curt and casual "les hommes ont été tués." And M. Tattegrain, whose picture has earned him the gold medal conferred by ballot of all the exhibitors, has here told us everything that could be told.

The wars of Napoleon and of the Revolution have always been, and still are, more generally popular than those of the Cinque Cento, and from them incidents are culled still more plentifully. A spirited example, full of splendid movement and alive with the true life of the Revolution, represents the seizure of arms and cannon at the Invalides by the mob bent on the siege of the Bastille. Another is M. le Dru's "Hoche at Froeschweiler" putting the enemy's cannon up to auction. The class of historical short stories is a strong one, as may be supposed, but besides these and the sacred pictures properly so called, there is an intermediate class of parables and "moralités," greatly favoured in France for public decoration. One of the most elaborate is M. Debat-Ponsan's "Christ." He is standing on the mount uttering the words, "See that ye love one another even as I have loved you." Fronting him on the slope opposite stand the most Christian Kings—Francis I., Charles IX., and le Roi Soleil, with a long line of fighting ancestors, and in the hollow ground below lie many dead, pastors of the Cévennes, Coligny, and martyrs of religion. The sarcasm is a little trite, but the work is curious as showing the French bent in such matters at the present day. The episodes from the New Testament are extraordinarily numerous. Some of them belong in treatment to the purely conventional "sacred art" which has descended from the seventeenth century, and some endeavour, though with poor success, to deal with the Palestine of nineteen hundred years ago with archeological accuracy. A larger class hails between two opinions. The pious Fritz von Uhde represented Christ and his apostles as modern "illegal men" faring hard in a world that resented their communistic opinions, with the result that when the Emperor Frederick saw his pathetic "Last Supper" he roundly denounced it as an "Anarchistenfrass." The French painters of sacred subjects will not accept this position (except occasionally in a spirit of ribaldry) though they are drawn towards it, so that we have more than one "liethanie" in which Christ is the Saviour of the old masters, while Mary and Martha are French payannes. Perhaps the most pleasing picture of the sort is M. Clairin's "Virgin," a figure quite modern in sentiment, sitting by her spinning-wheel, watching a sleeping Child who is smiling in his dream.

The work of the sculptor, of course, lends itself to the conte less readily than that of the painter. How easily the limits within which he must work can be overstepped may be seen in the crucial example of the Dirce, perhaps the most famous work of a Greek provincial that has come down to us. But in what has been termed "the biographical essay in stone," the sculptor has had not unfrequently his most signal success. Last year M. Rodin, the great master of plastic ideals, essayed thus to deal with Balzac. His Balzac, as we all remember it, was a figure like, and with some of the impressive strength of, the bole of an oak tree. The traditional monk's frock concealed the hands and everything except the bigness of the body, and was topped by the square head with beetling brows and cavernous eyes, quite impressionistically modelled. M. Falguière, who, of all the sculptors in Europe, is the most accomplished realist, has in turn undertaken the task, and no tour de force of his, not even "la Mérode," has been brought to a more triumphant issue. His Balzac, wearing the same monk's frock, sits on a low stone bench nursing his knee in his strong, coarse hands. It is the same body as M. Rodin's, that of a heavily-built, corpulent man. There are the same deep-set eyes and the same shaggy eyebrows. The great, clumsy slippered feet are to match. The impression of overweighted strength is complete. The face is stern, almost cynical, but seen in full face you cannot believe that this moralist—for, the cynicism notwithstanding, it is the face of a moralist—could make his most amiable character attend Lear to the grave and then go back to dine with Goneril. But the profile lets you into the secret. There you see the true Balzac, with an imagination sensual, sensitive, almost feminine, profoundly pessimistic, yet capable of breeding chimeras. All of Balzac cannot be said in clay or marble, or perhaps in any other medium, but all that is sayable has been said by M. Falguière. He has been fortunate in many things, and not least in his pupil, one of whom, M. Larroux, has had the courage to attempt the rehabilitation of "our first father." He shows us Adam fronting the divine anger, and sheltering Eve, who cowers by his side. Instead of being the traditionally mean character, shirking his responsibility in the matter of the apple, if beaten he is not abject, but quite Eden crying defiantly, "Garde ton Paradis, nous emporterons l'amour." It does not quite square with the account in Genesis, but that does not matter, at least in Paris. R. H.

FROM THE MAGAZINES.—II.

Mr. Bernard Holland, in the National Review, discusses what is really the point of chief interest in the revived cult of Omar Khayyam, viz., the very difficult question, What does it mean? We cannot say that he is quite so lucid as could be desired in his reply:—

The present popularity of the poem, which FitzGerald did not live to suffer under, marks, I think, the rapid decline at once of the old religious Protestant conviction, and of the sanguine optimistic temper due to the rapid movement of scientific discovery and mechanical invention. Realization, as ever, has fallen far short of anticipation, and an excessive estimate of the value of life has been followed by a tendency to question its whole wider purpose.

But, on the one hand, scientific invention is, at the moment when Mr. Holland writes, entering on a new chapter of its history full of things more wonderful than all that has gone before; and, on the other, religion has seldom been a more real and powerful force, and certainly never during the last 50 years so unhampered—among the masses at any rate (witness the popularity of "In His Steps")—by any aggressive or even latent scepticism. Mr. Holland thinks that the love of Omar will somehow work for good as a revolt against a too optimistic materialism.

Blackwood's is chiefly concerned with politics, foreign and domestic, but "A Country Cousin" ranges pleasantly over all sides of London life. We much doubt whether his praise of Miss Harraden's "Fowler" and his contempt for the "damp fireworks" of "A Double Thread" (not, as he writes it, "The Double Thread") really represent—quite apart from the merits of these books—the view of the average country cousin. We note in Blackwood's a capital little French poem, "The Ould Lad," by Moira O'Neill.

In the Pall Mall Mr. F. C. Burnand gives some "Punch Notes," in which he says, without further explanation, that "Mr. George Meredith was the first to give me a push." There are some interesting pictures, including the illustrations to Mr. Burnand's early production, "Moheanna," one of which is a remarkable drawing by Sir John Millais.

"Fifty Years of Art"—the Jubilee series of the Art Journal—has reached its fifth part, which contains a portion of the prefatory note to "The Orestes of Aglaia," by Mr. John Ruskin; and a paper (written in 1866) on Graphotype engraving is a reminiscence of the attempts to attain to some "process" of exactly reproducing an artist's work without the intervention of another hand. It preceded, by about a dozen years, the revolution which photo-zincography began in the work of illustration.

The Gentleman's Magazine has an amusing article on the old drinking days at Oxford in the seventeenth century, when Dr. Speed, of St. John's, entertained Admiral Van Tromp and made him confess that "he was more drunk here than anywhere else since he came in England." But for book-lovers the best thing in the magazine is "An Idyll of Provence," which gives the romantic history of Eugénie and Maurice de Guérin, a fascinating subject from real life for the novelist.

The Badminton Magazine has an article on the "Breviary of Dogges," by the learned Dr. Caius, which interests not only by the light it throws on Elizabethan sport, but because of the humours of the translator, one Abraham Fleming, by whom the book was "drawne into English" in 1576. He is more aggressive with his critics than other Tudor translators, and attempts to disarm them, as Mr. Guillemard, who writes the article, says, "like certain lady novelists of the present day."

As for such as shall snare and snatch at the English abridgement, and teare the Translatour, being absent, with the teethe of spitefull envye, I conclude in brevity theyr eloquence is but currishe.

The Butterfly for June keeps its reputation—bright, light, and bizarre, and its drawings alone are worth the price. But the story of "The Emancipation of Dickie Cronin" is a little too painful to be quite "in the picture."

The Surrey Magazine attends to the local archaeology. There is, no doubt, a great future for specialized periodicals of this character, provided that the contributors are diligent in searching out new facts, instead of contenting themselves with recording old ones. A paper on "Surrey Cricket, 1773-1844," by Mr. W. M. Wilcox, is likely to find readers. It reprints the score of a match played between Kent and Surrey, at Bishopbourne Paddock, near Canterbury, when the Duke of Dorset scored 25 and took seven wickets for the home county, while on the side of the visitors the Earl of Tankerville was bowled for a "duck's egg."

In the Calcutta Review, an anonymous contributor finds an Oriental parallel to the "Religio Medici," "not merely as regards subject-matter, but the individuality of the authors":—

Both were physicians by profession, and both left treatises on matters of faith. In either we have the confessions of an inquisitive spirit on the most essential points of religion. Browne's work was "a private exercise directed to himself, what was delivered therein being rather a memorial unto him than an example or rule unto any other." Ten centuries before he wrote, Barzooeyeh, the physician, was sent by Noshirvan, King of Persia (the Kera of the Arabians, the Chosroes of the Latins) to India to secure and translate the "Hitopodesha." The difficult task was completed, and the grateful monarch desired to make the learned man gifts of treasure. But Barzooeyeh refused all riches, seeking rather to perpetuate his memory by prefixing to the Pehelvi translation an account of his own opinions on matters of faith; confessions which may be read in the Arabic version of Abdallah Ibn al Mukaffa with a sense of a striking resemblance especially to the commencing portions of the "Religio Medici."

Another notable article, also anonymous, is on "The Religion of Boethius."

FICTION.

The Dominion of Dreams. By Fiona Macleod. 7½ x 5½ in., 327 pp. London, 1899. Constable. 6s.

The Gael of the western coasts and Highlands has resisted, as few of the inhabitants of the British Isles elsewhere have resisted, the march of civilization. Perhaps it would be truer to say that he has not felt it at all. Through a thousand years of change in the outside world, he remains, in his inner thoughts and sentiments, the child of an earlier age. Such as we find him in the self-revelation of ancient legends and lives of saints, such he remains to-day. His primeval paganism, which withstood all the efforts of hardy monks and untiring missionaries to extinguish it, had its revenge by intertwining itself inextricably with the tenets of the new faith; it is part and parcel of the fisherman's religious code to-day. The early phase of feeling which could discern no fixed line of demarcation between the bird or beast and the human creature, nor yet between the material and the spiritual world; the close association of human experience with the changing moods of nature; the firmly-rooted belief in the pregnancy of dream and vision; these things enter as largely into the life of the Gael to-day as they did into that of his forebears when Columba watched the heron's flight in Iona, or Dallan, the bard, sang a song in praise of the Christian who had saved his order from extinction.

It is on this uncertain borderland of faith and feeling that Fiona Macleod meets the Gael. She sees him through a mist of old tradition, of Christian and Pagan vision, of early romance and song, and seeing him so she catches some habits of his mind and some curious half-lights of his temperament and character that other writers have hardly been aware of, or have failed to interpret correctly. Her new volume, "The Dominion of Dreams," deals exclusively with the folk who hover on the indeterminate strip of space that separates sanity from madness, the day of the mind from its night. The people themselves have grown dim, many of them are drawn so much in shadow that we fail to distinguish their personality. Even Gloom, a figure revived from earlier tales, has lost his evil force of will; he moves through these "Dreams" like a disembodied spirit of harm whose presence we rather discern than see. Miss Macleod is not at her best in this collection. She gives us nothing so quaint as "Muime Chrioad" or Columba's conversation with the fishes, nothing quite so forcible and haunting as Dan-nan-ran. She has a tendency to quit the story and indulge in the reverie. Here and there we recall an earlier tale. "The Woman with the Net," for example, is but a slightly altered form of Annir-Choille, the tragic life-episode of Cathal the Culdee. Repetition of idea and phrase is a snare into which a writer dealing with a limited range of experience is prone to fall; it is one that Miss Macleod needs carefully to guard herself against if she would not weary her readers. Her people are so much alike, they think and speak so much alike, they experience so much the same phases of emotion, that, but for the names, we might well fail to distinguish Alasdair the Proud from Alan Carmichael, or Mary Macleod from Moira Campbell. The same superstitions and the same ideas expressed in almost identical language recur with too obvious frequency. A proverb better bears repeating. Here is one of the sweet Gaelic sayings which she repeats as though she could never say it often enough—"It is God that builds the nest of the blind bird."

Of the extreme beauty and subtlety of Fiona Macleod's writing there is no need now to speak. She has caught the habit of the true Gael who sees an idea in a picture and expresses a thought in a metaphor. Hence the luminous picturesqueness of such phrases as this one, expressive of evil in the soul—"There is death in your heart, Gloom; the blue mould is on the corn that is your heart;" or of this, which tells us that old Marsail had died—"It was dusk when word came to Caisteal-Rhona that Marsail felt the cold wind on the soles of her feet;" or, once more, of this that speaks of the passage of time—"As day by day slid over the rock where all days fall, he laughed no more." Fiona Macleod gives with scrupulous care the Gaelic turn of phrase, sometimes in the speech in which it has found its way to her. She does not even strive to mis-spell his tongue, a thing we have to thank her for in these strange phonetic days.

Correspondence.

ESMOND AND THE "HIGHER CRITICISM." TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—In the last number of Longman's Magazine Mr. Andrew Lang applies the methods of the "higher criticism" to the "History of Henry Esmond." Certain inconsistencies are noticed to show that it cannot have been the work of a single author. I have nothing to say about the "higher criticism" in general, but I should be sorry to give up the authenticity of Esmond. I venture, therefore, to point out the true chronology which reconciles the occasional inconsistencies in the Colonel's narrative. I refer to the pages in the biographical edition of Thackeray's works.

Henry Esmond was born, as he believed, and, as it afterwards appeared, believed correctly, in 1678. He was, therefore, as he says, 16 in 1694 (p. 72). Frank, afterwards Viscount Castlewood, came of age in 1709 (p. 203) and was therefore born in 1688. Beatrix was a year older and was therefore born in 1687. She was thus "nearly 22" in 1709 (p. 274). Their mother, Rachel (born Armstrong), was born about 1670 (p. 17), being therefore eight years older than her second husband, the Colonel, who was himself nine years older than Beatrix and ten years older than Frank. At one passage, indeed, in the first edition the Colonel makes a slip which has given a chance to the higher critic. He speaks of himself as "eight years" older than Frank. In the last edition (p. 87) this is corrected to ten. Everywhere else, I think, the statements are in perfect conformity with the dates given. Mr. Lang says that the Colonel goes to college at the age of sixteen, and yet declares that he is two years older than most of his comrades. Now it is plain from the whole story that Esmond left college in 1700. He had just written a poem upon the death of the Duke of Gloucester, who died in the summer of that year. He says correctly (p. 122) that he is then twenty-two and Beatrix thirteen. He must, therefore, have entered college in the autumn of 1697, when he was nineteen, which is certainly two years beyond the ordinary age of entry. Mr. Lang apparently gets the age sixteen from a careless phrase. Esmond had smallpox in 1694 (p. 72). Two years pass (p. 87), during which Lady Castlewood loses her husband's affection. Then (that is in 1696) Esmond sees Tom Tusher, who is going up to Cambridge (p. 90), and follows him thither next year, when Tusher is a "Junior Soph"—that is, as before, in 1697. He remarks, however, that he is now "past sixteen," which must be taken to mean that he was really two years past that age. Then, says Mr. Lang, he has a "last long vacation" twice over (cf. pp. 102 and 122). The old gentleman—for he wrote his memoirs some forty years later—has certainly made a slip. He speaks in the first passage of his "third long vacation" and his approaching degree. The true state of the case, however, is indicated directly afterwards, where he says that he had been at Cambridge for two years (p. 106). He was therefore here speaking of the long vacation of 1699. Mr. Lang finds other inconsistencies in this part of the story. Esmond says, we are told, that he could speak Latin better than he could write it, and, again, that he could write it better than he could speak it. What he really says is that he could speak it better than Tom Tusher, though he wrote it worse (p. 90), but that he could write it better than he could pronounce it (p. 100). This, as he has explained just before, was because his Jesuit tutor had taught him "the foreign pronunciation" (p. 99). These statements are perfectly consistent. Again, says Mr. Lang, he was a Jacobite at College, fasted on the day of James II.'s abdication, and so forth; and yet afterwards says that he was a republican. I do not know to what the last statement refers; but it is explained sufficiently at p. 102. There he says that in his third year he read Hobbes and Bayle, varied from popery to scepticism, and professed an admiration for Cromwell. He used to argue alternately on behalf of the King and of the Protector, and was no doubt a republican in some of his moods.

Another inconsistency has a more serious appearance. From the papers seized at Castlewood in 1690 (p. 56) it appears that the Esmond, the father of Beatrix and Frank, had refused to join the Jacobite plots, and said that he would never again fight for that cause. Presently we are told that it was after the Fenwick Conspiracy of 1695, that the same person, now Lord Castlewood, "swore his great oath" that he would never serve against William III. (p. 111.) He had, it is added, "probably" taken some part in earlier plots. Now, if the statement and the "great oath" refer to the same occasion, there is clearly a contradiction.

But may it not just as well be that the inconsistency was in Lord Castlewood himself; that he refused in 1690 to join against William, but was persuaded by the wily Jesuit to dabble in later plots, and finally swore his "great oath" on occasion of William's behaviour about the Fenwick conspirators?

I cannot check some minor criticisms, such as a confusion of the names Harry and Frank, because Mr. Lang does not give his references. Such slips are common enough in elderly gentlemen with shaky memories. But the higher critic may be justified in one conclusion. He argues—not, as one might have expected, that the errors show Colonel Esmond to be untrustworthy, or even, however preposterously, a mere novelist instead of a genuine historian, but—that different authors must have had a hand in the book. Some confirmation of this hypothesis may be derived from the manuscript now in the library of Trinity College. It shows three different handwritings. This has been traditionally explained by assuming that the author dictated a large part of it. Dictation, no doubt, increases the probability of some slips. The amanuensis may add blunders of his own; and speaking does not fix the attention so much as writing. The "higher critic," however, may see in this circumstance some excuse for the hypothesis of a composite authorship. Anyhow, it seems to me that though there are certainly errors and inconsistencies in Esmond, the author, whoever he was, had a very distinct scheme of dates in his mind, and the mistakes are such as easily occur in telling a story thoroughly familiar in its main outlines.

Yours truly,

LESLIE STEPHEN.

BOHEMIAN LITERATURE.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—With reference to your review of my "History of Bohemian Literature," I should be most grateful if you would allow me to state that it was originally intended to exclude entirely all living Bohemian writers, as it seems to me premature to criticize their works. It was only to render the book more complete that a few lines referring to these works were added.

I entirely agree with your reviewer's admiration for the latest works of Bohemian literature, though I entirely disagree with his appreciation or, rather, depreciation, of the older ones. It is, for instance, surprising to read that letters of Hus, such as that addressed "To the Whole Bohemian Nation," were "purely private letters." To Hus and many Bohemian writers the letter was merely a vehicle to bring their views before the public at large.

I may finally mention that a Bohemian is astonished when he reads that the great Bohemian statesman and savant was "a pure savant." I have the honour to be,

Yours faithfully,

(COUNT) LÜTZOW.

1, Deanery-street, Park-lane, June 5th, 1896.

[Count Lützow, we think, might have avoided any misunderstandings by distinctly limiting on his title-page the period of Bohemian literature treated of. The title as it now stands is misleading.]

ENGLISH HEXAMETERS.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Will the patience of your readers endure a few words more from me on this theme? The interesting letters which you have published suggest many things, but the fact that stands out most clearly from them is that no English hexameters have yet given complete satisfaction, partly because neither writers nor readers seem to know exactly what they want. As to experiments in quantity I need say nothing. Mr. Stone has doubtless succeeded better than most of his predecessors; but these experiments can never be more than a diversion for scholars, and the best of them cannot give any great pleasure even to scholars. The question remains, What kind of hexameter is possible and desirable as a permanent English literary form? The best answer to this question is certainly Mr. Omond's. It should be a metre written "in obedience to English laws of verse." But, then, what does this mean? Mr. Omond suggests that all our talk about feet, about dactyls and spondees and trochees, is a mistake, and that English verse is not really measured by syllables at all. I am inclined to agree with him; but the classic nomenclature is consecrated, and it is convenient; it is difficult to see how we are to discuss the hexameter in any other terms. We must call our periods feet; we must call our feet dactyls and spondees (or trochees); our feet must be fundamentally accentual, but quantity must not be ignored. No good English verse can be written without an ear for quantity; the want of such an ear is the cause of the detestable jingle of most English anapaestic verse; the ignoring of quantity gives us hexameters with such terminations as Longfellow's heard his great watch tick.

The tendency to ignore it allows even a conscientious metrist to pass "taciturn" as a dactyl (he has too much conscience to defend it). It is, perhaps, chiefly in monosyllables that quantity tells, and this brings me to another point. Kingsley strove to exclude trochees (except in the final foot). The result is for the most part admirable; "Andromeda" has some beautiful spondaic effects. But spondees usually are only to be got by accumulating monosyllables, and this is not always pleasing. I think we must be a little less rigorous than Kingsley; let us get spondees wherever we can; but where this cannot be done without a displeasing excess of monosyllables, let us not disdain the trochee. Further, the English hexametrist must be careful of the cæsura. Some of Mr. Rose's examples are unsatisfactory in this respect: for instance:—

Ending a wearisome day's march spent in a desert of hot sand.

Perhaps Mr. Rose means us to break the fourth foot; but the chasm between the third and fourth yawns so wide that the true hexametrical rhythm is quite spoilt. It may not be possible to insist upon the rigid observance of the penthemimeral or hephthemimeral cæsura, but, at least, a verse with an emphatic pause at the end of a foot should be inadmissible.

The conclusion of the whole matter is that the English hexameter should obey the laws of English verse; that its scansion should be based upon accent, but should not ignore quantity; that the cæsura should be observed; that trochees (except in the final foot) should be avoided as much as possible, but should be preferred to spondees which involve an unnatural and unpleasant heaping up of monosyllables. Only one thing more is required—a poet with a beautiful theme, an abundance of inspiration, and an easy mastery of the English language. I blush to find myself included by Mr. Omond among those "who have it in their power to make this metre a reality and a glory of the English tongue." I am, Sir, yours truly.

CHARLES CAMP TARELLI.

41, Loughborough-park, S.W., June 2.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—May I, as one ignorant in the matter, put a question which may have been asked often and answered fully long ago, concerning the relation between classical and English metres? Are we not confounding the case of poetry only meant to be sung, in which length of the syllable has nothing to do with stress of accent, with that meant only to be read, in which we adhere to the habitual manner of enunciation according to which the foot must be determined by accent rather than an (artificial) scansion?

Mr. Omond in Literature for June 3 cries out against "taciturn" as a dactyl. Can we pronounce it in good English except with a strong first syllable and two light ones = — — simply because stress must fall on the first?

In Greece I have been interested by the way in which educated Greeks read Homer, always holding to the accents, and by the popular songs which ignore accent and render quantity by actual duration of the sound, accent being drowned. I was also greatly interested in the Servian epics as they are sung in the market-places and at the festas, in which the time is marked by a guzla, a one-stringed violin utterly incapable of rendering a melody. I happened to be travelling one day with two Montenegrins, one of whom, an educated man, had a book of these epics which he was reading to himself, when his companion asked him to read aloud. After a preliminary effort to read he found it would not go, and began the chant of the market-place singer, although he had no guzla. It was unnatural to his ear to read the poem as he would have read an article in a journal.

It was very impressive to hear an old blind man seated on the ground in the market-place singing the battle stories of his race with a circle of rough fighters standing round, the tears running down their cheeks; and at night in camp in the lull of the fighting, when all the captains and vojvodes were gathered in the circle before the tent of the Prince to hear the bard tell the old stories to their rapt attention, now flaming into fight and then melting into tears, as, hour after hour, the recitation went on—a practical lesson in the significance of epic poetry which our civilization gives no idea of. Yours truly,

W. J. STILLMAN.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—I hope the discussion of this subject in Literature may result in the holding by English hexameters of a higher place in the estimation of English readers. Should it not, no blame can rest with Mr. Lawrence Ford, or with any other of the gentlemen who have made out so excellent a case in behalf of this much abused metre. At the same time I cannot entirely agree with Mr. Ford's contention that the merit of Kingsley's "Andromeda" is less a sparing use of the trochee than an unrestrained use of dactyls. On the contrary, I am inclined to accept the assertion of Matthew Arnold, that the lumbering effect of many English hexameters is caused by their being too dactylic; and I think that a judicious use of the trochee is one of the readiest and most natural methods of avoiding this fault; that is, with those who do not regard our hexameter as the mere English counterpart of classical hexameter, but simply as a metre suggested by, and, in some degree, modelled on it. The free use of spondees gives a stateliness of movement to verse, but the difficulty to be encountered here lies in the fact that good spondees are rare in English, and that they consist, to an almost monotonous extent, of monosyllabic adjectives qualifying monosyllabic nouns. In the first line of the "Andromeda" we certainly have "sea past" as a spondee; but this is immediately followed by "well-tilled," "dark-haired," "broad-browed," "black-beaked," "hard-earned," &c., which indicate a tendency towards sameness in the construction of English spondees, and a reason of some force against their too frequent use. This special combination of words has, almost invariably, a spondaic effect which is excellent if skilfully employed; not in hexameter only, but in other kinds of metre, as in the following passage, where these effects, by the tardiness of movement they impart to the line in which they occur, are beautifully appropriate to the images introduced:—

The long day wanes; the slow moon climbs; the deep Moans round with many voices.

But in the writing of hexameters, where naturally there would be a straining after spondaic effects, this sort of thing might easily be overdone. I am, dear sir, Yours faithfully,

East Putney, June 4.

WILLIAM CAIRNS.

Authors and Publishers.

In connexion with the centenary of the Royal Institution Messrs. Eyre and Spottiswoode have published a souvenir containing particulars of the collection of physical apparatus brought together by the late president, William Spottiswoode, and presented to the Royal Institution by his son, Mr. W. Hugh Spottiswoode. The value of this presentation may be gathered from the admirable illustrations contained in the souvenir of this apparatus, with which William Spottiswoode was able to make his well-known researches as to the Polarization of light, electricity, and so forth. The writer also quotes from The Times, which pointed out at the time of his burial in Westminster Abbey in 1883 that "Mr. Spottiswoode belonged to that class which it is specially the glory of England to possess—namely, scientific men who have other pursuits and duties than the cultivation of science"; in Mr. Spottiswoode's case, of course, the direction of a large business.

Dr. James Burgess has in preparation an enlarged English edition of Grünwedel's "Buddhistische Kunst"—an outline of the history and development of early Buddhist Art, as illustrated in the remains at Sanchi, Bharhut, Amaravati, and in the so-called Græco-Bactrian or Gandhāra sculptures. To adapt the work to the collections of Indian sculptures at the British Museum, Lahore, Calcutta, and elsewhere, considerable additions have been made to the original text, and many fresh illustrations from the most recent discoveries. Mr. Quaritch will be the publisher.

"The Choate Jest-book," compiled by Mr. W. Clemens, has been withdrawn by the English publisher at the urgent request of the American Ambassador. The book, which is a collection of jokes made by, or attributed to, Mr. Joseph Choate, will only be procurable in the United States.

Sir Michael Foster's knighthood (in the Order of the Bath) comes just too late to appear on the title-page of his monograph on Claude Bernard, the French physiologist, which Mr. Fisher Unwin will shortly publish in his series "Masters of Medicine."

Mr. John Lane will shortly issue a reprint of Robert Stephen Hawker's poems, edited by Alfred Wallis, with a memoir and bibliography. It will include the Trelawney ballad, famous as a hoax which had no less distinguished a victim than Lord Macaulay.

Mr. E. Sheridan Purcell, the author of "The Life of Cardinal Manning," was engaged up to his death in producing a "Memoir of Ambrose Phillipps de Lisle," a Catholic gentleman of very great influence in his day. With the exception of three chapters it is completed. These will be written by Mr. Edwin de Lisle, sometime M.P. for Leicestershire. The book—which deals with Corporate Reunion—will be published by Macmillan's in the autumn.

The first volume of Messrs. Longmans' "American Citizen Series" will be an "Outline of Practical Sociology, with special reference to American conditions," by Dr. Carroll Wright, U.S. Commissioner of Labour. This series is edited by Dr. Albert Bushnell Hart, and is intended to deal with various phases of the political, social, and economic life of the United States.

The committee of the Bible Society have entrusted their literary superintendent, the Rev. T. H. Darlow, with the task of preparing a historical catalogue of the Bible House Library, and have appointed Mr. H. F. Moule, B.A., of Clare College, Cambridge, as his assistant. This collection of Bibles is in some respects quite unrivalled.

One more book upon the Soudan, to be entitled "The River War," is announced for next autumn by Messrs. Longmans. The author, Mr. Winston Spencer Churchill, has already followed the sword with his pen in "The Story of the Malakand Field Force," and in his military romance, entitled "Savrola."

The publishers of the Revue Blanche announce the first complete translation of the "Arabian Nights" into French. This translation, by Dr. J. C. Madrus, will comprise sixteen volumes at seven francs each. The last number of the same review contains an article pointing out that the "Arabian Nights" were not composed by a single hand, but are a conglomeration of popular stories, most of which are taken from the Islamite folk-lore. The writer shows that they are not of Arabian origin, but are identical with fables belonging to all the peoples which have undergone the civilizing influence of Egypt. He insists that even "Aisopos" is merely an alteration of the word "Aithiops"—that is to say, some one who comes from the south of Egypt.

Following upon the vast amount of Cromwell literature recently published, Messrs. Longmans announce a book by Mr. C. Sandford Terry, of Aberdeen University, to be called "The Life and Campaigns of Alexander Leslie," the first Earl of Leven, the able ally and afterwards opponent of Cromwell.

Another series of Professor Max Müller's "Auld Lang Syne" is announced by the same firm, and also a more serious book by the same author, "The Six Systems of Indian Philosophy."

"The Hooligan Nights: Being the Life and Opinions of a Young and Unrepentant Criminal Recounted by Himself, as Set Forth by Clarence Rook," is the title of a book which Mr. Grant Richards will publish on June 13th. It has for frontispiece a drawing of "Young Alf," the Hooligan, by Mr. William Nicholson.

A book by Miss Frances Gerard on Ludwig II. of Bavaria—to whose well-timed assistance Wagnerians owe the institution of the Bayreuth Theatre—will be published by Messrs. Hutchinson.

For Messrs. Longmans' "Fur, Feather, and Fin" Series Mr. William Senior has completed a volume on "Pike and Perch."

A new part of Studia Sinaitica is in the press (No. 8), viz.—"Apocrypha Arabica," edited by Margaret D. Gibson, containing (1) "The Book of Adam and Eve," attributed to Saint Clement of Rome, from a Sinai MS.; (2) "The Story of Cyprian and Justa," in Arabic and Greek, from a Sinai MS.; (3) "The Story of Aphigia, wife of Jesus ben Sira," from a Paris Carshuni MS.

"What Shall We Think of Christianity?" is the title of a book by Professor W. N. Clarke, D.D., the author of "Outline of Christian Theology," which Messrs. T. and T. Clark are to publish in a few days.

"Cousin Ivo," which appeared serially in The Times weekly issue, and has since been published by Messrs. A. and C. Black, is being translated into French by Madame Garton Paris. The author, Mrs. Cecily Sidgwick, writes under the pseudonym of "Mrs. Andrew Dean." She is the wife of Mr. Alfred Sidgwick, the author of "Fallacies," "Distinction and the Criticism of Belief," and other works.

Mr. Bernard Capes' new book of stories, called "At a Winter's Fire," will shortly be published by Messrs. Pearson.

On Monday Mr. Fisher Unwin will publish a new book by Mr. W. S. Maugham, entitled "Orientations."

A short novel by Mr. Morley Roberts, entitled "A Sea Comedy," will be published immediately in Mr. John Milne's "Express" Library. Under the title of "The Great Republic" it ran serially some time ago in To-Day.

Mr. Joseph Hatton could hardly have chosen a more picturesque central figure than Sir Walter Raleigh for a novel which Messrs. Hutchinson are about to publish, entitled "The White King of Manoa." The discovery of Manoa—the Golden City—was, it will be remembered, the dream of Raleigh's life.

On the Monday night dinner of the Authors' Club on June the 12th Mr. Clemens (Mark Twain) and Sir Spencer Walpole will be the guests of the evening.

Mr. Cutcliffe Hyne is just leaving home for the island of St. Kilda "to watch the sea fowl breed." Whether this may lead to new developments of Captain Kettle we shall see later.

LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

BIOGRAPHY.

James Russell Lowell and his Friends. By Edward E. Hale. 9x6in., 303 pp. London, 1899. Constable. 18s.

Francesco Crispi, Inaugural, Kille, Revolutionist, and Statesman. By W. J. Stillman. L.H.D. 8x5½in., 287 pp. London, 1899. Grant Richards. 7s. 6d.

Cosimo de' Medici, (Foreign Statesman.) By K. Dorothea Ewart. 7x5in., 240 pp. London, 1899. Macmillan. 2s. 6d.

Robert Raikes, The Man and His Work. Ed. by J. H. Harris. 9x5½in., xxiv.+335 pp. Bristol, 1899. Arrowsmith. 7s. 6d.

A Country Schoolmaster: James Shaw, Ed. by Robert Wallace. 7x5in., xvi.+392 pp. Edinburgh, 1899. Oliver & Boyd. 6s. n.

Queen Elizabeth, By Mandell Creighton, D.D. New Ed. 7x5in., 307 pp. London, 1899. Longmans. 6s.

CLASSICAL.

Texts and Studies, Vol. V., No. IV. Codex Purpureus Petropolitanus (N). Ed. by J. Armitage Robinson, D.D. 9x5½in., 108 pp. Cambridge, 1899. University Press. 5s. n.

DRAMA.

Souvenir of the 100th Performance of "The Only Way." 12x9in. London, 1899. The Nassau Press.

EDUCATIONAL.

Ivanhoe, Sir Walter Scott Continuous Readers. By J. Higham, M.A. 7x4½in., xxiv.+216 pp. London, 1899. Black. 1s. n.

Vergil: Aeneid II, (Cambridge Series for Schools). Ed. by A. Sidgwick. 6x4½in., 111 pp. Cambridge, 1899. University Press. 1s. 6d.

FICTION.

Like them that Dream, By W. B. Birch. 7x5½in., 257 pp. London, 1899. Simpkin Marshall. 3s. 6d.

The Failure of the Wanderer, By Charles E. Denny. 7x5in., 415 pp. London, 1899. Constable. 6s.

Postle Farm, By George Ford. 8x5½in., 380 pp. London, 1899. Blackwood. 6s.

The Lunatic at Large, By J. S. Clouston. 8x5½in., 349 pp. London, 1899. Blackwood. 6s.

Stars and Stripes, By J. M. Baigent. 7x5in., 306 pp. London, 1899. Digby Long. 6s.

Rose Deane; or, Christmas Roses, By Enma Marshall. 7x5in., 352 pp. Bristol, 1899. Arrowsmith. 5s.

Morgan Hallsham; or, a Curious Month, By F. C. Constable. 7x5in., xxvi.+384 pp. London, 1899. Grant Richards. 6s.

The Dolomite Cavern, By William P. Kelly. 7x5½in., 269 pp. London, 1899. Greening. 3s. 6d.

Anna Margdon's Experiment, By Ellen Williams. 7x5in., 192 pp. London, 1899. Greening. 2s. 6d.

Builders of the Waste, By Thorp Forrest. 7x5in., 291 pp. London, 1899. Duckworth. 3s. 6d.

The Arm of the Lord, By Mrs. Comyns Carr. 7x5in., 251 pp. London, 1899. Duckworth. 3s. 6d.

Love, The Playes, By Helen V. Savile. 7x5½in., 358 pp. London, 1899. Sonnenschein. 6s.

Au Fond du Gouffre, By Georges Ohnet. 7x4½in., 142 pp. Paris, 1899. Ollendorf. Fr. 3.50.

HISTORY.

The History of Our Own Times in South Africa, Vol. III, 1899-1898. By the Hon. A. Wilmet, K.S.G., &c. 8x5½in., 361 pp. London, 1899. Juta.

Napoleon's Invasion of Russia, By Hersford B. George. 9x6in., xv.+451 pp. London, 1899. Unwin. 12s. 6d.

Essais de Politique et d'Histoire, By Joseph Reinach. 7x4½in., 364 pp. Paris, 1899. Stock. Fr. 3.50.

Louis XV. et Louis XVI, By Michel. Nouvelle Edition avec gravures. 7x4½in., 414 pp. Paris, 1899. Calmann Lévy. Fr. 3.50.

LITERARY.

Studies in Foreign Literature, By Virginia M. Crawford. 7x5in., 308 pp. London, 1899. Duckworth. 5s.

Heart of Man, By George H. Woodberry. 7x5in., 329 pp. London, 1899. Macmillan. 6s.

Stories from Shakespeare, By M. Surtees Townsend. 8x5½in., 521 pp. London, 1899. Warne. 6s.

A Further Study of the Othello, By Walter Green, Papers of the Shakespeare Society of New York, No. XL. 8x5½in., 337 pp. London, 1899. Kegan Paul. 12s. 6d. n.

Proterita, Outlines of Scenes and Thoughts Perhaps Worthy of Memory in my Past Life. Vol. I. By John Ruskin, LL.D., D.C.L. 7x5½in., xii.+368 pp. London, 1899. G. Allen. 5s. n.

La Philosophie de Tolstol, By Ossip Louvie. 7x4½in., 200 pp. Paris, 1899. Alcan. Fr. 2.50.

L'Abbé Prévost: Sa Vie—Ses Romans, By V. Schroeder. 7x4½in., 335 pp. Paris, 1899. Hachette. Fr. 3.50.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Memories of Eton and Etonians, By Alfred Lubbock. 8x5½in., xvi.+130 pp. London, 1899. Murray. 9s.

Dinners and Dinners, Where and How to Dine in London. By Lieut.-Col. Neunham-Darvis. 7x4½in., xxvi.+335 pp. London, 1899. Grant Richards. 3s. 6d.

Our Daily Fare, and How to Provide It. (New Penny Handbooks.) 7x5in., 94 pp. London, 1899. Ward, Lock.

Early London Theatres, (In the Fields.) By T. F. Ordish, F.S.A. (The Antiquary's Library.) 8x5½in., xvi.+298 pp. London, 1899. Stock. 3s. 6d. n.

Le Corps et l'Ame de l'Enfant, By Dr. Maurice de Fleury. 7x4½in., 341 pp. Paris, 1899. Colin. Fr. 3.50.

MUSIC.

The Natural History of the Musical Bow, Primitive Types. By Henry Balfour. 10x6½in., 87 pp. Oxford, 1899. Clarendon Press. 4s. 6d.

NATURAL HISTORY, The Illustrated Manual of British Birds, Parts 16-20. Completing the Work. By Howard Saunders, F.L.S., &c. 9x5½in., London, 1899. Jackson. 1s. each pt.

PHILOSOPHY, Heresies; or, Agnostic Theism, Ethics, &c. By H. Croft Miller. Vol. I. 7x5in., xiv.+333 pp. London, 1899. Grant Richards. 5s.

Psychology and Life, By Hugo Münsterberg. 8x5½in., xiv.+236 pp. London, 1899. Constable. 6s. n.

Through Nature to God, By John Fiske. 7x4½in., 194 pp. London, 1899. Macmillan. 3s. 6d.

POETRY, Pastorals, and other Poems. By Elmer Sweetman. 8x5½in., 92 pp. London, 1899. Dent. 3s. 6d. n.

Music Fables, and other Verses. By Mary A. Vialls. 8x5½in., 123 pp. London, 1899. Constable. 5s.

POLITICAL, Imperial Rule in India. By Theodore Morison. 7x5in., 147 pp. London, 1899. Constable. 3s. 6d.

Le Militarisme et la Société Moderne, Traduit de l'Italien. By Giulio Ferrero. 7x4½in., 353 pp. Paris, 1899. Stock. Fr. 3.50.

REPRINTS, France and England in North America, Part VII. 2 vols. By Francis Parkman. 8x5½in., 529+562 pp. London, 1899. Macmillan. 17s. n.

The Works of William Shakespeare, Kiversley Ed. Vol. V. Ed. by C. F. Hersford. Litt. D. 7x5in., 542 pp. London, 1899. Macmillan. 5s.

The Fair Maid of Perth, By Sir Walter Scott, Bt. (Border Ed.) 7x5½in., xxv.+709 pp. London, 1899. Nimmo. 3s. 6d.

Plutarch's Lives, Vols. V. & VI. (Temple Ed.) Englished by Sir Thomas North. 6x4in., 353+348 pp. London, 1899. Dent. 1s. 6d. n. each vol.

Scenes from Clerical Life, By George Eliot, Illustrated Ed. 8x5½in., 333 pp. London, 1899. Blackwood.

Adam Bede, By George Eliot. (6d. Ed.) 9x6in., 218 pp. London, 1899. Blackwood.

The Guilty River, By Wilkie Collins. 6x4in., 188 pp. Bristol, 1899. Arrowsmith. 6d.

Misunderstood, By Florence Montgomery, (6d. Series.) 8x5½in., 126 pp. London, 1899. Macmillan.

SOCIOLOGY, The Philosophical Theory of the State. By Bernard Bosanquet. 9x6in., xvii.+312 pp. London, 1899. Macmillan. 10s. n.

Socialisme et Problèmes Sociaux, By Eugene d'Eichthal. Paris, 1899. 7x4½in., 238 pp. Alcan. Fr. 2.50.

SPORT.

The Lawn Tennis Handbook, 1899. 6x4½in., 180 pp. London, 1899. H. Cox. 1s.

The Modern Chess Primer, By Er. E. Cunningham. 6x4½in., 356 pp. London, 1899. Routledge. 2s.

Pleasure and Leisure Boating, By Sydney Crossley. 7x5½in., 256 pp. London, 1899. Innes. 3s. 6d.

THEOLOGY.

The Exile's Book of Consolation, By K. König, M.A., D.D. Translated by the Rev. J. A. Selbie. 7x5½in., 218 pp. Edinburgh, 1899. T. & T. Clark. 2s. 6d.

The Trial of Jesus Christ, A Legal Monograph. By A. Taylor Innes. 8x5½in., 123 pp. Edinburgh, 1899. T. & T. Clark. 2s. 6d.

Ecclesiastes, An Introduction to the Book. By Thomas Tyler, M.A. New Ed. 8x5½in., x.+185 pp. London, 1899. Nutt. 6s. n.

Sacred Songs of the East, Translated from 120 Languages. Ed. by Henry C. Leonard, M.A. 8x5½in., xx.+225 pp. London, 1899. Stock. 6s.

TOPOGRAPHY.

Records of the Borough of Leicester, Being a Series of Extracts from the Archives of the Corporation of Leicester, 1103-1327. Ed. by Mary Bateson. With a Preface by the Lord Bishop of London. 8x6½in., lxviii.+448 pp. London, 1899. Clay. 25s. n.

In Quaint East Anglia, By T. W. Carr. 7x5½in., 113 pp. London, 1899. Greening. 1s.

Sidney Sussex College, (Cambridge College Histories.) By G. M. Edwards, M.A. 7x5½in., 234 pp. London, 1899. Robinson. 5s.

Ward, Lock's Guides to Cromer, Eastbourne, Inverness, Penzance, Teignmouth, and North Wales. 6x4½in. London, 1899. Ward, Lock. 1s. each.

Where Shall We Go? Ed. by A. R. Hope Moncrieff. 6x4½in., 336 pp. London, 1899. Black. 3s. 6d.

Guide to Harrogate, Ed. by A. R. Hope Moncrieff. 6x4½in., 88 pp. London, 1899. Black. 1s.

TRAVEL.

China and the Chinese, By Edmund Planchet. Translated by Mrs. Arthur Bell. 7x5in., xiv.+257 pp. London, 1899. Hurst & Blackett. 2s. 6d.

An Idler in Old France, By Tighe Hopkins. 7x5in., xii.+330 pp. London, 1899. Hurst & Blackett. 6s.

In the Forbidden Land, New Ed. By A. H. Savage Landor. 9x6½in., xxvii.+508 pp. London, 1899. Heinemann. 7s. 6d. n.

America Abroad, A Handbook for the American Traveller. 9th Year. Ed. by J. W. Cundell. 7x5in., 99 pp. London, 1899. Greening. 6d.

Hours of Exercise in the Alps, By John Tyndall, LL.D. F.R.S. New Ed. 8x5½in., 481 pp. London, 1899. Longmans. 6s. 6d. n.

Literature

Edited by H. D. Traill.

Published by The Times.

No. 87. SATURDAY, JUNE 17, 1890.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
Leading Article —The Over-Production of Books.....	617
"Among my Books," by Prof. Lane-Poole.....	632
Poem —"The Songs of Damon and Alpheisibæus," by W. J. Lancaster.....	631
Reviews —
Authority and Archæology, Sacred and Profane	619
James Russell Lowell and His Friends	620
James Frederick Ferrier	621
Wagner—
A Study of Wagner—Richard Wagner's Prose Works	622
The Oxford Dictionary	623
The Story of Nuremberg	623
Translations from Poushkin	624
Braid on Hypnotism	624
The Contendings of the Apostles	625
Philosophy—
The Human Machine—From Comte to Benjamin Kidd—Through Nature to God—Is Nature Cruel?.....	625, 626
Classical—
Philemon Holland's Suetonius—Longinus on the Sublime—Roman Life under the Cæsars—Dialectorum Italicarum Exempla Selecta—Grammar of New Testament Greek....	627, 628
Other New Books —
An Idler in Old France—Three Pleasant Springs in Portugal—The History of South America—Reprints—Guide Books—Spain	629, 630
Fiction —
Lesser Destinies—More Methodist Idylls—The Farm in the Hills—On God's Lines—Didums—Virtue's Tragedy—Meg—A Gentleman from the Ranks—North Shore Mystery—The Mystery of the Medea	640, 641
American Letter —By Mr. W. D. Howells	637
The Publishers' Congress	638
"The Russian Byron"	639
Madame Bernhardt's Hamlet	640
Obituary —Prof. Blaikie—Mr. Augustin Daly—Mr. A. B. Kelly.....	641
Correspondence —English Hexameters—The Pembroke Theory in Shakespeare's Sonnets (Mr. Cuming Walters)—Esmond and the Higher Criticism—Undetected Plagiarisms	641, 642
Notes	618, 619, 634, 635, 636
Authors and Publishers	643, 644
List of New Books and Reprints	644

THE OVER-PRODUCTION OF BOOKS.

Though there is plenty to criticize, and here and there something to contest, in Mr. John Murray's Presidential Address to the Publishers' International Congress, he is to be cordially congratulated on its general tone and tenor. One of its reporters has summarized it as having been to a large extent occupied with "the moral aspect of the publisher's calling"—that is to say, with the publisher considered "not merely as a man of business, but as a worker in literature for its own sake, as a propagator of intellectual light, a public servant in the noblest of causes." This is a substantially accurate description of the spirit of Mr. Murray's discourse—a spirit which, of course, is worthy of all commendation. We are inclined, indeed, to regret that the President turned aside even for a moment from the contemplation of the higher functions of the publisher to deliver a side-blow at the "quasi-authors" who periodically attack him—surely no very apt description of the best-known and most persistent of his assailants. On an occasion like that of the recent Congress, it would have been well to avoid all contentious questions, and, with that object in view, to have confined the attention of the audience to what the commentator above quoted calls the "moral aspect of the publisher's calling," as distinct from its business side, where, unhappily, the only moral issues which arise are those connected with certain highly acrimonious controversies on points of commercial ethics.

VOL. IV. No. 24.

A publisher, however, who confines himself to a survey of his spiritual ministry, so to speak, and who wishes to render an account to himself and others of the manner in which in the pursuit of his calling he has assisted in the enlightenment and elevation of mankind, is pretty sure at the present juncture of affairs to drift into a train of somewhat despondent reflections. "Over-production" and the consequent vulgarization of literature becomes almost inevitably the burden of his song. It certainly became that of Mr. Murray's Presidential Address at the opening meeting of the Congress, as it became that of Mr. Lecky's and M. Ferdinand Brunetiere's after-dinner speeches the same evening. The only difference between them is that whereas the two latter lament the over-production specifically of books, the former seems disposed to attribute the mischief originally to the baneful influence of the modern newspaper. "The gradual encroachment of journalism on the domain of books is," he thinks, "a danger which cannot be disregarded." He dwells mournfully on the fact, which many another has lamented before him, that, after having by "a colossal expenditure of money" taught the multitude to read, and supplied them with an enormously increased amount of printed matter on which to exercise their newly acquired powers, we have not yet taught a very large proportion of them "how to read or what to read." The sentences that follow are so inevitable at this point that many a man could cover the report with his hand and recite them in substance out of his own head. The new readers "revel in pages of snippets and scraps—always trivial, often worthless, not infrequently pernicious." They demand their reading served up to them day by day and week by week "like hot cakes"—a demand which, met at first by the lower class of journalism, has since extended to the sphere of the magazine, and has now alas! infected the book world, thereby producing throughout "an ephemeral character which is much to be deplored." Worst of all, the mischief does not stop even here: for the excessive demand has not only lowered the quality of the product, but has blunted the artistic conscience of the producer. "The moment a young author has made a mark, he is beset by tempting appeals from a dozen quarters at once to throw off articles, short stories—anything which bears his name, to the detriment of more solid and worthy work."

We shall certainly not be suspected of any lack of sympathy with these complaints, or any doubt as to the strength of their foundation. It is but a few weeks since in an article on "The Reading Public" we analyzed the nature of the immense modern demand for books, with results not very unlike those at which Mr. Murray has arrived, though we noted one or two consolatory considerations to which he does not refer; and it is not many more weeks since we said our say in language of which he can hardly have failed to approve on "The Decadence of the Magazines." Our review columns moreover have, we are justified in declaring, borne witness—not only by speech, but by silence—to our recognition of the lamentable increase in the number of published books possessing no right whatever to the ink, paper, and labour which have been wasted on them. But when we find a large and influential body of publishers invited to associate themselves with our regret for this state of things, we must confess to a certain feeling of embarrassment. For if the excessive demand for cheap and inferior reading has led to a deterioration in the quality of the product, and if the increasing output of the depreciated article is to be regarded as a matter of reproach to the producer, we hardly see how the distributor, who indeed is sometimes also the purveyor, is to escape blame. If the production of a worthless book is to be reckoned an offence against literature on the part of its writer we cannot rid ourselves of the conviction that its publisher must be considered as an accessory both before and after the fact. It has, of course, to be admitted that some members of the "trade" are more deeply implicated than others; and it is only just to allow that the house of which the President is the head has had as little to do with the dissemination of the depreciated product as any that could be named. But even Mr. Murray has to recognize the fact that the publishing trade could, no more than another, maintain its existence by any means save that of supplying the public with what the public want, even at the cost of seeing the commodity supplied by them undergoing a progressive decline in quality. "If public opinion, public taste, in short, popularity, could ever," he observed, "be analyzed by a scientific process, your work and mine would become at once an easy task, and a vast mass of what is worthless would never see the light." What is this but to admit that the decision of the publisher as to the acceptance or refusal of an offered book cannot be based—or cannot be wholly based—on his view of its intrinsic worth, but must ultimately be determined by his estimate of its probable popularity—an estimate which, in the absence of any means of subjecting public taste to a "scientific process of analysis," will often be incorrect.

If, then, the President of the Congress has to admit the potency of "business considerations" in determining the acceptance or refusal of a work submitted to him, how much more decisively must they weigh with his hearers, the large majority of whom have nothing like such a "literary tradition" to live up to as he has himself.

To suppose that it would be possible for them to do anything to arrest, or even to withstand, a depravation of popular taste, however sincerely they might agree with their President in deploring it, is a Utopian imagination. Publishers, of course, have often ere this declined books which it would have been commercially advantageous to them to accept. They have refused such books on religious or moral, sometimes possibly on political, grounds; but to expect them to do so habitually and in large numbers, on purely critical grounds, would be chimerical. Nor, indeed, would it have much effect on the situation if they did, since the publishing business is, of course, subject to the same economical laws as all other productive industries, and if we could conceive the whole body of existing publishers combining to boycott all would-be authors whose writing did not attain a certain literary level, the immediate result would be to bring in an influx of new competitors with less severe standards into the publishing trade. Publishers, therefore, though we may do them the justice to believe that, other things being equal, they would rather publish good stuff than bad, are the very last class of persons who could assist in improving the general quality of published work. Indeed, they are not only as helpless as the rest of us in this respect, but the mere conditions of their industry must condemn the vast majority of them for a time, at any rate, to aggravate as traders the very evil which, as critics, they may deplore. They are left, like the rest of us, to console themselves with the hope that the enormous multiplication of readers, though for the present it proportionately increases the production of inferior books, may in process of time add proportionately also to the number of persons who are capable of appreciating and encouraging the better class of literary work.

Canadian Copyright was one of the subjects discussed at the International Congress of Publishers. The proposal there supported was the same as that now favoured by the Canadian Society of Authors—viz., that, when a Canadian publisher has acquired a licence to publish a book, the importation into the colony of copies printed elsewhere shall be forbidden. This, as we have already pointed out, is a regulation of which no one in England can reasonably complain. The real sufferer from it would be the Canadian book-buyer, who would often find himself obliged to put up with a cheap reprint of a work of which he would prefer to possess a library edition. The Canadian book-buyer, however, has a vote, and may, no doubt, be trusted to use it in self-defence if necessary.

Another thorny topic touched upon by the publishers was the wrong-doing of those reviewers who substitute elegant extracts for criticism. The general opinion seemed to be that such reviews have not, as a rule, the effect so often attributed to them by authors, of interfering with the sale of a book. If they satisfy the curiosity of some readers, they stimulate that of others. At any rate the publishers, we think rightly, deprecate legislation on the subject on the ground that hard cases would make bad law. A Parliamentary draftsman could hardly define, to the satisfaction of every one, the limits within which quotation should be legitimate; whereas the individual publisher has various means of persuading the individual editor to respect his wishes.

A request that not more than a certain number of words shall be quoted in a review often, as a matter of fact, has the desired effect, and in cases in which it does not an action would generally lie.

On Monday night the Authors' Club honoured American humour, and we may add American character, at its best, in the person of Mark Twain; and on Tuesday the University of Cambridge showed its respect for American scholarship by conferring the honorary degree of Doctor in Letters on Mr. Horace Howard Furness. This is a useful reminder, and acknowledgment of, the fact that America has done pretty nearly as much Shakespearian work as England. "Variorum" Shakespeares were published here in 1803, 1813, and 1821. Then, after an interval of fifty years, appeared Mr. Furness' first volume, "Romeo and Juliet," the beginning of a modern "Variorum" entailing immense research, in which eleven plays have now appeared. But, as Dr. Sandys, the Public Orator, reminds us, Mr. Furness is not only "poetæ nostri summi interpres indefessus," but "e fratribus nostris transmarinis rerum divinarum interpretis humanissimi, Afrorum libertatis per vitam longam vindicis acerrimi, filius"—which, being interpreted, means that his father, who only died three years ago, was a man of high intellectual attainments, a well-known Unitarian minister in Philadelphia, and a keen champion of freedom for the slave.

Reviews.

Authority and Archæology. Sacred and Profane. Essays on the Relation of Monuments to Biblical and Classical Literature. Edited by David G. Hogarth. 9½ x 6 in., xv. + 440 pp. London, 1899. Murray. 16/-

This extremely interesting volume is in some sense a protest against a recent tendency to exalt unduly the value of archæological as compared with literary evidence. This tendency is the natural result of the extraordinary developments of monumental discovery within recent years in Egypt, Babylonia, and Greece, which have led archæologists on the one hand to depreciate all evidence that is not monumental, and on the other to strain archæological evidence in order to "confirm" the statements of literary authority. In particular, the first part of the book, Dr. Driver's admirable examination of the monumental evidence bearing upon the Biblical narrative of the Pentateuch, may be regarded as a direct reply to Professor Sayce's various works in which the testimony of archæology is employed to controvert the so-called "higher criticism" founded upon literary tests. The object of all the writers is to examine soberly the results of monumental discovery, and to compare them with the "authority" of literature, whether sacred or classical. It was a task which needed doing, since there is a vast amount of misconception on the subject; and it would be difficult to collect a more competent group of scholars to perform the work. Canon Driver deals with the relations of Hebrew authority and the monuments. Mr. F. Ll. Griffith takes the subject of Herodotus and the other classical authorities on Egypt and Assyria. The editor, Mr. Hogarth, working on the lines of Mr. Arthur Evans, describes the discoveries of the remains of prehistoric Greece and their relation to the Homeric Epics. Professor Ernest Gardner follows with Historic Greece; and Mr. Haverfield treats briefly of the Roman World and its monuments. Christian Authority is the subject of the last three chapters, by the Rev. A. C. Headlam.

The editor strikes the keynote of the whole series of essays in his preface, when he points out that, while archæology, in the limited sense, defined as "the science of the treatment of the material remains of the human past," stops short of any possibility of truly reconstituting the picture of that past, literary documents alone are able to fulfil that end. In spite of the amazing wealth of material objects discovered in Egypt, for instance, the real life of the ancient Egyptian is still obscure. Putting the case perhaps too strongly, Mr. Hogarth (whose classical prepossessions have never allowed him thoroughly to appreciate Egypt) says:

Unaided by any record of contemporary human intelligence which may inform him, not so much of what was, but of what seemed [to contemporaries], the student of antiquity occupies a position not less external to the object of his studies than an astronomer observing a star.

On the other hand, in Greece,

With a wealth of literary documents at command, he can take almost the position of a contemporary in regard to the past. Though he need depend less than the student of any ancient society on material documents, no one can make more or better use of these; for they fall into their places as soon as they are duly examined. Being almost inevitably related in some way to our knowledge, they can seldom or never long remain enigmas, stimulating those rank growths of speculation that cumber the ground of prehistoric archæology. It is hardly too much to say that there are very few material remains of classic Hellas that are not as intelligible now as when they expressed an existing civilization.

It is curious, however, that Mr. Hogarth's own contribution, on prehistoric Greece, while it is on the whole the most interesting and suggestive chapter in the volume, contains more of what some critics would term "rank growths of speculation" than any of the more cautious essays of his collaborators.

In the same vein he concludes:—

The continual reference to literary documents, which will be noted in the essays that follow, is designed to keep in view the great fact that archæology, understood thus as the science of the treatment of the material documents of the human past, is concerned with only one, and (if comparison need be instituted) not the most important class of documents from which the life of past society is to be reconstituted. If all the material documents of antiquity had vanished off the earth, we could still construct a living and just, though imperfect, picture of antiquity. But were it, on the other hand, literature that had perished utterly, while the material remains of all past civilizations survived everywhere in soils as fecund and as preservative as the sands of Egypt, nothing of that picture could be drawn beyond the most nebulous outline. As things stand at this day, material monuments take a place, important or unimportant, in the historian's reconstruction of the past, according as they can be interpreted, well or ill, by comparison of the monuments of letters.

Mr. Hogarth himself deprecates this pitting of one class of evidence against another, but no doubt the archæologists have to a certain extent invited the attack. On the other hand, it may be doubted whether all the essays contained in this volume fully bear out the editor's very sweeping introduction. Especially in regard to Egypt and Assyria, Mr. Griffith is unable to make out a case for literature: at the most he finds in the classical writers a stimulus to interest, an increase in the prestige of the study of the past; and even in Mr. Hogarth's special contribution one cannot fail to observe that the loss to the student of prehistoric Greece would have been tremendous if the archæologist had not discovered the remains of "Ægean" civilization.

It is quite otherwise with Hebrew authority and the monuments. Here we have a great literature and also an extraordinary wealth of archæological documents side by side—documents from Egypt and Assyria as well as those in Canaan itself—above all the wonderful correspondence known as the Tell el-Amarna find, which has thrown so brilliant a light upon ancient Syria and Palestine. There is thus an archæological literature of a sort, beside the "material remains," as well as the supreme literature of the Hebrew Scriptures. Canon Driver's summary of the results of all these discoveries is a masterpiece of sober analysis. He seems to leave nothing untouched, yet even this wealth of material does not tempt him for an instant to depart from his rôle as a calm critic, to whose purpose theories, speculations, and chance coincidences are wholly foreign. Nothing is more significant than his sound distinction between direct and indirect testimony :—

Where the testimony of archæology is direct, it is of the highest possible value, and as a rule determines a question decisively; even where it is indirect, if it is sufficiently circumstantial and precise, it may make a settlement highly probable: it often happens, however, that its testimony is indirect and at the same time not circumstantial, and then, especially if besides it should conflict with more direct evidence supplied from other sources, it possesses little or no cogency.

On some points, as in regard to the Books of Kings, archæology furnishes direct testimony, but as a rule its evidence is singularly indirect on most Biblical questions. Dr. Driver holds strongly, in opposition to Professor Sayce, that "the facts of archæology, so far as they are at present known, harmonize entirely with the positions generally adopted by critics," and believes that the contrary opinion maintained by some archæologists is due to a misapprehension of the views of critics, or to a confusion of indirect with direct testimony. In pointed contradiction of Professor Sayce, he holds that archæology nowhere directly confirms the patriarchal history :—

The truth is [he says] that none of the earlier Biblical narratives have been shown by archæology to be contemporaneous with the events to which they relate. The inherent nature of the events recorded, for instance, in the narrative of Genesis respecting Joseph, and in the account of the Exodus, makes it exceedingly difficult to believe that they do not rest upon a foundation of fact; but no tangible archæological evidence has yet been adduced showing that any of these narratives were the work of a contemporary hand. . . . The results proved by archæology have been greatly exaggerated. The question, be it observed, is not what archæology has established with regard to other ancient nations, but what it has established with regard to Israel and its ancestors. Mr. Tomkins and Professor Sayce, for example, have produced works on "The Age of Abraham," and "Patriarchal Palestine," full of interesting particulars, collected from the monuments, respecting the condition, political, social, and religious, of Babylonia, Palestine, and Egypt, in the centuries before the age of Moses: but neither of these volumes contains the smallest evidence that either Abraham or the other patriarchs ever existed.

What is proved is that there were people in Palestine before Moses' time, but there is not a tittle of monumental evidence to show that these were the patriarchs of the Bible. The monumental evidence shows a state of society consistent with the Biblical narrative, but that is all; the two do not touch. It is the same with regard to the Hebrews in Egypt. There is not a single monument that bears witness to their presence there (Meneptah's inscription refers to Israel outside Egypt), and nothing is attested earlier than Shishak's invasion of Judah at the time of Rehoboam. M. Naville unearthed Pithom, the store-city; but, though he identified the place, he found nothing to connect it with the Israelites. The general result arrived at by Dr. Driver is parallel with Mr. Hogarth's view :—

The fact is [he says], the antagonism which some writers have sought to establish between criticism and archæology is wholly factitious and unreal. Criticism and archæology deal with antiquity from different points of view, and mutually supplement each other. Each in turn supplies what the other lacks; and it is only by an entire misunderstanding of the scope and limits of both that they can be brought into antagonism with one another. The "witness of the monuments" is often strangely misunderstood. The monuments witness to nothing which any reasonable critic has ever doubted.

These are strong words, and we fancy that the followers of Professor Sayce will have something to say in reply. A good deal turns on the definition of a "reasonable critic." But without wholly subscribing to all the vigorous opinions enounced in this very interesting work, we heartily congratulate the writers on the clear and impressive manner in which they have marshalled their arguments, and we are in no doubt whatever that the statement of these arguments is a very necessary correction to an exaggerated view of archæological evidence. Apart from this, too, the book is excellent reading, and contains a summary of important results up to the latest point of discovery such as every student of antiquity will value; and even the ordinary reader will be fascinated by the collection of fully attested facts and well-sifted evidence on most branches of European and Near-Eastern antiquities which is here presented with every guarantee of scholarly accuracy.

James Russell Lowell and His Friends. By Edward Everett Hale. With Portraits, Facsimiles, and other Illustrations. 9 x 6½ in., viii. + 303 pp. London, 1899.

Constable. 16/-

The biography of Mr. Lowell has yet to be written. As the life of a most interesting man, it should, in competent hands, be made an interesting book; but Mr. Everett Hale's volume, despite its undeniable merits, will hardly supply its place. Mr. Hale was invited to become Lowell's biographer, and, for good reasons, declined. "While there were certain periods of our lives," said he, in reply to the invitation, "when we met almost daily, for other periods we were parted, so that for many years I never saw him. I said that the materials for any life of him were in the hands of others who would probably use them at the proper time." In place, however, of the undertaking thus suggested, Mr. Hale consented to write "a review, as it were, of the last sixty years among literary and scientific people in Boston and its neighbourhood," and the result is here before us. Ostensibly a volume of general reminiscences, grouping themselves around Lowell as a centre, and readable enough in that character alone, its biographical value, though, as we have already intimated, not altogether adequate, exceeds nevertheless the modest pretensions of its author. Among its sketches and anecdotes of the many American literary celebrities of the last half century—of Emerson and Longfellow, of Hawthorne, and Ticknor, and Oliver Wendell Holmes—the portrait of Lowell stands out with more definiteness of outline and in greater finish of detail than any of the others. His early enthusiasm for letters, his curious Harvard record, with its combination of intellectual activity and academic unruliness, his abrupt plunge into journalistic and literary life, his steady professorial labours, and his subsequent and brilliant diplomatic career are among the incidents in Lowell's life and the traits in his character which Mr. Hale's book helpfully assists us to realize. What we miss, as was perhaps inevitable in the circumstances detailed in the Preface, is an opportunity of studying the development of Lowell's literary personality, the conditions under which some of his best known work was done, and the gradual broadening of the somewhat narrow and provincial Americanism of his views in later life. We can construct a fairly complete picture of the author of "A Fable for Critics" at the beginning of his career, and of the singer of the great Commemoration Ode in middle life. What we should like to have got is a clearer conception of the author of the admirable "Biglow Papers," and of the changes which converted the writer of the brilliant but uneasy essay "On a Certain Condescension in Foreigners" into the most popular of all of American Ministers—for the Legation was not raised to the rank of an Embassy in Lowell's time—a man jealous indeed for his country's claims, but jealous in a perfectly dignified and self-respecting way.

We are not sure, however, that despite his distinction and ability Mr. Hale is ideally well fitted to render us either of the two services in question. An American writer who makes the "Biglow Papers" a text for so absurdly inept as well as shockingly unfilial a fling at the spiritual mother of American humour as is to be found in the subjoined extract could scarcely have been expected to deal sympathetically with Lowell's gradual conversion from something which many Englishmen might reasonably have considered Anglophobia to something which many Americans, less reasonably but not without plausibility, declared to be Anglomania.

I have often heard said [writes Mr. Hale] that the "Biglow Papers," which followed soon after, introduced Lowell to England, and I suppose it was so. You never can tell what they will like in England or what they will not like. But this is clear, that, having little humor of their own, they are curiously alive for humor in others. And the dialect of the "Biglow Papers," which is no burlesque or exaggeration, but simply perfect New England talk, is in itself curious enough and suggestive enough to have introduced letters on any theme.

Sydney Smith drew an unfavourable distinction between Scotch "wut" and English wit, and perhaps the American variant on our spelling of the word humour indicates a difference in the intellectual product itself. But if "humor" means to Mr. Hale what with the addition of another letter it means to us, it is a curious commentary on this observation of his that at the time when the "Biglow Papers" were written two of the greatest humourists in all English literature, both destined to become immortals, were one of them in the full height of his fame and power, and the other just about to produce his masterpiece. Perhaps, however, the puzzle is to be explained by the closing sentence of the above extract, in which the "dialect" of the "Biglow Papers" appears to be regarded as the prime cause of their popularity in England. Of this species of "humor" we certainly had little or none at the time; but then we can assure Mr. Hale that Hosea's "New England talk," as distinct from his shrewd common-sense, his homely gnomie wisdom, and his mastery of terse and telling epigram, had no more to do with his acceptance in this country, at least among the judicious, than the misspellings of Artemus Ward—not nearly so funny in themselves, by the way, as the heterography of Thackeray's Jeames—had to do with our appreciation of that later and lighter American humourist.

The chapter on "Lowell as Minister to England" is more pleasantly written, and is disfigured by no such gratuitous flouts of the country to which he was accredited as that which has been quoted above. The American Minister's period of diplomatic service in England coincided with one of the frequent and prolonged crises of the Irish question, and Mr. Hale does no more than justice to the admirable tact with which Mr. Lowell steered his way through the many difficulties in which his Irish fellow-citizens involved him, and which are neatly summarized in the following extract from one of his despatches to Washington:—

Naturalized Irishmen seem entirely to misconceive the process through which they have passed in assuming American citizenship, looking upon themselves as Irishmen who have acquired a right to American protection, rather than as Americans who have renounced a claim to Irish nationality.

And of the personal charm by which the American Minister ingratiated himself with Englishmen of all classes, we get a very pleasing illustration in the following extremely pretty anecdote:—

In 1882 somebody told me in London the story of an invitation which Lord Granville, the Foreign Minister, had sent him. Lord Granville in a friendly note asked him to dinner, saying, at the same time, that he knew how foolish it was to give such short notice "to the most engaged man in London." Lowell replied that "the most engaged man is glad to dine with the most engaging."

We get, however, no adequate insight into the "psychology" of the accomplished littérateur and diplomatist whose mental history during these years was really a most interesting study. Proud of his British-Scandinavian ancestry—his maternal grandmother was one of the Traills of Westness, in Orkney, quaintly described by Mr. Hale as being "of the same family to which Minna Troil," the daughter of a Shetland Udaller, "belonged," and as mysteriously transmitting, "some of us like to think," poetic second sight to Lowell, along with "the blood and traditions of Norna of the Fitful Head"—he was at the same time nervously apprehensive of being deemed disloyal to his American nationality. One consequence of this was that he was continually doing remorseful penance for some display of undue Anglophilia by assuming an air of more sternly patriotic Americanism than ever. When he came home (says his biographer)—

He would take pleasure in snubbing the Anglomaniacs who are sometimes found in New England who want to show by their pronunciation or the choice of their words that they have crossed the ocean. I think that every one who is still living of the little dinner party where he tortured one of these younger men will remember the fun of his attacks. This was one of the men whom you run against every now and then, who thought he must say "Brummagem" because Englishmen said so a hundred years ago; and on this occasion he was taking pains to pronounce the word "clerk," as if it rhymed with lark—"as she is spoken in England you know." Lowell just pounced upon him as an eagle might pounce on a lark to ask why, if it were our fashion to pronounce the word as "she is spelled" we might not do so, whether, on the whole, this were not the old pronunciation, and so on, and so on.

It was of course a weakness, this too great haste to defy the charge of "provincialism" before it was made, and, indeed, when nobody thought of making it; but it was a very human weakness and no doubt it was related to the excessive sensibility of Lowell's temperament, as one of "the defects of his qualities."

ANOTHER FAMOUS SCOT.

James Frederick Ferrier. By H. S. Haldane. (Famous Scots Series.) 7½ x 5 in., 158 pp. Edinburgh and London, 1899. Oliphant. 1/6

This latest addition to the biographical memoirs of "Famous Scots" has no doubt its claims to inclusion in the series. Indeed, as a monograph of Thomas Reid has preceded it, a place could hardly be denied to the acute metaphysician who devoted his life to an elaborate and successful refutation of the school of which Reid was the founder. But, on the other hand, it seems somewhat strange that memoirs of either the originator or the critic of the "common-sense" philosophy should precede that of the thinker who, besides being the first to subject that theory of cognition to an acute analysis, bore also by far the most distinguished name in the history of Scotch metaphysics. If for Ferrier, and, we should have said, before Ferrier, a place should certainly have been found in any properly compiled roll of famous Scots for Sir William Hamilton. Perhaps, however, as no list of monographs "in preparation" is given, we may yet look for the early appearance of some memoir of the author of the "Philosophy of the Unconditioned." There will certainly be a grievous gap in the series of Scots famous for their intellectual achievements until this omission is made good.

As regards the volume before us we must, with all respect to the writer, who has creditably executed the purely biographical part of her task, express our regret that it was not intrusted to other hands. Miss Haldane, though no doubt a conscientious student not only of the metaphysical system which she sets herself to expound to her readers, but of the general history of philosophy of which it forms a part, is lacking in the expository faculty. Her highly condensed summary of the doctrines of Locke, Berkeley, Hume, and Kant is in every case inadequate, and though she succeeds a little better, as might have been expected, with those of Reid and the Scottish School generally, she altogether fails to exhibit the true relation between the system of Ferrier and that which he sought to substitute for it; which of course is the crucial test of her competence for her undertaking. The biographer of a philosopher who does not succeed in "placing" his philosophy, and in explaining what additions to or rectifications of preceding philosophies he is to be credited with, of course leaves the reader with no clear conception of his life's work. It is a pity, therefore, that these necessary chapters of Miss Haldane's memoirs were not contributed by some more fully equipped exponent of metaphysical ideas: since she herself, if unable to cope with the philosopher, is by no means wanting in ability to portray the man. And Ferrier was distinctly a man who repays portrayal. The charm of his personality and address, the brightness and versatility of his intellectual powers, his genuine kindness of heart, the humorous and sympathetic quality of his conversation attracted all with whom he came into contact and endeared him to the pupils of his class. A descendant in the female line from the same stock as Christopher North, whose daughter, a cousin of his own, he married, and sprung in the male line from a common ancestor with Miss Ferrier—the "Jane Anstey" of Scotland—he inherited literary ability and humour from both sides of the house: and he enjoyed from early youth the advantage of mixing with the intellectual élite, both Scotch and English, of his time. Not many lads of seventeen could boast of having been at the same time in the company of four such men as Scott, Wordsworth, Lockhart, and Canning—to say nothing of his host and future father-in-law, Wilson—as happened to young Ferrier, at Ellersay, in 1825. Throughout his life, indeed, he showed a variety of gifts which lifts him out of the ranks of those whom, without disparagement, we may describe as "mere" metaphysicians: and there is plenty of evidence to show that, had he not chosen to court so jealous and exacting a mistress as philosophy, he might easily have won a distinguished position in the world of letters.

WAGNER.

A Swiss wit who, tradition says, lived on the top of a mountain and passed his time in cracking jokes was once asked his opinion of Wagner. "A supreme genius," he replied, "in music far superior to Goethe, and in poetry to Beethoven." This wicked wit left Wagner's controversial writings untouched by his sarcasm. But, as Mr. Ernest Newman shows in his thoughtful Study of Wagner (Dobell), it is upon his controversial side that the master is most vulnerable. Wagner's theory that the ideal of the true artist can only be realized by the merging of all arts in the "music drama" is treated by Mr. Newman with just contempt.

To say that sculpture must pass over into the person of the actor—thus being "redeemed" from stone into living flesh; that when man learns to portray himself vitally upon the musical stage painting will begin to disappear; that architecture can have no nobler function than that of designing theatres for the "purely human" drama; and that the landscape painter, instead of painting small canvases for the private house, can employ his powers to the finest purpose by painting scenes for the theatre: all this is to exhibit the most ludicrous ignorance of what these arts can do, and of the undying elements in human nature, to which they appeal.

But the most important part of the book is Mr. Newman's able attack upon the favourite thesis of the Wagnerians, that in the "music drama" the poet must dominate over the musician, that—to use Wagner's own words—"the error in the art genre of opera consists herein—that a means of expression (music) has been made the end, while the end of expression (the drama) has been made a means." Mr. Newman admits that in much of the pre-Wagnerian opera the poet was too much the slave of the composer, but he contends that a musical drama in which, "according to Wagner, the drama should be the end, would be as inartistic a monstrosity as the older opera in which the musician was dominant."

Everything [he says] which goes to make a drama is so modified by the introduction of music that the term drama, with its former connotations, is no longer applicable. . . . The use of music has introduced quite a new factor, a new and very important element of æsthetic pleasure of a quite different kind, which cannot be looked upon as subordinate to the "poetical idea."

To all this the Wagnerian would no doubt answer that the success of Wagner's works, now so universally popular, justifies his theory of the domination of the poet over the musician. But, as Mr. Newman points out, the theories expounded in "Opera and Drama" were never fully carried out by the writer in his own works. In them the poet so far from being the habitual master of the composer constantly falls short of the poetic ideal under the pressure of his purely musical ideas. To illustrate his point Mr. Newman refers to one of the most celebrated passages in the "music dramas," the love duet in Tristan und Isolde, in which, as he puts it, the poet is dragged along at the heels of the musician. Similar passages are quoted from the Meistersinger to the same purpose.

The importance of Mr. Newman's point of view with regard to this great "crux" which all writers for the musical stage must face—the proper relation between music and poetry—cannot be over-estimated. The Wagnerian theory of the complete domination of the poet—though, fortunately, not completely carried out by Wagner himself—has had such an influence upon his successors and upon the musical thought of our day that we are glad to welcome a fearless exponent of the opposite theory. Go where he will the music lover will find, at Paris even or upon the shores of the Mediterranean, the magic influence of Wagnerian formulas alluring composers from their own natural paths, turning Frenchmen and Italians into Germans. Composers such as Verdi and Massenet, once possessed of a striking individuality, have, as it were, faltered in their native utterance under the occult dictates of a Teutonic theorist. It is certainly time to face the truth that a great part of the prose writings of Wagner has been taken too seriously, both by critics and composers.

Mr. William Ashton Ellis has reached the seventh volume in his translation of RICHARD WAGNER'S PROSE WORKS (Kegan Paul, 12s. 6d. n.). Owing to the plan adopted by the translator, that of beginning in the first volume with the prose that succeeds the Dresden period, "the works that mark the great climacteric in Richard Wagner's life," it is only now that we come to the earlier essays, including those written in Paris for the Gazette Musicale. The translator—who in his previous volumes has succeeded in rendering the cloudy text of the original into as clear English as possible—had an easier task before him in this last volume. As it were with a sigh of relief, he is here, able to credit Wagner as naturally gifted "with a sparkling literary style . . . however much it may have become obscured as years rolled on." The volume contains the celebrated German censure on French taste which Wagner wrote in connexion with the hopelessly anachronistic performance of Der Freischütz at Paris. Here, in his poetical description of the old forest legend, the author of Siegfried is at his very best as an essayist. The Wibelungen is, on the other hand, an example of Wagner's essays in philosophy. It is written in his earlier lucid style, in the days when he used to revise his works, a course which, as Mr. Ellis says, "he was afterwards too arduously occupied to find time or inclination to adopt."

While it would be difficult to quarrel with Mr. Ashton Ellis' lucid translation, his commentary in the preface on the relation between Wagner, when in Paris, and Meyerbeer, then at the full height of his fame, is a little blinded by his devotion to the German. He is refining a little too much when he says that Meyerbeer introduced Wagner to the proprietor of the Gazette Musicale with the "arrière pensée" that the young musician would feel it his duty to speak in flattering terms of his introducer. Whatever the motive of the introduction, it was at the time a godsend to Wagner. In this very volume we have the touching story entitled "How a poor musician died in Paris," giving, as Mr. Ellis says, "an almost literal account of Wagner's own struggles and experiences in Paris." It is surely absurd to expect a man like Meyerbeer, then in a great position in the musical world, to be so conscientious as to withhold his bounty from a "poor musician," because the latter might be likely to give him well-merited praise in the Gazette Musicale. Again, Mr. Ellis says, "after Wagner had despatched his Rienzi to Dresden, at his petition [the italics are ours] Meyerbeer sent a letter to the Dresden management advocating its acceptance—the surest way of removing a dangerous rival from Paris." This is surely cynical. If this action was likely to be in any way prejudicial to Wagner's interests, it would have been more reasonable to call Wagner a fool for asking Meyerbeer to write the letter than to cavil at the Frenchman for writing it. It is ungenerous to assign this ulterior motive for an action of immediate service to Wagner, for which Wagner had himself petitioned. Moreover, the article on Der Freischütz, to which we have alluded, is good evidence that the French people were altogether out of sympathy with German music. It is hardly conceivable that Meyerbeer can really have regarded Wagner as a serious rival.

THE OXFORD DICTIONARY.

A New English Dictionary on Historical Principles.
 Edited by Dr. James A. H. Murray. Germano—Glasscloth, by Henry Bradley (2/6). Hod—Horizontal (2/6). Oxford, 1899. Clarendon Press.

In these two sections are contained nearly two thousand "main words," with a proportionate number of others. Several of these are words which do duty in scores of idioms and with manifold meanings; such as "get" (21 columns), "give" (20 columns), "hold" (15 columns). These words appear to be growing commoner as time goes on. As in political life the big nations are swallowing up the little ones, so the word "get" in particular is absorbing turns of phrase which used to be expressed in other ways. For instance, people do not seem to have "got on" in the world before 1785. It is a pity, surely, and the language is like to lose most of its colour if the tendency continues. The great mass of words in both these sections is Teutonic; but there are a large number of Indian and Chinese words, and many readers will be surprised to see that several of them go back to the sixteenth century. It is noteworthy how many words there are whose origin cannot be traced; these, for example—"gibe," "giblet," "gig," "girl," "gingerly," "hog." The protean transformations of forms are interesting to trace. Who would expect such diverse words as "engine" and "Geneva" both to become "gin"? Who, again, could dream that "glamour," with its hints of magic and mystery, is nothing but glorified "grammar"? We shall never feel the same about glamour any more. Popular etymology, as usual, plays many a prank. Thus "gingerbread" looks a good homespun word; yet it has nothing to do with "bread," but stands for "gingebrat," or preserved ginger. So, too, the "gilefer" becomes "gileflour," and then "July flower." Some words, such as "gift-rope" (for "guest-rope"), like "viz" and "citizen," seem to have come into being by mistaking of one written letter for another. There are stores of curious information in these pages.

We confess the history of "hog" is new to us. A hog is a lamb, it seems; or, rather, the creature is called "lamb" in its first year, in the second "lambhog" or "teg" (t.), in the third "hoggril"; a boar of the second year is a "hogget," of the third a "hogsteer" or "hoggaster." There is the stamp of immemorial antiquity on these animal names; they point to a time before the general term was invented—that is to say, when there were names for a sheep of one, two, or three years, but no general name for sheep at all. Under H is a whole brood of ugly modern hybrids, beginning with "hulo-" and "homo-." The one thing we envy the German language is its living power of making new compounds. Yet we feel sure the capacity of the English for this is not used to the full. Here is a capital word for a lift from the United States, "hoistaway," quite a modern make; "hold-all," again, is not old, nor is "Home Rule." And if we only go to the fountain-head, and revive what once was living, we have infinite store of strong compounds. "Gift-greedy," for one, is a word that ought not to have dropped out of use. How many ways there used to be to call your enemy a fool! "Hoddy-noddy" and "hoddypeck" give a pleasant variety for idiot. Plant-names and animal-names, too, are quaint in our English speech; "honey-blob" for gooseberry, "hoddidod" for "snail" are good. Next time we see a will-o'-the-wisp we shall try whether he still answers to the name of "gill-burnt-tail"; a flirt would hardly know herself now, we fear, as a "giglot wench," but that she is. Trackers out of folk-lore and old law will find food here under "Hogmanay," "homage," and others. The cynic will note with glee that the "honey-moon" is "applied to those persons which love well at first and decline in affection afterwards; it is honey now, but it will change as the moon." It is remarkable how much of our most vigorous speech is preserved in old translations of the classics. Holland, North, Golding, L'Estrange give authority for one word after another. But Dr. Murray's taste is catholic; he includes the journalist and the poetaster, Jerome K. Jerome and Quida cheek by jowl with Queen Victoria. We think this is really carried too far, when such a word as "girlfully" is included; there is no real authority for it; it was only invented as an attempt at humour by a recent writer.

The character of this dictionary is known now well enough, and needs no praise from us. Its completeness is extraordinary, and so is the ease of finding what you want in it. But there seem to be one or two small omissions. Surely "to get the better" is not obsolete as used absolutely. "Honey," as a term of endearment, is as common in Wales as in Ireland, and we have heard it elsewhere. The quotation for "Gill," p. 163, col. 2, from Holinshed, 1577-87, Vol. III., is copied word for word, with the story in which it occurs, from Foxe, "Acts and Monuments," 1570, ii., p. 2,296, who is therefore the real authority for it. In conclusion, we beg to congratulate Dr. Murray on his speed. In another ten years or so we may look to see this great work complete.

THE PASSING OF ROMANCE.

The Story of Nuremberg. By Cecil Headlam. With Illustrations by Miss H. M. James. (Medieval Towns.) 7×4½ in., xvi.+303 pp. London, 1899. Dent. 3/6 n.

Few German cities are more attractive to the English traveller, or more frequently visited by the pilgrim to Baireuth than ancient Nuremberg, that "quaint old town of toil and traffic, quaint old town of art and song." Certainly none has a more glorious record to look back upon or contains grander monuments of medieval days. Once, alas! Nuremberg was even more than this. Thirty, nay, twenty years ago there was no more picturesque and romantic city than this home of Albrecht Dürer and Hans Sachs, with its girdle of ancient walls and towers, its red-tiled roofs and high-peaked gables, rising from the river side, crowned by the lofty Kaiserburg. But modern civilization has done its worst for this home of poets and painters, and has shorn the fair city of much of its beauty. To-day a hundred smoking chimneys remind us that Nuremberg has become a vast manufacturing centre, while the frequent gaps in the old walls and the mushroom growth of whole streets of new houses bear witness to the large increase of a population that has doubled itself within the last few years. Fortunately there are some things which are still unchanged. The Imperial Burg still dominates the fragments of the old town, and the great churches of St. Sebald and St. Lorenz "command our worship and admiration" as much as they did that of Æneas Sylvius, when, 450 years ago, the future Pope visited the German city and gazed in wonder at its splendours. And it is still pleasant to stroll on a summer evening through the ancient streets, with their projecting balconies and richly-carved oriels, their steep roofs and quaint reliefs, or to muse, as we linger by the Beautiful Fountain and the Bridal Gate of Our Lady's Church, on the memories of the mighty past. All the precious associations which belong to the history of Nuremberg, all the wonders of art and architecture which the medieval city still contains, are gathered up and skilfully woven together in Mr. Headlam's admirable little volume. His "Story of Nuremberg" is a model guide-book, brief, accurate, and adorned with charming wood-cuts of the most picturesque houses and noblest churches. He takes us back to the early days of the imperial city, eight hundred years ago, and describes its rapid growth and increasing wealth and glory until it reached the height of splendour under that most interesting of medieval princes, Kaiser Maximilian. The author has much that is new and valuable to tell us of the ancient fortifications, of the Minnesanger and Meistersanger, and of the different arts and crafts that flourished at Nuremberg in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. Adam Krafft and Veit Stoss, Peter Vischer and Albrecht Dürer, Melchior Pfinzing and Hans Sachs all find a place in his story. His account of St. Sebald's legends and miracles will be appreciated by every one who has studied the details of Vischer's marvellous shrine, that finest expression of Renaissance feeling in the whole range of German art. And we are grateful to him for calling attention to the noble and pathetic statue of the Praying Virgin, which, although sadly defaced by its coating of drab paint, is none the less a work of the rarest beauty. He does not, however, mention the fact that Adam Krafft's fine stations on the way to the old cemetery of St. John have now been removed into the court of the Germanic Museum, and replaced by modern copies. During the last year or two the restorer's hand has dealt rudely with many of our favourite corners. Several grand old houses have been scraped and redecored out of all recognition, and last autumn both the Schöner Brunnen and the lovely fourteenth century oriel window of St. Sebald's parsonage were undergoing a thorough restoration. Under these circumstances we can only advise those of our readers who have not yet visited Nuremberg to lose no time, and to provide themselves before they start on their journey with Mr. Headlam's useful and excellent hand-book.

"THE RUSSIAN BYRON."

Translations from Poushkin. By Charles Edward Turner. 7½ x 5½ in., 328 pp. London and St. Petersburg, 1899. Sampson Low.

Readers of Mr. Turner's translations from Poushkin, published "in memory of the hundredth anniversary of the poet's birthday," will, no doubt, wonder why the poet's birthday should ever have been remembered outside his family at all. They will gather that he was a minor poet, distinguished from his brethren only by his inability to rhyme. Passages like

And in his house are treasures rare,
Satins, furs, and dishes silver
Exposed to view or safely locked ;

and

The soldier's pride is in his sword,
The restive steed is his dear pet ;
But dearer still is his fur cap, will make the centenary seem absurd. The public will be more astonished than delighted by heroines such as Marie, that lady of extraordinary stature, "as Kieff poplar, tall and stately," or Doña Anna, who fears Don Juan's "whirring words."

Poushkin was above all things a master of expression. He first revealed to his countrymen the capacity of their language as a literary vehicle ; his every line is a delicate mosaic, a close and brilliant combination of the units of sound and sense. It is needless to add that he had the large view and bright imagination of the poet behind his power of expression ; for by a fortunate decree of Providence these qualities are seldom divorced — except in a translation. None but a poet can translate a poet, because none but a poet can render the music and the implications of the line ; your prosaist will substitute his own music, and let the implications "go hang." Poushkin could translate English poetry—his "Twa Corbies" is as nervous as the original—but Mr. Turner, with the best will in the world, cannot translate Poushkin's lyrics. The rendering of the tragedy Boris Godunov is the best thing in the book, and serves to give some idea of Poushkin's power ; but, putting the play aside, there are five hundred men in England who could make a book of original verse as good as Mr. Turner's book of translations.

Mr. Turner does not always understand the original. The lines—

"To think that these my children are"
Stern as a judge, he 'gan to question ;
Alas ! the truth I ne'er shall know, in the poem "Drowned," besides having no meaning, are as gross a mistranslation as could well be made. Poushkin made the fisherman say :—"What a plague children are !" (Uzh eti mné rebjata !) "The magistrates will come, and I'll be answerable. I shall never make the matter clear with them."

MESMERISM.

BRAID ON HYPNOTISM, by Arthur Edward Waite (Redway, 10s. 6d.), is a republication of Braid's "Neurypnology," with an introduction, notes, and bibliography by the editor. The Neurypnology originally appeared in 1843, but it was never reprinted, though translations have been made into French and German. Mr. Waite has, therefore, done a good turn to students of mesmerism, as well as to Braid's memory, by placing within their reach a famous book which constitutes a landmark in the history of the subject. He has also taken great pains to make a complete collection of the author's minor writings, of which he gives a list with brief indications of their contents. We are not sure that they are worth so much trouble ; but the principal treatise possesses real interest and is indeed indispensable to a proper grasp of the whole subject.

It is only by studying the earlier literature that we can gauge the claims of modern hypnotism to novelty and practical utility. Braid came about half way in the history of mesmerism. It may have been practised in the East from time immemorial, but in the West it was discovered accidentally by Mesmer about the year 1774. He was a Viennese physician, but failing to get a hearing in Vienna, he moved to Paris, where the thing caught hold and enjoyed a great vogue among the laity, if not among medical practitioners, until the French Revolution dispersed his followers. At that time it was known as animal magnetism, the name given to it by Mesmer in accordance with a theory of his. In the early part of this century it was revived, and then received far more attention from medical men than previously, being practised in some of the Paris hospitals by leading physicians. After some years, however, it again fell into disrepute. Then Braid appeared on the scene and did a great thing. He invented a new name which saved the face of the profession by looking scientific, and to which medical mesmerists have tenaciously clung ever since. Hence "hypnotism," which is identical with mesmerism, except in theory. In point of fact Braid, who was a Manchester surgeon, learnt the trick from a travelling mesmerist, as Heidenhain, the eminent physiologist, did about forty years later. However, Braid did more than change the name. He studied the phenomena systematically from a physiological point of view, and put them on a sort of scientific basis; whereas previous practitioners, from Mesmer onwards, had been chiefly occupied with therapeutic results and purely speculative theories. How far Braid carried it may be seen from the "Neurypnology." This uncouth term fairly indicates his intellectual standard; for the less educated a medical man is, the greater delight he takes in pseudo-Greek words. Braid translated it "rationale of nervous sleep," as if all sleep were not nervous. Mr. Waite writes temperately and with knowledge of Braid's achievements, which it has lately been the fashion to extol, but he appears to underrate the earlier men, and particularly Mesmer. Not only was Mesmer acquainted with the somnambulant (hypnotic) state, but he wrote a treatise to explain it, in which he asked this question:—"How is it that l'homme endormi is able to receive the impression of another's will?" Here is the essence of hypnotism and suggestion too. Neither Braid nor any one else has "discovered" much beyond this: the real advance made since Mesmer has been in working out the phenomena in a more scientific manner, and Braid's distinction is that he led the way.

"THE CONTENTINGS OF THE APOSTLES."

The Contendings of the Apostles: the Ethiopic Texts now first Edited from Manuscripts in the British Museum, with an English Translation. By E. A. Wallis Budge, M.A., Litt.D. Vol. I. The Ethiopic Text. 11½ x 7½ in., xxii. + 602 pp. London, 1899. (Printed in Germany.) Frowde. 21/-

This Ethiopic version of the apocryphal book of the martyrdoms or "conflicts" of the Apostles is best known to English students in the translation published by the late Dr. S. C. Malan in 1871. That translation, however, was based upon a very imperfect manuscript, and it was certainly desirable that a full text and translation, founded upon the better materials now accessible, should be published. With his usual industry and daring Mr. Budge, of the British Museum, has taken up the task, and we have now before us a large and handsome volume purporting to represent "the Ethiopic texts from manuscripts in the British Museum." There are nine manuscripts in the Museum from which this "publication of the complete texts" might be supposed to be derived: but, as a matter of fact, Mr. Budge has only used two of them (Or. 678 and Or. 683), which he distinguishes as A and B, and of these he has apparently collated B only for the first ten folios, for he has only printed the variants so far. "More," he observes, "seemed to be unnecessary."

We confess we do not understand the principle of editing. If we are to have "complete texts" from several manuscripts they must, of course, be collated and their variants noted. It may be true, in very exceptional cases, that such collation "results in little except a collection of unimportant readings, which rarely contribute towards the improvement of the text"; but even in such cases it is the habit of scholars to perform this irksome labour in the hope of discovering some variants which are not "unimportant." In any case, it is necessary to be convinced that the editor is a competent judge of what is "important" and what is not. The present text unfortunately shows such singular errors that we must altogether decline to accept Mr. Budge as an authority on the subject. The first point that must strike any Ethiopic scholar is the frequent recurrence of a misspelling of one of the commonest words in the language. The word for "all," which occurs probably on every page, is wrongly spelt. It was a relief to us to find in the preface that Mr. Budge had observed the blunder, but extremely surprising to see that he attributes it to an error of the "scribe." The copy of an Ethiopic MS. would be very unlikely to make so palpable a slip in one of the commonest words, and to repeat it consistently. The matter fortunately can be tested by the photographic facsimile of fol. 111a of Or. 678, which Mr. Budge has somewhat incautiously prefixed to the text. Here the little word in question is perfectly accurately written, though, as usual, inaccurately printed in the corresponding text. The "scribe" evidently knew better than his editor. This may seem a trifle, but to those who are conversant with the scholarly editing of manuscripts it will be convincing. Indeed, it is difficult to write with moderation of the manner in which the work has been performed. At the very beginning (p. 3)—in the first six lines—we find an ungrammatical and impossible sentence, and this is (avowedly) in the MS. A, which Mr. Budge regards as the best at his disposal. This passage fortunately belongs to the few folios of which the editor has given the variants from B, and here (instead of "unimportant readings") we find the passage correctly given, a superfluous word omitted, and an absurd transposition restored to the proper order. So much for the value of a collation of manuscripts. But the most extraordinary fact follows: Mr. Budge reprints this passage on p. xiv. of the contents, and gives a translation; but though he prints the text of A with all its errors, as on p. 3, the translation he gives of it is obviously (though, perhaps, unconsciously) taken from B. An editor who does not know which text he is translating can hardly be held a qualified judge as to the relative value of the various readings of the manuscripts. We have taken the little word "all" merely as an example of Mr. Budge's inaccuracy: it is hardly necessary to say that it does not stand alone. If we compare the photographic facsimile of the MS. with the text, p. 247, we find two other serious errors in lines 7 and 10; the first, which changes an indicative into an imperative, makes the passage untranslatable; and the second, by turning a subjunctive into an indicative, renders it ungrammatical. On p. 3, again, line 7, appears the impossible form "ya'aqabna"—and this on what constitutes the very title-page of the manuscript!

In this criticism we have confined our attention to some twenty-six lines of the text, where we are able to compare it with the facsimile. Ab uno disce omnes. If some scholar were to compare Mr. Budge's text with the manuscript A, the results would be somewhat surprising. Indeed, even without such collation, we find such astonishing forms of words and untranslatable clauses, outside the limited area we have selected for criticism, that we can only marvel at the boldness of an editor who could presume thus to trifle with scholars. The Marquis of Bute, we are informed in the preface, "has undertaken to defray the expenses connected with the printing and publication of this work." Whilst cordially admiring the zeal for learning, and especially for the study of early Christian documents, which inspired this munificent support, one must regret that it has produced so unsatisfactory a result.

PHILOSOPHY.

The Human Machine. By J. F. Nisbet. 7½ x 5½ in., xi. + 297 pp. London, 1899. Grant Richards. 6/-

The famous or notorious Lamettrie wrote a book called "L'Homme Machine," in which he propounded the crudest form of materialism with an audacity which startled even his contemporaries, who were not squeamish. The late Mr. Nisbet gave a similar title to a work altogether free from Lamettrie's faults of taste, but permeated by a philosophy very much the same as that of the friend of Frederick and Maupertuis. The motto of the volume is taken from Pascal's "Nous sommes automate autant qu'esprit." Mr. Nisbet's argument goes far beyond the saying; if his view be right—and it is a very old one—we are automata and nothing else, not much superior in point of complexity to the machine used at the Bank of England for detecting light sovereigns, to Vaucanson's flute-player, or to the calculating machine. Our supposed free will is a delusion and figment of the imagination. Physically and mentally, morally and intellectually, all is determined for us. Education can do nothing for us. The virtuous man is born, not made; crime comes much as length or shortness of stature; and even as to longevity, there are no means of attaining it except to be born with the requisite constitution. In these days, when philosophic writers are all for eclecticism, and take pains to pare off sharp edges from their opinions, it is a surprise to meet with a writer who uses the confident, decided language of Helvetius or Lamettrie about problems which puzzle the majority of men. This group of essays—for "The Human Machine" is not a connected treatise—does not, however, give any new grounds for this tone of confidence. They state only familiar arguments, and as contributions to philosophy they are worth little. It is scarcely accurate to treat them as an inquiry into the human faculties. The strength of the volume is not on the speculative side. The object of Mr. Nisbet, who was a clever essayist and incisive writer, was to "place mind and morals, as well as all physical faculty, upon a purely materialistic basis," or, as he also expresses it, "as for materialism, it is a theory which seems to me to fit in better with the known facts than any other." But he does not once face the difficulties in the way of such a theory; he does not advert to arguments which have convinced some of the scientific authorities whom he reverently cites that the materialistic theory is a faulty explanation of the world.

We prefer to look at the volume as a series of essays recording the impressions of a singularly acute and observant mind, with few prepossessions, disposed to look at the dark side of life, and not afraid to state his impressions. It is not exactly pleasant reading, but it is bracing; it tells unpleasant truths plainly: it is an excellent antidote to much highly-popular twaddle; and it must deepen regret at the premature death of the writer.

One of the first of the essays incidentally deals with Shakespeare's early retirement from active life and the cause of his death. On a slender basis of fact Mr. Nisbet builds up a theory that Shakespeare, though writing for posterity, neglected to collect and publish his work, and retired from London at the age of 48 because he was in ill-health. "He must have wished to be at home and be nursed by his wife. . . . Shakespeare did not belong to a healthy stock. . . . Shakespeare, I feel justified in inferring, was a martyr to ill-health." In another clear, paradoxical paper, marked by assumptions as bold and reasoning equally loose, it is argued that punishment is absolutely futile as a deterrent of crime; the born criminal must go his appointed way; "we can no longer shut our eyes to the fact that criminality is as innate as the poetic faculty or the financial faculty." In an essay on dreams Mr. Nisbet shows himself very sceptical as to other people's wonderful stories; but he himself records curious facts within the experience of himself and others which are not entirely explained by "some unconscious mental action." The evidence is more than once forced and strained in order to be brought under the explanation, almost as mysterious as the facts to be explained, that, "whenever there is a proved connexion between a dream and its fulfilment, there has to be some unconscious perception of the will of the dreamer beforehand." Mr. Nisbet's own experiences travel outside his theory. He tells how, having to write, as dramatic critic, a notice of Mr. Beerbohm Tree's Hamlet, he dreamed the night before that he had seen the actor and was writing the article. The following night, after seeing the actual performance at the Haymarket, "I was able to write my notice with unusual ease, because I was really in a large measure drawing upon the memory of my dream. . . . Perhaps the most extraordinary circumstance of the case was that at this time I had not seen Mr. Tree's Hamlet. . . . Complicated as the article was, it was elaborated in cloisters of the brain to which I, the ego, had no access. Some of the phraseology was a little too bold and incisive for reproducing in the staid columns of a daily paper, but as much of it as I recollected I used subsequently in another publication. I had something to say, for instance, about 'engine-turned' Hamlets, of which, it is needless to say, Mr. Tree's was not a specimen." What is the value of the explanation offered of this marvellous story? Do we know more about it by using the phrase "sub-conscious intelligence"? What aid do we get by assuming a "materialistic basis of mind"? There is a characteristic essay on bull-fighting, in which the writer argues that that sport is not more cruel than fox-hunting. "I do not say that bull-fighting is right or that grouse-shooting is right. All I venture to affirm is that they stand or fall together. With the smug insularism that affirms our sport to be right and other people's wrong I have no patience." Under such heads as "hanging" and "guillotining" are to be found many acute observations, all tinged with a certain bitterness and contempt of popular opinions: all expressed brightly, but with exaggeration, and without the delicate shading which truth demands. The book is clear but unconvincing; it establishes nothing very definite. But it is an excellent tonic for readers whose palates have been spoiled by too much soft, saccharine matter. They will find commonplaces questioned, a spirit of freedom and courage in the examination of opinions, customs, and institutions, an attitude of defiance towards the dominant opinions of the hour. "The Human Machine" leaves an impression deeper and more durable than that produced by works much more ambitious.

Professor Robert Mackintosh's FROM COMTE TO BENJAMIN KIDD (Macmillan, 8s. 6d. n.) is a critical study of the views of the various thinkers who, whether before or after the introduction of evolution as expounded first by Darwin, then by Spencer, have tried to build a sociology on a biological basis. It explains itself as a discussion on "The Appeal to Biology or Evolution for Human Guidance." Such a book may be designed either to give a history of sociological thought for the instruction of students, or to make a solid contribution to the question which yearly seems to grow both more difficult and more important as to what, for the biologist, morality means, and on what it can be based. Professor Mackintosh seems to have met neither of these requirements. He is well read and he is an acute thinker, but an inquiring student will have some difficulty in gaining from him a clear idea of the progress of thought. His style is apt to be algebraic; he is fond of formulas and brackets, and reminds one of the manner of a teacher at the blackboard. And he is given rather to ingenious talking round a subject than to a clear exposition of it. On the other hand, for those who seek not so much instruction as practical guidance he has very little to offer in the way of enlightenment, for the simple reason that he assumes what, after all, is the one point at issue, "the trustworthiness of the moral consciousness or the reality of the distinction between right and wrong." He is apparently on the side of Christianity, but we have no definitions, no discussion of what "moral progress" means, or of the motive which may induce the individual to promote it. We may apply to the author the remark which he himself makes in criticizing Mr. Benjamin Kidd—"How Christianity or any other religion captures the wills of human beings, of that we have no explanation." The value of the book is that it contains a good many clever reflections on the details of the method of evolution, and on the nature and limitations of it when applied to human society.

Those who are not concerned with the academic discussion of theories will read with far more profit Mr. John Fiske's THROUGH NATURE TO GOD (Macmillan, 3s. 6d.). He has a definite and consistent account of the development of the moral sense—that, namely, which founds it on the family and maternal instinct. Adopting Mr. A. R. Wallace's suggestion that "along with the general development of mammalian intelligence a point must have been reached in the history of one of the primates when variations of intelligence were more profitable to him than variations in body," he points out that the most decisive result which followed from this momentous change was the prolongation of the period of infancy. From the demand then made on maternal affection and on the power of the male to protect the female has sprung an altruistic ethic. The third and last section of the book deals with the Everlasting Reality of Religion. Mr. Fiske writes forcibly and often finely, with a rhetorical power which seldom degenerates into the hazy eloquence of so many American philosophers.

On the question of evil in the universe, which Mr. Mackintosh necessarily deals with—or the place of pain and struggle in any interpretation of Nature which includes moral ideas—much light is thrown by a little pamphlet written by Mr. T. Crowther Hirst, called IS NATURE CRUEL? (J. Clarke, 1s.). That human beings who have been attacked by wild beasts have not felt any acute pain or fear is a well-known fact; but Mr. Hirst has collected much evidence on the point, and adduces this, with other reasons, to prove that Nature, though "red in tooth and claw," has nevertheless so arranged that no great misery or pain falls to the lot of the animal world. Mr. Hirst writes with no philosophical purpose; but the bearing of his remarks on the moral aspect of evolution is clearly of great importance.

CLASSICAL.

Suetonius: History of Twelve Cæsars. Translated into English by Philemon Holland, Anno 1606. With an Introduction by Charles Whibley. 8½ x 6½ in., xxxviii. + 283 + 311 pp. London, 1899. Nutt.

This is a welcome addition to the well-known series of Tudor Translations, edited by Mr. W. E. Henley. Of all the Elizabethan translators of the ancient classics Philemon Holland was the most voluminous and indefatigable. In 1600 he published an English version of the whole of Livy. This was followed, a year after, by a translation of Pliny's "Natural History." In 1603 he supplemented North's version of Plutarch's "Lives" by a version of the "Morals." To this succeeded in less than three years the present version of Suetonius. Then came his versions of Ammianus Marcellinus, of Camden's "Britannia," and of Xenophon's "Cyropædia." Well might Fuller call him "the translator-general in his age." One of these gigantic translations, the Plutarch's Morals according to some, the Livy according to others, was written with the same quill which, having been honourably "embellished with silver," was long preserved as a curiosity. This venerable translator's life is soon told. Born at Chelmsford in 1552, he was educated at the grammar school of that town and at Trinity College, Cambridge. He afterwards studied medicine, and, graduating M.D. in 1595, settled at Coventry and began to practise. "Upon him smiled as they still smile"—we are borrowing Mr. Whibley's eloquent language—"the lofty steeples of Trinity and St. Michael's." But the smiles of these steeples were a sorry substitute for the smiles of fortune which were withheld from the young doctor. Then he took to school-mastering. "The building in which he worked and taught"—we again quote Mr. Whibley—"now echoes to the raucous sound of popular psalmody," by which we gather that it is changed either into a church or a church school. Many years were passed by poor Philemon in this obscure drudgery before his claims to respect and honour were publicly recognized. But recognition came at last. In 1612 he received the freedom of the city, and at seventy years of age was promoted to the headmastership of the Coventry Grammar School. But advancing age incapacitated him for his duties, and then the good people of Coventry, and subsequently the University of Oxford, came to his rescue with a small pension. At last, in 1637, this eminent translator was, in Fuller's phrase, "translated to a better life."

Few more interesting works have come down to us from antiquity than the Memoirs which Philemon Holland was the first to present in an English dress. Suetonius is the prince of gossips. He belongs to that class whom the present Pope has so happily designated "the bees of history." Plutarch has observed that it is through trifles that great men are best known. "Very often," he observes, "an action of small note, a short saying or a jest shall distinguish a person's real character more than the greatest sieges or the most important battles." And it is in these trifles that Suetonius revels, and these trifles which he has so accurately preserved. Without him we should never have known what some of the most remarkable human beings who have figured on the stage of history were really like. But for him Augustus Cæsar would have been little more than a colossal statue. It is not easy to realize the Julius Cæsar of Plutarch, it is impossible to realize the Tiberius of Tacitus. But no man, however sluggish his imagination, could lay down the Memoirs of Suetonius without feeling that if he did not know these famous men he had been brought very near to them, and had, at least, seen them in undress.

It was in the spirit of no hack-writer that Holland essayed the task of translation. It was to serve his country according to the measure of his ability. "All men," he says in the preface to his Pliny, "cannot aut facere scribenda, aut scribere legenda," and he must, therefore, content himself, so to speak, with the third best. And he did his work well. All the Elizabethan translations of the ancient prose classics have a common character. Those from the Greek are seldom or never from the original. Nicoll's Thucydides, North's Plutarch, and J. D.'s Aristotle's Politics are from the French; Lodge's Josephus, Smyth's Herodian, Hooker's Diodorus Siculus, and Underdowne's Heliodorus from the Latin, and "W. B.'s" Appian "out of diverse languages." These have no pretence to fidelity. But the versions from the Latin are of a much higher order regarded, that is to say, as translations. The work before us is typical of them. Holland makes no attempt to recall the style of Suetonius. The curt, terse, vigorous phraseology of the original disappears in the rounded and diffuse eloquence, the senatorial decor of such prose as Hooker's or Raleigh's; periphrasis is largely employed; archaisms are affected, and clauses with nothing to correspond to them in the original are occasionally inserted for the sake of clearness. But for all this the version is, on the whole, faithful; the sense is rarely missed, and the renderings are sometimes very felicitous. Holland succeeds best, as might be expected, in the comparatively few passages in which Suetonius rises to impressive description, such as in the accounts of the death of Julius Cæsar and the death of Nero. In turning light anecdotes, faciæ, ludicrous incidents, and the grotesque personal traits in which Suetonius delights, Holland's grave, staid, and massive style is so ridiculously incongruous that he affords amusement quite other than he intended. Mr. Whibley's introduction would have been much better had he indulged a little less in fine writing and in ambitious but questionable criticisms. He speaks, for instance, of "the cold phrase of Plutarch," and describes Tacitus as occupying "the cold and splendid altitudes of thought" with "a god-like understanding." Plutarch, as a matter of fact, is a florid Boswell, and Tacitus the very incarnation of narrow intensity. Nor are "translations" which "are brilliant with purple patches" any indication that their author "with leisure and opportunity might have been a Montaigne."

Longinus on the Sublime. The Greek Text edited after the Paris Manuscript. With Introduction, &c., by W. Rhys Roberts, M.A. 9 x 6 in., 288 pp. Cambridge, 1899. University Press. 9/-

Two generations have passed since the last English edition of Longinus appeared. Considering the merits of the book, and the almost idolatrous reverence shown to it during the seventeenth century, it is strange, indeed, that it should have fallen into the shade; and English scholars owe Mr. Roberts a sincere gratitude for editing it again. A good deal of work has been spent on it by continental scholars in the last few years, and Mr. Roberts has made use of this; but he has advanced a step further. Text, notes, and translation are his own; and in critical questions he shows a sober judgment which some foreign scholars would do well to imitate. Mr. Roberts has based his edition on Cod. Par. 2036, which he is inclined to regard as the archetype of the ten other existing MSS.; and he keeps closer to his manuscript than previous editors. In this we have no manner of doubt he is right. Recent discoveries have proved that the texts of classical authors are much more correct than was formerly believed. As far as it goes, the new evidence makes for conservatism: and, apart from a certain kind of errors, easily detected and as easily corrected, it is unsafe to alter the text of a good manuscript save as a last resort. In many places Mr. Roberts successfully vindicates the Paris MS. against those who attack it: he catalogues all its errors, and shows that these are natural slips; and that there is no gratuitous attempt to improve the text. All variations from this MS. are recorded in foot-notes, but most of the emendations which load the modern edition of Vahlen are wisely left out. The notes are arranged on a new plan, by subjects not by places. That is to say, all the textual notes are grouped in one appendix; another is an essay on the language of the author; a third deals with literary allusions; and then follow a bibliography and full indices.

Mr. Roberts reluctantly finds himself forced to pronounce the author unknown. Longinus would be a most suitable person to have written the book, but there is no real evidence to prove that he did. On the other hand, Mr. Roberts thinks there are internal hints, which are best explained if we suppose the author to have belonged to the first century rather than the third. We are inclined to agree with him here, though the third century is certainly not impossible. He disposes of the suggestion that Plutarch wrote it by supposing (reasonably enough) that both authors lived about the same time, and were alike influenced by Plato. If this part of Mr. Roberts' work is negative, that is better than being positive without good grounds; and in the linguistic appendix future editors may find the way made plainer for a further step in advance. But, after all, the question of authorship is of small moment; we should like to know who the author was, but, whoever he was, he has conferred a boon on mankind. For, in truth, the book is extraordinarily interesting, and, besides, it preserves for us a number of poetical fragments not known elsewhere, among them an ode of Sappho.

One word as to the translation. It is consistently sound and vigorous, often neat, and always readable. The general reader will be able to enjoy the book without having to trouble about text or notes. Mr. Roberts, however, has not quite learnt the lesson of his own book; for he is too fond of lumbering words, and we may venture to recommend that "brevity which goes straight to the mark" (chap. 42). Why say "at a date anterior to," when you can say "before"? We would suggest a few small alterations. "Gold" and "silver" on p. 117 should certainly be "golden" and "silvern"; we had to read this sentence twice in the English before seeing the point. In the quotation from Homer on p. 115 (line 5), "their" should surely be read for "your." Is not ψυχῆ rather "life" than "heart" (p. 73)? "Longinus" did not think such details too petty for his care, nor (we are sure) does Mr. Roberts.

The author of this essay in literary criticism (for such the book is—not a treatise on the sublime in a narrow sense) is remarkable alike for his delicate feeling and for the aptness of his judgment. He does not analyse his subject with the stern exactness of Aristotle, but he plays upon it with a light touch, in such a way as to illuminate and convince. "Till now," says Gibbon, in an interesting passage quoted by Mr. Roberts, "I was acquainted only with two ways of criticizing a beautiful passage; the one, to show, by an exact anatomy of it, the distinct beauties of it, and whence they spring; the other, an idle exclamation or a general encomium, which leaves nothing behind it. Longinus has shown me there is a third. He tells me his own feelings upon reading it, and tells them with such energy that he communicates them." The writer's praise is discriminating; he boldly declares a fault when he sees it, but in no carping spirit. He understands that great men have the defects of their qualities (a thought which appears here for the first time in literature), and he has a wholesome contempt for the cant of form for form's sake. "It may be," he says, "that low and average natures must needs remain free from falling, and in greater safety, because they run no risk and seek to scale no heights." But could any one in his senses not see that the "Œdipus," faults and all, is worth all the works of Ion together?

The matters discussed are five—Nobility of Conception, Passion, Figures of Speech, Nobility of Expression, and Composition. The first he justly maintains to be the foundation of all great literary works: if they are to "please all and always," as he puts it, the thought must not be local, temporary, or trivial. He traces the effect of passion as shown in the arrangement of thoughts and in their expression, and shows how passion alone can carry off a metaphor or simile and make them seem natural. Here he utters the notable thought, since become a commonplace, that the art must be concealed. His remarks on the choice of words are equally judicious; he points out how easy it is to sink into bombast, and on the other hand how strong may be often the effect of a homely word. Scattered everywhere are criticisms of writers and practical maxims, which are full of insight. Demosthenes and Cicero are happily compared; the one showing a "sublimity which is for the most part rugged," the other "profusion." Euripides is "by nature anything but elevated," but he "forces his own genius in many places to tragic heights," like the lion in Homer that "lashes himself to a frenzy, and spurth him on to the fight." The critic has no mercy for affectations; "all these ugly and parasitical growths," he says, "arise from a single cause, that pursuit of novelty in expression which is the fashionable craze of the day." If our modern novelists and playwrights would take the words of this old Greek to heart what a blessing it would be. At one sweep we should be well rid of the photographic-trivial, the wilful-obscure, and the cult of the loathsome and hideous.

Like Bekker's "Gallus," Professor Emile Thomas' ROMAN LIFE UNDER THE CÆSARS (Unwin, 7s. 6d.) is an attempt to reconstruct, in an entertaining fashion, the social life of a dead civilization. Though Bekker's book was a work of fiction, and Professor Thomas' is a volume of essays, the net result in the two cases is very similar. Yet, curiously enough, the essays more nearly fulfil the ideal of "learning put lightly like powder in jam." Professor Thomas takes us to the games, to the baths, to the forum, to the Sabine farm, and never fails to prove himself an entertaining cicerone. A certain frankness in dealing with the vices of the ancient Romans makes his book more suitable, perhaps, for undergraduates than for schoolboys. On one point we join issue with Professor Thomas; and that is in his account of the Roman attitude towards the beauties of nature. He tells us that "the Alps and the Apennines with their snowy peaks, which are so attractive and imposing to our eyes, made them feel melancholy and uncomfortable." This may seem a fair inference from the fact that only leads up to benignius

Vides ut alta stet nive candidum
Soracte

Deprome quadrimum Sabina
O Thalarche merum diota.

Still, there are exceptions to this attitude towards the mountains that should have been noted. Seneca belongs to Professor Thomas' period, and Seneca recommended the ascent of Ætna. "Si haec mihi præscripseris," he wrote in one of his letters, "tunc tibi audebo mandare ut in honorem meum Aetnam quoque ascendas." Emperor Hadrian, too, ascended Ætna, quite in the modern manner—"ut solis ortum videret arcus specie, ut dicitur, varium." This omission, however, is but a trifling fault to note in a book that in other respects is admirable.

In DIALECTORUM ITALICARUM EXEMPLA SELECTA, by R. S. Conway (Cambridge University Press, 2s. 6d.), thirty or so dialect inscriptions are reprinted from Professor Conway's "Italic Dialects (1898)," annotated, and translated into Latin. The merits of the original work have been recognized by all scholars. This selection will undoubtedly prove useful for beginners, or such as wish to get some knowledge of Umbrian and Oscan for grammatical purposes without becoming specialists. There is an index of important words, and one of matters.

Professor Blass' GRAMMAR OF NEW TESTAMENT GREEK was only published in Germany two years before the appearance of a translation carefully executed by Mr. H. St. J. Thackeray under the supervision of the author himself (Macmillan, 14s.). The book is on a smaller scale than the work of Winer, which it is scarcely likely to supersede; but for ordinary use it will be found most handy and valuable. The author allows himself some freedom in illustrating New Testament Greek, and occasionally cites passages from the so-called Apostolic Fathers, the Clementine Homilies, &c. Mr. Thackeray is to be congratulated on the completion of a very laborious and careful piece of work.

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

We have seldom read a more charming book of its kind than Mr. Tighe Hopkins' AN IDLER IN OLD FRANCE (Hurst and Blackett, 7s. 6d.). The author has rambled in the by-ways of old French history, and in a series of essays, written in a smooth and picturesque style, has drawn a series of graphic pictures of old French life which will be equally interesting to the ignorant and the well-informed. One of the papers, that on "Two 'Civilities,'" has already appeared in Literature; others are reprinted from various magazines; they are magazine articles of a sort that gets rarer and rarer as the spread of education widens the circle of readers whose chief interest is in the noses, the soles of the feet, and the visiting cards of celebrities. All the articles are so good that it is only a mere accident of caprice or taste that can cause the reviewer to call attention to one of them in preference to the others; but the paper that pleased us best was that entitled "An Episode in the History of the Comédie Française." The episode is the imprisonment of the players in the Reign of Terror. It is a dramatic story, and one not, in its details, particularly well known. Mr. Tighe Hopkins tells it with all a novelist's gift of vivid presentation. In a very graphic passage he tells us how the lives of these prisoners were saved:—

"You will bring them before the Tribunal," wrote Collot to Fouquier-Tinville, "on the thirteenth Messidor."

But the thirteenth Messidor passed and the players had not appeared at Tinville's Bar. Had Collot d'Herbois relented? No; but a very singular thing was happening at the Bureau des Pièces Accusatives, the office through which all proofs of Royalist guilt had to pass before being delivered to the public prosecutor. At the daily risk of his life the clerk in charge of these documents was destroying them wholesale. The name of this forgotten hero of the Terror was Charles Labussière, once low comedian of the obscure Théâtre Mareux, who was using his position of trust under the bloody masters of the Revolution to save the lives of hundreds of innocent creatures. Shift the scene a moment and watch at his stealthy task of salvation the one time humble player of the humble Mareux Theatre, the favourite butt of the grisettes and shop-girls in the pit. There was not in all France at this hour a traver man than he.

Other chapters are devoted to "Old Paris at Table," "The French Medieval Inn," "The Surgeons, the Barbers, and the Faculty of Medicine," "A Medieval Pulpit," "The Chase," and "The Bagne." No contemporary writer does this kind of work better than Mr. Tighe Hopkins.

If THREE PLEASANT SPRINGS IN PORTUGAL, by Commander the Hon. H. N. Shore, R.N. (Sampson Low, 12s. 6d.), is rather too big a book considering its chatty character, it has certainly more merits than most travel records of its kind, and few who are interested in Portugal but will manage to finish the volume. It is, perhaps, curious that English people, even those most given to travelling, know so little about this historic portion of the Peninsula, although, if we except Prussia, it is the European country with which England has had the largest and most continuous connexion, both in the world of politics and war. Spain has a hundred travellers for Portugal's one, and yet Portugal in many ways is the pleasanter country to travel in. For the Portuguese are mostly bright and cheerful, and (great recommendation to travelling Englishwomen) are not unkind to animals. They are not sombre or haughty, and they do not stand aloof from strangers, but are always ready to mangle an odd language or two with any one who does not understand the tongue of Camoens. Nowadays Portugal is more ready for travellers with over-sensitive olfactory nerves than she was a quarter of a century ago, and Lisbon has been almost entirely regenerated in this important respect. Commander Shore is very severe, for such a travelled man, on the manners and customs of the Portuguese at table. How long is it since we English became, as a body, patterns for the dining universe? In private houses and hotels of the better class there is really nothing to complain of, and the more aristocratic Portuguese (if indeed, they are not Brazilians, a very different thing) have as good manners as can be found anywhere in Europe. But Commander Shore does well to remind us that Portugal does not consist of Oporto, Lisbon, and Cintra only. He visited not only Northern Portugal but also the southern province of the Algarve, which is practically unknown to the Portuguese themselves, for, curiously enough, seeing what this nation has done in the way of ocean discovery and colonization, the Portuguese at home never travel if they can help it, just as they never hurry and never take exercise—that is, the well-to-do classes never do. For though the lower classes are supposed to be lazy, no people work harder; indeed, they often work hard because they are too lazy to alter ancient habits and make hard work light. The loads a Portuguese will carry on his head would tire an ordinary Irishman to wheel in a barrow, and yet no one wheels anything if it can be carried, with frequent rests, at the lively rate of the most solemn funeral procession.

Some of the glimpses given in this book of the work done or attempted by Pombal in his almost vain attempt to regenerate his priest-ridden and financially rotten country are of especial interest. But when the author quotes Lord Carnarvon's estimate of this great Portuguese with apparent approbation, he does Portugal's one reformer wrong. Neither the priests nor the nobility were attacked unjustly. But when any despotic Minister attempts to reform finance he must expect to be treated as an enemy of mankind by those who are content with abuses which put money in their pocket. The deprivation of privilege might have been borne with, even though Pombal's obvious end was to concentrate all the power in the King's hands and his own, but when he touched the nobles' pockets they were as angry as the priests. Had Pombal not fallen when King Joseph died, the monarchy in Portugal might not have been so near its end as it now is.

In the absence of any such distinctive epithet as Poe's suggested "Appalachian," we are accustomed to mean by "American" an inhabitant of the United States of North America. It is well, however, to remember that the word has a wider sense, in which it is used by the anonymous author of THE HISTORY OF SOUTH AMERICA FROM ITS DISCOVERY TO THE PRESENT TIME (Sonnen-schein, 10s. 6d.), written by "an American" and adequately translated from his Spanish by Miss Adnah D. Jones. It is refreshing to find in such a book a just appreciation, which is not easily to be found across the Atlantic just now, of the share taken by Spain in opening the New World to the approach of civilization. In spite of all the crimes and errors of Spain, "it cannot be denied," as this Spanish-American observes, "that it was our mother-country which transformed or converted the Indians, almost all uncivilized, and many of them cannibals, into civilized men." As M. Chevalier says, it was, after all, Spain which put America "on the high-road of European civilization," although the relative condition of North and South America at present shows that other guidance was needed for progress along that road. The book fills rather a useful place as a summary, on the whole accurate and clear, of the history of the South American States since they started on their independent careers in the beginning of the present century. Thanks to the glowing pages of Prescott, we are all familiar with the work of Columbus and Cortez and Pizarro, but the modern history of Peru and Chili, the Republic of Ecuador and the Argentine Confederation is not by any means at our fingers' ends. We have here a broad, if somewhat wooden, picture of the vicissitudes of the various South American States, which will be useful to such as desire to understand future developments in that continent. We think that the author is somewhat too enthusiastic about his "free and rising America," and intending emigrants had better, perhaps, verify his account in the light of Consular reports. But we give him credit for a warm fund of patriotism, and hope with him that the future of South America may be, as one of her own poets has said, "immense as her mountains and her seas, brilliant as her skies and her resplendent stars."

REPRINTS.

The steady flow of reprints from English classics continues without abatement. Messrs. Dent claim first notice with their "Temple Scott," of which WOODSTOCK, THE BETROTHEN, and THE TALISMAN have reached us; their new Dickens—DOMBEY AND SON, OLIVER TWIST, and BARNABY RUDGE, which have bibliographical introductions by Mr. Walter Jerrold; and more "Temple Classics," which will soon become a library of a "Hundred Best Books." The most recent are EPICURETTS, translated and edited, with notes and introduction, by Miss Elizabeth Carter; NORTH'S PLUTARCH, Vols. 3, 4, 5, and 6; THE ENGLISH OPIUM EATER, edited by Mr. Walter Jerrold; SHELLEY'S POEMS, NARRATIVE, ELEGIAC, AND VISIONARY, edited by Mr. Buxton Forman; and TRISTRAM SHANDY edited by Mr. Walter Jerrold. Is it too radical a suggestion to make, with the utmost diffidence, that some one would try the experiment of printing Sterne like other books? Thus:—

But, indeed, to speak of my father as he was; he was certainly irresistible, both in his orations and disputations. He was a born orator—Θεοδιδάκτος. Persuasion hung upon his lips, and the elements of Logick and Rhetorick were so blended up in him, and withal, he had so shrewd a guess at the weaknesses and passions of his respondent, that nature might have stood up and said, "This man is eloquent." In short, whether he was on the weak or the strong side of the question, 'twas hazardous in either case to attack him. And yet, 'tis strange, he had never read Cicero, &c.

What exactly did Sterne think, what do his faithful editors think, is gained (besides annoyance to the reader) by printing this passage thus:—

But, indeed, to speak of my father as he was;—he was certainly irresistible:—both in his orations and disputations;—he was born an orator:—Θεοδιδάκτος.—Persuasion hung upon his lips, and the elements of Logick and Rhetorick were so blended up in him,—and, withal, he had so shrewd a guess at the weaknesses and passions of his respondent,—that Nature might have stood up and said,—"This man is eloquent."—In short, whether he was on the weak or the strong side of the question, 'twas hazardous in either case to attack him.—And yet, 'tis strange, he had never read Cicero, &c.

All these books are priced at 1s. 6d. n. each. Messrs. Isbister are publishing a very delightful edition in five volumes, slightly larger in size than the "Temple Books," of "Dean Plumptre's Dante." The first two volumes, HELL and PURGATORY (2s. 6d. n. each), have reached us, and, so far as their get-up is concerned, are all that could be desired both for handiness and elegance.

Mr. Nimmo's large type Border "Waverley" now includes WOODSTOCK, THE FAIR MAID OF PERTH, REDGAUNTLET, THE BETROTHEN, THE TALISMAN, and ANNE OF GELENSTEIN (5s. 6d. each), with Mr. Lang's introductions and illustrations by a great variety of artists, which in these volumes, although one or two of the figure subjects are very crude, show a higher average of merit than did those of some earlier volumes.

A third "Lover" in Messrs. Constable's admirably printed edition of that novelist's works is TREASURE TROVE (6s.), a novel, readable like all of Lover's, but not worthy of its subject, the exploits of the Irish Brigade in the service of France.

More recent works of fiction now reprinted are George Eliot's SCENES OF CLERICAL LIFE (Blackwood, 2s. 6d.), which Mr. H. R. Millar illustrates, it need hardly be said, admirably, and a large 2s. edition of Kingsley's WESTWARD HO! (Warne). Messrs. Ward, Lock's edition of Whyte Melville's novels has now reached its ninth volume with ROY'S WIFE (3s. 6d.), illustrated by G. P. Jacob Hood. Messrs. Longmans' "Silver Library," which helps to prevent comparatively recent works of value from being overwhelmed in the ocean of new publications, now contains Mr. Lang's MYTH, RITUAL, AND RELIGION (7s.).

We are glad to see a reprint in octavo of the Bishop of London's excellent QUEEN ELIZABETH (Longmans, 6s.), which was first published with illustrations as one of Messrs. Boussod, Valadon's "De Luxe" Biographies in 1896. The present issue has a portrait of the Queen as frontispiece.

Mr. Elliot Stock's Antiquary's Library now includes a reissue of Mr. Fairman Ordish's learned EARLY LONDON THEATRES (3s. 6d. n.). It deals with the Theatres "in the Fields," and is to be followed, we believe, by a supplementary volume on Theatres "in the Town."

A welcome is due to the new edition—the fourth—of Professor Tyndall's HOURS OF EXERCISE IN THE ALPS (Longmans, 6s. 6d. n.), which has been out of print since 1873. The illustrations—characteristic wood engravings by Mr. Edward Whymper—are far more pleasing to the eye than the photogravures with which it is the modern fashion to illustrate Alpine books. The occasion is a proper one for asking, once more, when we are to have new editions of Mr. King's "Italian Valleys," and Mr. Girdlestone's "High Alps Without Guides."

MONTCALEM AND WOLFE, in two volumes (Macmillan, 17s. n.), is now added to the library addition of the works of Francis Parkman. In evidence of the industry which went to the making of the book we may cite the statement in the author's preface that the papers copied for it in France alone "exceed six thousand folio pages of manuscript." These include all the letters written by Montcalm, when in America, to members of his family in France.

Messrs. Service and Paton's "Little Masterpieces" now contain a selection from Washington Irving's sketches, which remind us how seldom it is either in England or America that we find prose writing to compare with Irving's in its lucid, unaffected charm.

The June number of the Eversley Shakespeare contains the three parts of Henry VI., and Richard III.

The "Athenaeum Press" Series, published by Messrs. Ginn, of Boston and London, carries on its work of introducing English literature to students with SELECTIONS FROM COWPER (4s. 6d.), edited by Professor Murray, of Princeton University, and SELECTIONS FROM SHELLEY (5s.), by Professor Alexander, of Toronto. The notes are terse and sensible.

GUIDE BOOKS.

As usual at this season of the year, the editorial table groans beneath a load of guide-books. The most interesting of those in front of us is the fourteenth, and very much enlarged, edition of WHERE SHALL WE GO? (Black, 2s. 6d.), edited by Mr. A. R. Hope Moncrieff. It is a gazetteer of health and holiday resorts from Aldeburgh to Yarmouth; written in a pleasant style, and full of useful information. Places omitted, which a fifteenth edition might advantageously include, are Oxford, Windsor, Henley, Maidenhead, and other Thames Valley centres. The same publishers send us their guide to HARROGATE (11th edition, 1s.), which tells the tourist what he needs to know about the neighbourhood as well as about the town. From Messrs. Ward, Lock, & Co. come a whole batch of guides to PENZANCE, to TEIGNMOUTH, to INVERNESS, to EASTBOURNE, to CROMER, and to NORTH WALES (1s. each). They are all well written, well mapped, and well illustrated. The North Wales volume carries thoroughness to the point of presenting hints for the pronunciation of Welsh; but the space might perhaps be more usefully occupied by a list of lodging-houses such as one gets, nowadays, from so many of the railway companies. Finally, we have IN QUIANT EAST ANGLIA, by T. West Carmie (Greening, 1s.). It is an æsthetic volume, with a picture cover and turn-down edges, resembling the novels which Mr. Coulson Kernahan writes about children, and aunts, and wise men, and devils. It is as pleasant to read as to look at, though the hard bedrock of fact about hotel tariffs and railway time-tables must be sought elsewhere.

In the "Children's Study" Series Mr. Leonard Williams writes of SPAIN (Unwin, 2s. 6d.). The book is good enough of its kind, though we question whether the schoolroom felt any pressing need for it. A children's edition of "Don Quixote" would give young people more information of the sort that they are likely to retain. As a handy work of reference for their elders, however, the volume may be of utility.

THE SONGS OF DAMON AND ALPHESIBÆUS.

[A PARAPHRASE FROM VIRGIL'S EIGHTH ECLOGUE
(PHARMACEUTRIA), ll. 17-61 and 64-109.]

DAMON.

Lucifer, star of the morn, oh, speed the fair day that ye herald,
Rise, as I mourn for the love of a bride, most faithless of maidens, Chanting a dirge to the Gods—though ever they turn from my pleading.

Dying, and singing the last sad song of a life that is waning.
Blend thy strains, my flute, with sweet Mænalian verses.

Mænalus boasts of a grove that is sweet with its pines and its song-birds.

Mænalus lists to the voices of shepherds who carol their love-songs,

Lists to the lays of the God who drew from the rushes their music.

Blend thy strains, my flute, with sweet Mænalian verses.

Mopsus wedded to Nisa! Ah, then there are hopes for all lovers,
Griffins with mares shall mate, and the sons of following ages View the rough hound pace side by side with the fawn to their drinking.

Trim thy torches, oh Mopsus, to thee they are leading the maiden, Scatter the nuts, happy bridegroom, for thee is the star of the evening.

Blend thy strains, my flute, with sweet Mænalian verses.

Worthy of thee, false girl, is the hero with whom thou art mated,
Worthy of one who despises the pipe and the flocks of a shepherd,
Worthy the fanciful maid who scorns my beard and my eyebrows, Gives not a thought to my woes, nor thinks that the Gods will regard them.

Blend thy strains, my flute, with sweet Mænalian verses.

Well I remember the first dear sight of thee, slender in childhood,

Plucking our dew-fresh apples—for thee and thy mother I found them.

Scarce had my birthday dawned in the year that follows eleven,
Scarce could I snap the frail branches, on tip-toe eagerly standing, Yet how I gazed and was lost, for the madness of passion was o'er me.

Blend thy strains, my flute, with sweet Mænalian verses.

Sudden my knowledge of Cupid, a boy most hardly begotten,
Cradled in crags of Epirus or Thrace or an African desert,
Not of our race is Cupid, from none of our stock descended.

Blend thy strains, my flute, with sweet Mænalian verses.

Fierce and strong, it was he who filled with his passion the mother,

Taught her to stain and defile her hands with the blood of her offspring.

Fierce and cruel wert thou, oh mother, as he who constrained thee.

Who shall adjudge that guiltiness? Surely thy tempter was evil.

Cruel the mother and wanton the passion, both evil together.
Blend thy strains, my flute, with sweet Mænalian verses.

Now let the wild wolf flee from the lamb, let oaks in abundance
Ghitter with golden apples, let daffodils spring from the alder,
Now let the tamarisk drip with a swift-flowing river of amber,
Now let cygnets and owls contest, be Tityrus Orpheus, Orpheus sweet in the woods, or Arion who sports with his dolphins.

Blend thy strains, my flute, with sweet Mænalian verses.

Earth herself may soon be whelmed in a chaos of waters,
Swift from the dizziest height I rush to the bosom of Ocean;
Glades of the forest, farewell! Ah! Nisa, to thee I am singing!
Catch the last wail of my song as I die; ye are ended, my verses.
Cease thy strains, my flute, and cease Mænalian verses.

ALPHESIBÆUS.

Carry the water, now quick with the wreath that must circle the altar,

Burn fresh branches and burden the air with a savour of incense;
Thus may my passion arouse the slumbering passion of Daphnis;
Ah! he is cold, yet sure 'tis only a charm that is wanting,
Magical melody, lure from the city my lingering Daphnis.

Swift at the sound of a charm the pale moon drops from the heavens,

Swiftly at Circe's charm were the friends of Ulysses enchanted, Soon is the cold snake charmed of his skin as he lies in the meadow—

Magical melody, lure from the city my lingering Daphnis.

First round his image I bind three threads of different colours, Winding the three thrice round—odd numbers please the immortals,

Three times pace with the image around the base of the altar;
Bind, Amaryllis, the colours in three fair knots,—'tis a love-charm,

Say as ye bind, "Thine, Goddess of love, is the chain I am weaving,"

Magical melody, lure from the city my lingering Daphnis.

See! though this clay is hardened, this wax is speedily melted,
One and the same is the flame; may such be the passion of Daphnis:

Scatter the cakes; now smear those laurels with pitch and consume them,

Kindle, ye laurels, a flame in the boy for whom I am pining;
Magical melody, lure from the city my lingering Daphnis.

Ay! may a love burn Daphnis as that of a wandering heifer Seeking her long-lost mate; who, mazed in the groves of the woodland,

Sinks by the sedge-covered bank of a murmuring, rippling river;
Wearied and careless of Night who is blending the shadows around her,—

Such be the passion of Daphnis, and then will I scornfully use him;

Magical melody, lure from the city my lingering Daphnis.

Here is a cloak that he left, the troth of a fanciful lover,
Now to the earth I entrust it and bury it under the threshold,
Once it was his, now mine, to secure the sweet coming of Daphnis.
Magical melody, lure from the city my lingering Daphnis.

Poisonous juices and berries are mine, old Mæris the giver,
Culled on Pontian shores, they flourish there in abundance,
Mæris with these hath power to howl as a wolf in the forest.
Oft have I seen the mage lure spirits from under the tombstones,
Scatter the crops of a field to plant them again in another.

Magical melody, lure from the city my lingering Daphnis.

Haste to the stream, Amaryllis, and carry a vessel of ashes, Scatter them light o'er the stream, but turn thy gaze from its waters;

Vain, ah! vain are my charms to speed the return of the boy, who

Gives not a thought to the Gods, nor recks of the spells of a maiden.

Magical melody, lure from the city my lingering Daphnis.

Stay ere we try the last charm; See! Surely the ashes are kindling.

Hylax barks at the gate; a flame shoots up from the altar;
Grant that the omen be good, for a doubt of the truth overcomes me.

'Tis but a vision, yet hark! 'tis he, 'tis he that is coming!
Magical melody cease, ye have lured my lingering Daphnis.

W. J. LANCASTER.

Among my Books.

AN EMPEROR'S MEMOIRS.

No one, we presume, dreams of reading the Memoirs of the Emperor Babar nowadays. It is getting scarce, that fine quarto of 1826, which contains the vigorous translation begun by John Leyden—Scott's Leyden, the contributor to the "Border Minstrelsy"—and finished, with all elaboration of notes and introductions, by a learned scholar and admirable writer, William Erskine. It is worse than scarce, it is Oriental; and no Oriental author—save the importunately belauded Omar, who threatens to become the bore of the end of the century—has the chance of a hearing from a generation that drugs its "intellectuals" with a periodical anodyne as sure as ever the mad moon comes round. Yet Babar's autobiography has had warm admirers. It has been compared from time to time with the Confessions of St. Augustine—and of Rousseau; with the Memoirs of St. Simon and Gibbon; with the History of Clarendon; and, strange as it may appear, it does in its way present points of resemblance to each of these various classics. The great quality which it holds in common with at least some of them is its amazing frankness and simplicity—amazing because unique in Eastern literature. Your Oriental scribe never feels that he has done justice to himself or to his subject until he has wrapped it up in an impenetrable disguise of tropes and metaphors and elaborate verbosity. The more exuberant and periphrastic, the more tortuous and ambiguous he is, the greater is his reputation for style. The "Arab Classic" I noticed some time ago is a case in point: Hariri's merit lies mainly in delicate hair-splitting and refinement of preciousity. An Arab letter-writer, a certain famous Abu-l-Ala, has lately been edited with extraordinary learning by Mr. Margoliouth, who worthily occupies Archbishop Laud's Chair of Arabic in our University of Oxford; and despite the astonishing literary skill and fertility of complicated and obscure allusion displayed in these "Letters," there is no more wearisome stuff even in the wilderness of Oriental Euphuism.

The Emperor Babar has nothing of this finicking delight in mere verbiage. When he wanted a despatch written in the proper bombastic style beloved of Eastern critics, he got his chancellor, Sheykh Zeyn, to indite it for him; and, to do him justice, there was nothing in the way of turgid rhetoric that the Sheykh could not compass. The Emperor himself had a purer taste. Writing to his eldest son, afterwards the Great Mogul Humayun, who seems to have combined the bad habit of fine-writing with imperfect spelling—as others have done since his day—Babar entreats him to "write without affectation, be clear, use plain words, which save trouble to both writer and reader." The words must be plain in sense and plain in caligraphy, for Babar disliked a crabbed "fist" almost as much as a crabbed sentence, and prided himself on the invention of a new style of handwriting. Moreover, he will have his son read his letter over before posting it—O' si sic omnes!—and defies him to decipher his latest epistle. His own style, like his penmanship, was distinct and yet distinguished.

It may sound a little absurd to talk of style and literary skill in reference to a man who was born in 1483 on the banks of the Iaxartes, in what most people imagine to be the wilds of Central Asia. But the descendants of those twin Scourges of God, Chingiz and Tamerlane, when they settled on the borders of Persia, and in the country of the Oxus and Iaxartes, became no mere barbarians. The Turco-Mongol princes of that time took a pride in literary polish, and loved to turn out a good sonnet or copy a beautiful manuscript, almost as well as to brain a man with a mace or chop off his head. Babar was a soldier of fortune, but he was not less a fine critic, a fastidious judge of verse, and an admirable writer in several languages. In Persian, the tongue of culture, the Latin of the East, he was an accomplished poet; as a staunch Muslim he read Arabic, and in his native Turki dialect he was master of a pure, lucid, and unaffected style both in prose and verse. In the efficacy of poetry he had a simple faith; it diverted him from drinking, he says, and when he was prostrate with fever in India he took to turning a holy Divine's reflections into metrical shape, with a view to depressing his temperature; but the "faith-cure" did not work. Even sermons may depress without doing much good. In his worst misfortunes, in the toils and hardships of a campaign among the Afghan mountains, when his army was murmuring and dropping with fatigue, when the tents were knee-deep in water and mud, Babar found consolation in composing a ghazal. He was perhaps a little touchy about these productions, for once when he fled for refuge to an uncle and presented him with an ode on the miseries of exile, the old man declined to commit himself to any opinion on its merits, whereat Babar remarked with more mortification than logic that "it was pretty evident that the Khan had no great skill in poetic diction!"

This combination of genuine poetic feeling with the sterner qualities of a soldier and man of action make Babar a singularly interesting personality. This Central Asian knight-errant, who loved to turn from the stricken field and its ghastly scenes to write a love-song to his own music; who could spend a night in reckless wine-bibbing, and rise before the sun to stand in unaffected delight before a tree whose falling autumn leaves showed him "such colours as no painter could copy"; who used to mark his road in an enemy's country, like his great ancestor Timur, by human milestones, "minarets of heads," and yet could shed tears of homesickness as he opened a musk-melon that recalled the orchards and gardens of his lost native land—this strange compound of tenderness and ferocity, culture and barbarity, self-restraint and reckless abandonment, is perhaps without a parallel in the world. His amazing indiscretions in wine, arrack, bhung, and opium would have killed an ordinary man in a year, but Babar drank steadily, regularly, deliberately, à outrance, for fifteen years, and yet swam every river he came to in India, including the mighty Ganges (which he tells us he crossed in thirty-three strokes, and then took breath and swam back again), often rode a hundred miles a day till within a year or so of his death, and met and disposed of five champions in single combat in one day's fighting. He had an iron constitution and immense strength. In his prime he could pick up a man under each arm and run with them round the battlements of a castle, leaping the embrasures. He could starve as well as tope, tramp with the common soldiers as well as sup with kings, and he knew when to deny himself. After a course of systematic debauchery, of which his Memoirs present some extraordinary Rabelaisian pictures, he could free himself from the habit when work was to be done; and when he stood face to face with the mighty Rajput army at Sikri, he had the courage to send for all his golden beakers and smash them in presence of the army—to send for all the jars and skins of choice Kabul vintages and pour the red juice on to the thirsty earth—and solemnly renounce wine for ever, for himself and for his empire. And what is more, he kept his word.

All these things, and a thousand others, are related with the most engaging candour in these wonderful Memoirs. Desultory and discursive as they are, unequal in style and arrangement, degenerating into a bald diary towards the close, and not free from arid wastes (and worse still, wide gaps) in their progress, to anybody who has the patience to read a book which is wholly unsuitable for magazine consumption they must possess a penetrating flavour. Babar takes one utterly into his confidence, makes one his intimate, his familiar, and tells one all his hopes and ambitions, reveals his weaknesses, asks us to join in his unholy revels, his innocent joys, his supreme triumphs. It is an honour to be welcomed to the intimacy of such a man. His nature is so fresh and buoyant, so utterly free from convention and cant, so full of chivalrous honour, so rich in hope, courage, resolve, and at the same time so warm and friendly, so intensely human, that it conquers one's affectionate admiration. It all happened four hundred years ago, yet one feels that Babar still lives, a breathing human being, of the like passions with ourselves, immortal in the vivid realism of his self-revelation.

Death makes no conquest of this Conqueror,
For now he lives in Fame.

Babar was indeed a conqueror of heroic proportions. He came to his throne in Ferghana before he was twelve, fought a dozen pitched battles, and twice conquered the great city of Samarkand before he was twenty, and after a series of hair-breadth escapes and adventures seized the kingdom of Kabul, fought with Afghans and Hazaras, Yusufzais, Orakzais, Uzbeks, Gakkars; and at last, descending by the immemorial road into India, in three great battles, at Panipat, Kanwa, and Chapra, set Hindustan under his feet. His empire stretched from the Oxus to the Gogra, from the Himalayas to the mountains of Rajputana, from Kandahar to Benares. Extraordinary rapidity of action, joined to consummate generalship acquired in thirty years of perpetual warfare with the hardy races of the north, explains to some extent his military successes. But his personality counted for more. One feels that his soldiers recognized in him the born leader, the man who must be followed. Not his courage and strategy alone, but his friendly comradeship, his insistence on sharing every hardship and facing every danger, made him the idol of his men. When he sat half-frozen in the snow of the Paropamisus, sooner than enter a cave and warm himself at a fire, because he thought there was no room for his soldiers, and would not enjoy what they could not share, he won a victory over their hearts such as no mere leading in the field could give him. He never forgot a friend, and when his friends forgot him he forgave them. In spite of his minarets of heads and frequent severity, he was constantly pardoning traitors and receiving back to his affection the brothers and kinsfolk who deceived him. He was the strangest compound of virtues and vices, but whichever they were they were always of the generous kind; at his best he is to be revered, and at his worst he must still be loved.

But Babar himself is far from being the sole subject of interest in the Memoirs. They abound in delicious portraits of his contemporaries. He takes off the whole Court in thumb-nail sketches. There is Khwaja Hoseyn, a good-tempered, easy-going fellow, who sang a capital song when the wine was going round; and his genial comrade, Yakub Beg, the prime-minister, he it observed, who could reel off an ode, was inimitable at leap-frog, played a capital game of polo, and was a clever, useful sort of man in every way. Ali Mejid, unfortunately, was "a vicious, treacherous, good-for-nothing hypocrite," and the Grand Huntsman, who dabbled in the black art, was "a disagreeable, sour-faced, conceited boor"; but the Great Seal was "a most witty and humorous personage, but reckless in debauch." Kambur Ali "talked a great deal, and very idly—he had a muddy brain." There is an excellent portrait of one of Babar's uncles, the King of Samarkand, a true Turk, "tall, ruddy, corpulent," bearded only on the chin, and particular about the lie of his turban. Scrupulously devout, never omitting the regulation prayers, even between the decanters, he would not dare even to uncross his legs in the presence of his spiritual director, in spite of all the cramp and "pins and needles" that he suffered. Once indeed he broke this rule, but it was then discovered that he had been sitting on a bone—some relic of a royal banquet—in extreme agony, and the excuse served. He was not indeed intellectual, and "did not read any"—which was rather a disgrace in a town-bred Turk—but he had his virtues; he was a man of few words, but what he said he meant; he was faithful to his treaty and scrupulously just and true in all his dealings. He was also a first-rate sportsman, great at hawking, and a famous marksman with the arrow or at the Mongol popinjay. So modest was he and discreet in his manners that he was never known to let his bare foot peep out from under his robes even in private—yet "he would drink day and night without a break for twenty or thirty days on end." Vrayment, voilà un plaisant exercice! as old Brantôme would say.

The Memoirs are also full of curiously minute descriptions of the natural history of the various regions in which their author spent his life. He had a wonderful love of nature, and a keenly observant eye, and he possessed the rare merit of distinguishing between what he observed himself and what he recorded from hearsay. He gives an elaborate description of Hindustan—the best known part of the Memoirs—and another section deals minutely with Afghanistan. He knows every animal and flower around Kabul; he counts thirty-three species of tulips, and can tell where the rarest varieties are to be found. He knows the habits of bird and beast, and how they are to be caught. He can lasso herons with a line, and intoxicate fish and take them in shoals. He loves gardens—he is never happy in a new place till he has laid out a pleasure ground—and one of his favourite resorts was “The Garden of Good Faith,” where orange trees and pomegranates clustered round a lake, and the ground was soft with clover—“the very eye of beauty.” He used to make seats and fountains under the trees in pleasant spots, with spacious views, and there he would sit with his friends, and see the girls dance, and listen to the musicians singing the songs he composed, and drink “Ruby from the Vine,” which he had learned to love too well. On the brow of a hill near Kabul he set up a little granite cistern, which he used to fill with red wine, and on its sides were chiselled these lines:—

Sweet is the New Year's coming,
Sweet the smiling spring;
Sweet is the juice of the mellow grape,
Sweeter far the voice of Love.
O Babar, seize life's pleasures
Which, once gone, can never, alas! return.

STANLEY LANE-POOLE.

Notes.

In next week's Literature “Among My Books” will be written by Professor Courthope, C.B.

Sir Henry Irving, speaking at the prize-giving at the City of London School, reminded the boys that Shakespeare was not only a dramatist but an actor, nay, even an actor-manager, and contended that this accounted for the happy combination in the plays of tragedy and comedy. There is, no doubt, some truth in this, but it is stretching the point to account for the comic scenes by saying that Shakespeare had to “please to live”—to write down to the ‘prentices; still more so to regard the mixed nature of his audiences as a useful corrective to his naturally over-subjective habit of mind. The comic scenes are just as natural to Shakespeare's own genius as the tragic. Scenes which flow inevitably from the poet's brain, which form an integral part of his view of life, cannot be called concessions to the popular taste. Contrast and relief, such as we get in the gravediggers' scene, are a necessary element in a work of art, quite apart from their function in pleasing apprentices.

Sir Henry was less open to criticism in calling Shakespeare a “supreme master of the humanities”—a description of him well illustrated by an interesting discovery reported by Mr. Sidney Lee in his review in the Nineteenth Century of M. Jusserand's “Shakespeare in France.” It is a contribution to French Shakespeariana unknown to M. Jusserand, which Mr. Lee purchased by chance at Sotheby's, and consists of aphorisms extracted from Shakespeare by one Charles Nodier, and translated into French under the title “Pensées de Shakespeare, Extraites de ses Ouvrages” (1801). “From Shakespeare's works,” says the writer, “one can draw forth a philosophy, but from no systems of philosophy could one construct one page of Shakespeare.”

The “humanities” were also the subject of Professor Jebb's Romanes Lecture; and in the report before us the name of Shakespeare is not so much as mentioned, an omission which cannot fail to strike the reader. When the lecture is read side by side with Sir Henry Irving's speech (delivered almost simultaneously), we see the difference between the academic and the modern point of view. Fortunately they are not mutually exclusive, but Professor Jebb's method includes Sir Henry Irving's, as the greater includes the less. It is better to come to the study of Shakespeare with a mind stored with the wisdom of the ancients. But, on the other hand, to study Shakespeare without the equipment is very much better than not studying him at all, and should, as Sir Henry suggests, do a great deal towards softening the particular manners which a purely commercial curriculum is likely to engender.

The novelist as playwright is not so new a development as the novelist who dramatizes another writer's book. Dr. Conan Doyle has done this, and produced in Holmes a comedy of sentiment which should please those who shun the gaieties of Lord Quex and the wit of Wheels Within Wheels. Those well-worn characters, the rich brother who comes home more or less in the guise of a beggar, and “tests” the honour of his relations with an obvious strategy; the other brother, who is true to a youthful compact to share his all with the wanderer; the wife who has grown hard in the struggle to save a few thousand pounds; the young girl in love with her father's penniless assistant—they were all welcomed for the sake of a simple, hearty, wholesome story, much assisted by the acting of Mr. James Welch, Mr. Brandon Thomas, and Miss Geraldine Oliffe.

We mentioned at the beginning of May that a Society of Dramatic Authors was contemplated, either with a separate constitution of its own, or as part of the Society of Authors. The latter alternative, it seems, has been adopted. The “Dramatic Sub-committee” of the society (Mr. Henry Arthur Jones, Mr. Edward Rose, and Mr. A. W. à Beckett) invited dramatic authors to a meeting, the outcome of which is that Mr. Pinero and Mr. Sidney Grundy have joined the sub-committee, and the Authors' Society, to which many playwrights, especially those who are also novelists, already belonged, now includes among its members most of the leading dramatists of the day.

The Italian Ambassador, speaking last week on “Dante as a business man,” paradoxically explained that what he meant to convey was that Dante was not a business man, since in Dante's day “business men,” in the modern sense of the term, did not exist. Did his Excellency forget the great Florentine banking houses, several of which were of European celebrity, in Dante's own lifetime? The house of the Bardi and that of the Peruzzi, who were also Florentines, had extensive relations with Edward III., through whose default they both failed for huge sums not much more than twenty years after Dante's death. To the Bardi Edward owed nearly a million gold florins, to the Peruzzi more than half a million; and the stoppage of these two great houses caused the ruin of many smaller ones, and brought widespread misery upon Florence, as the Florentine chronicler, Giovanni Villani, graphically relates.

The name of the Bardi is closely associated with that of Dante, for it was to Simon de' Bardi, a member of this family, that his early love, Beatrice Portinari, was married, the Beatrice of the “Vita Nuova” and of the “Divina Commedia.” Curiously enough, too, the father of Boccaccio, Dante's future biographer, was agent for the house of Bardi in Paris, and it was during his residence there, according to the most trustworthy accounts, that Boccaccio was born—out of wedlock, it must be added, his mother having been a young Parisian lady of the middle classes and of easy virtue, from whom the author of “The Decameron” is supposed to have derived his lively fancy and his mercurial disposition.

Mr. Alfred Austin, who followed the Italian Ambassador, was, no doubt, right in the main in contending that poets are, generally, level-headed, practical men. Exceptions to the rule can, of course easily be cited: one thinks, at once, of Cowper, Shelley, and Leigh Hunt. Still not only have the majority of poets been sufficiently sane for all practical purposes, but their fellow-citizens, far from expecting them to be lunatics, have constantly thrust them into responsible positions in which sobriety of judgment was eminently needed. Mr. Austin mentioned that the poet Chaucer was an ambassador. So was "Owen Meredith"; so was at least one English poet of the age of Anne, while another was a Secretary of State; so were, and are, various American poets of the present century. Poets, too, have been bankers, like Samuel Rogers, and solicitors and stock-brokers, like the authors of "Rejected Addresses." Dante himself played an important part in the government of Florence, and acted more than once as ambassador. In 1301 he was intrusted with the superintendence of the works on one of the streets of Florence with a view to facilitating the passage of troops. "Dante as a business man," therefore, is not such an inappropriate title for an address as might at first sight appear.

"Dr. Johnson as Representative of the Character of the Eighteenth Century" is a much better—in the sense of a more fruitful and suggestive—theme for an academic exercitation than Universities sometimes propose; and Mr. W. R. Barker, B.A., the winner of the Chancellor's English Essay Prize for the present year, has made the most of it. His Prize Essay (F. E. Robinson, 6d.) is a very clever and promising piece of work—occasionally, it is true, a little fanciful, as where he detects Macaulay's debt to Johnson in, among other things, a "passionate love of the genitive case"—and though more than a little "cocksure" in tone and statement, not more so, perhaps, than is natural and even engaging in the young. For if we come to consider it, there are few complaints more unreasonable than that which is provoked by the association of this quality with youth. Why, it is surely among the almost invariable results of increasing years and enlarged experience to dilute superlatives, to limit rules by exceptions, to reduce the noble magnitude of generalizations, and to reveal the disconcerting fact that nearly every question is encumbered with the nuisance of "another side." It is only a Macaulay now and then who can resist these paralyzing influences and maintain the tone of confident dogmatism, triumphant and unabated, to the end. If, therefore, a writer wishes to enjoy the pleasure of "cocksureness" at any period, it is absurd to blame him for indulging it during youth. Should he allow that golden opportunity to slip past him, he will never have another chance.

We regret, however, that Mr. Barker should have felt it his duty to criticize the despised art of journalism. He is right, no doubt, in holding that "it is at all times a dangerous occupation to a man who wishes to leave a lasting name to posterity," but, in spite of this objection, it is a branch of literature, or so-called literature, to which many a man who started with posterity in view has ultimately had to devote himself. Reluctantly abandoning his hopes of immortality, he has found himself in middle life, or even later, practising "the necessary journalistic accomplishment of writing about a book before he knows what it contains," and displaying "the power of saying nothing with portentous gravity," happy if at the close of his career it can be said of him, as Mr. Barker kindly says of Johnson, that, "unlike most journalists, he deceived himself as well as the public." We know not, what the future may hold for any of us; and there is a certain anecdote of the actor Bannister which contains a moral not unworthy of Mr. Barker's consideration. "Bill," said a man of the people, in his hearing, to a friend, "look at that there chap; he's a hactor." "Hush, Joe," replied his more considerate companion. "He'll hear you. You shouldn't talk in that way. How do you know what you may come to yourself?"

M. Baranger's plea, at the Publishers' Congress, for the formation of a Professional School of Booksellers might be justified by an analogy between the case of the bookseller and that of the pharmaceutical chemist. Any man, of course, is competent to sell both books and proprietary medicines; but the bookseller with a diploma might rise to the dignity of dispensing, and even informally prescribing, literature, just as the qualified chemist dispenses and informally prescribes drugs. Daring imagination pictures the confiding student staring into his shop and asking timidly if he can let him have something for insomnia, something for disappointment in love, or something to expel religious doubt. One also pictures an occasional bookseller accused of "professional negligence," and sued and mulcted in damages for selling Law's "Serious Call" to a victim of religious mania, or "The Adventures of Sherlock Holmes" to a sufferer from sleeplessness. But, in the present state of public opinion, this is the idlest of idle dreams. According to Herr van den Velde, a school of the kind proposed by M. Baranger was lately opened in Brussels, and the booksellers' clerks refused to attend it, alleging that they knew their business and required no further instruction.

The number of men who are convinced that nothing but lack of leisure prevents them from producing works of genius is known to be enormous. A way of surmounting the obstacle is suggested by one of the stories told in the Meissonier number of Little Journeys to the Homes of Eminent Painters (Putnam, 10 cents). Six young men, it seems, of whom Meissonier was one, found themselves in this quandary. They fell into each other's arms and swore eternal brotherhood, agreeing that they would draw lots, and that the man who drew the lucky number should be provided with a painting outfit and supported by his friends for a month, while he set to work to produce a masterpiece. The experiment was not wholly successful, none of the masterpieces produced under these conditions finding a ready market. But it might succeed better if it were tried again; and the idea is just as applicable to literature as to art. A society of struggling men of letters, formed somewhat on the lines of a building society, designed to provide six months' clear holiday for any poor man who had a work of genius in his head and only wanted the time to work it out, untroubled by sordid cares, would surely find subscribers in these practical days.

A recent article in the Manchester Quarterly, recording the conversations of James Northcote, R.A., and James Ward, artist, is reprinted in a pamphlet by Messrs. Sherratt and Hughes. The most interesting passage is that in which the Academician expresses his contempt for authority in matters of art, and his opinion that artists (including literary artists) would do better if they had no traditions to follow, but were obliged to go as they pleased:—

Being with Northcote one day when the allied armies were approaching Paris, I expressed to him my apprehensions for the safety of the Louvre Gallery. He rejoined that if all the fine paintings existing were destroyed, and if there were a demand for pictures, much finer pictures would rise up than we should otherwise have. The old pictures kept us in trammels, whereas if they were done away with, every painter would follow the bent of his feelings, and we should then have more novelty and variety than we have at present. The Ancients, for instance, were held up to us as unquestionable authorities, because, he supposed, they were the first in point of time. . . . Had Shakespeare been bound down by the laws of the ancient drama, he would have done nothing.

Here is an even better reason for burning books than was given by the Mahomedan in the library of Alexandria.

The most interesting feature of the "Library Association Year Book" (Horace Marshall, 1s. n.) is a collection of examination papers lately set to candidates for the Association's certificates. The librarian is asked, for example, to "give some account of the Chanson de Roland," to "distinguish between Dynamics, Statics, Kinematics," and to "state and discuss the estimates of Boswell's character and capacity given respectively by Macaulay and Carlyle." It is well, of course, that he should be able to do these things, if called upon; but in the practical course of his duties we imagine that he is generally enough of a diplomatist to evade the obligation. Among the questions which we should not ourselves feel confident of answering correctly is this:—"In a library having a staff composed of both sexes, what ordinary routine work would you apportion to the female members?" They might allure the young men of the parish within reach of the civilizing influences of the one hundred best books; but perhaps such a reply would be too flippant to deserve high marks. Another poser is:—"What steps would you take to prevent a public reading room from being abused by a dirty loafer?" The answer might depend upon the dirty loafer's fighting weight. Probably, however, the solution of the problem expected by the examiners is:—"Have the latest sporting intelligence punctually posted up on a board outside the reading room." The "dirty loafer" will hardly pass these announcements by for the purpose of improving his mind by the perusal of the "high-class reviews."

The Year Book also contains a fairly complete list of British Libraries, with a statement of the number of books in each. The British Museum is an easy first, with 1,950,000 volumes; the Bodleian comes second with 585,000, and the Cambridge University Library third with 500,000, and the Advocates' Library at Edinburgh fourth, with 365,000. A fact which strikes us, when we come to look into the figures, is the immense superiority of the libraries of Scotland over those of Ireland. Let us take the figures for the best ten libraries in each country, and set them out in parallel columns. We get this result:—

SCOTLAND.		IRELAND.
Edinburgh, Advocates' ..	365,000	Dublin, Trinity College ..	245,000
Edinburgh, University ..	200,000	Dublin, National Library of ..	200,000
Glasgow University ..	200,000	Ireland ..	120,000
St. Andrews, University ..	118,000	Dublin, Irish Academy ..	70,000
Aberdeen, University ..	100,000	Dublin, King's Inns ..	60,000
Edinburgh, Public ..	100,000	Belfast, Queen's College ..	46,000
Edinburgh, Signet ..	89,000	Belfast, Linen Hall ..	42,000
Dundee, Public ..	68,000	Belfast, Public ..	37,500
Aberdeen, Public ..	50,000	Maynooth, St. Patrick's ..	35,000
Edinburgh, New College ..	43,000	Cork, Queen's College ..	31,000
		Cork, Public ..	30,000
Total ..	1,333,000	Total ..	716,500

Scotland, we see, wins easily; and it is only thanks to Dublin that Ireland makes any show at all. Knock out the four Dublin Libraries, on the one hand, and four Edinburgh Libraries on the other, and the score is:—

Scotland	579,000
Ireland	321,000
Majority	258,000

The revival of learning in Ireland, of which we have heard a good deal of late, has still plenty of leeway to make up. All interested in the spread of culture will be pleased to learn that, in London alone, there are no fewer than 193 public libraries.

The formation of a "Rousseau Library and Museum" in Montmorency is, it is hoped, to be accomplished within the next few months. A large number of literary relics have already been obtained. Owing to the original hermitage having been demolished by the present owner, it has been determined to house the library and museum in the town itself.

One of the most important decisions taken at the recent International Press Congress at Rome was to agitate for the reduction of the foreign postal rate for journals. A reform in this direction would certainly be a boon to English residents on the Continent. At present they cannot anywhere (unless it be at Boulogne) buy a penny English paper for less than twopence half-penny, while threepence is a frequent charge. Consequently they seldom buy them at all unless they are actually obliged to do so. If the charge were lowered there is every reason to suppose that journals would circulate in sufficient numbers to recoup the Post Office Department, if not actually to augment its profits; while the widening of the circulation would benefit British trade by scattering abroad advertisements of British wares.

Better prices were realized during the last four days of the sale of the Philipps Manuscripts held last week by Messrs. Sotheby. The "Cronicon Forestariorum de Flandria," finely written on vellum during the fifteenth century, brought £15, and a copy of the "De Gestis Alexandri Magni" of Quintus Curtius, £22. A curious collection of rare works by early English authors, among them Adam Balsamensis and Alexander de Hales, fourteenth century, on vellum, sold for £106; a "Vita Beati Gregorii," thirteenth century, vellum, for £28; while a MS. of the beginning of the fifteenth century, on vellum, with painted capitals, the "De Confessione Amantis" of John Gower, brought £60. Many other scarce or interesting MSS. were also sold, the most noticeable being Hampole's "Pricke of Conscience," fifteenth century, vellum, £26; "Liber Grammaticalis," by Serlo, Abbot of Fountains, fourteenth century, on paper, £36; the Original Official Despatches from the French Army in Italy, 1800-1804, on paper, £31; a collection of original MSS. by Roger Dodsworth, folio, on paper, £23; "Decreta et Epistolæ Paparum," twelfth century, vellum, £25; and Higden's "Polychronicon," fourteenth century, vellum, £15 5s.

The valuable series of manuscripts collected by Cardinal Giuseppe Renato Imperiali, in twenty-two folio volumes, was not sold, the entry in the catalogue being marked "Passed" by the auctioneers. A splendid Cartulary of the Benedictine Monastery of Liessies in Hainault brought, however, £307, the highest individual amount realized during the sale. It was beautifully written on 344 vellum pages and dated from the thirteenth century. "Macrobius in Somnium Scipionis," eleventh century, vellum, realized £34; a Missal of the eleventh century, vellum, £33; the "Epistolæ" of Ovid, twelfth century, vellum, £40; a fine MS. on vellum of the works of John of Salisbury, written in the twelfth century, by Odo, Prior of Canterbury, £54 10s.; a curious collection of Poems, Songs, &c., by Elizabethan poets, with Basse's Epitaph on Shakespeare, Temp. Jac. I., £51; a MS. account of the Visions of Tundale, fifteenth century, vellum, £12 10s.; and the "Vitæ, Passiones, et Miracula Sanctorum," two vols., folio, thirteenth century, vellum, £70. The total amount realized for the 1,258 lots which comprised this instalment of the Philipps MSS. was very nearly £3,800.

A week or two ago we drew attention to the valuable Dickensiana which were to be sold among the Wright collection at Sotheby's. Last Tuesday was the great Dickens day in the sale, and some very remarkable prices were secured. We gave some account of the chief items the other day. The highest—£500—was given by Messrs. Sotheran for the edition of Forster's "Life." Next came a complete MS. of "The Battle of Life," secured by the same purchasers for £400. Other prices were—"The Strange Gentleman" (a comic burletta, first performed in 1836), £84; "The Village Coquettes," £36 10s.; the opening scene of the "Travesty of Othello," in MS., with a note by John Dickens, the father, £35; the little cash book, £95; "Mrs. Gamp and the Strolling Players," an account of a trip to Manchester made by Dickens and other friends in connexion with a theatrical performance for Leigh Hunt's Benefit, £78 15s.; "The Chimes," with an unpublished drawing by Leech, £66. Many "presentation copies" were sold—especially parts of "Pickwick," in the original numbers, inscribed "To Mary Hogarth," who died before the book was completed, 100 guineas; another similar "Pickwick," £85; a bound first edition, inscribed to Mr. E. Chapman, with an extract from "Oliver Twist," 60 guineas; the presentation copy of "Nicholas Nickleby," with the letter about Smike, £69; a first edition of the "Christmas Carol," £71; "American Notes," with Carlyle's autograph, £61.

American Letter.

PROBLEMS OF EXISTENCE IN FICTION.

A cry for "expansion" is no new thing in the voices from the West of these States. It is mainly in that section that the longing for our territorial enlargement beyond seas is felt; and from the cry which has lately made itself heard there, it seems that a sense of restriction is shared with the politician by the novelist. Apparently the present bounds of American fiction are not wide enough, or, rather, they are too strictly patrolled by the spirit of the "young girl"; and there are those who would give our fiction a Latin latitude, or free it from any sort of surveillance by the anxieties. The cry is a protest as well as a demand, and it is only a little more incoherent in the one quality than in the other. The sum of it is the expression of a vehement belief, not to call it conviction, that "American novels are too expunged to be true to life. They are novels of clever details, of witty conversations, and delicate touches which give your brain little tinges of delight when you read them. But the great things of life, the problems of existence, which are tearing like wolves at your hearts and mine, are never grasped and handled firmly. They are staggered round and hinted at, and the author stutters and coughs behind his hand until his readers are blushing for what he has purposely avoided."

This expression may owe something of its headlong character to the impetuosity of the reporter, but in the absence of any other statement, it must be accepted as representative of the feeling, if not the thought, of the clever young writer who is said to have addressed it to a Chicago audience. In any case, however, the most interesting question arising from it is whether it is true. It looks like the sort of hasty conclusion from the book last read which disables so very much trenchant criticism, and makes the reader wish that the critic had acquainted himself a little better with the subject generally. If one considers the facts for one's self, they do not seem in this case to bear the construction put upon them. One may very well allow that American novels are full of clever details, witty conversations, and delicate touches, without at all allowing that the wolfish problems of existence are never grasped and handled firmly in them. One can at once recall a great number of the greatest of them which handle these problems without staggering around or stuttering. There are, for example, the two Chicago books of Mr. Henry B. Fuller, "The Cliff Dwellers" and "With the Procession"; and there is "The Money Captain," of Mr. William Payne in all its palpitant actuality. There is Mr. Herrick's "Gospel of Freedom." There are the books of Mr. Stephen Crane and the books of Mr. Harold Frederic, especially "The Damnation of Theron Ware." There is such a book as Miss Wilkins' "Jane Field." There is "The Grandissimes" of Mr. Cable. There are "What Maisie Knew" and "The Awkward Age," by Mr. James, and almost any of his fine strong studies of life. To go farther back, there is "Uncle Tom's Cabin"; there is "The Scarlet Letter," "The Blithedale Romance." In all these the literary expansionist would find the problems of existence grasped and handled firmly; and are not their writers the chief of those who make American novels and give them standing in the literary world?

There can be less question of this than of the real nature of the problems of existence, especially the sort that tear like wolves at our hearts. As to their nature, the critic of our faltering fiction shows something of its own disposition to stagger and stutter; and it is mainly by inference from some other possible impetuosities of the reporter that this critic may be understood to mean some of the more darkling affairs of the heart. But it would be so easy to work injustice by such an inference that a generous criticism of the critic would not press it; and I, for my part, should like to break altogether away from it and ask what the real problems of existence are? They are, it seems to me, very largely economical. With those who have no money they are the question of a job, and the pay they shall get for it. This is of a far more vital significance and heart-rending consequence than the critic or the novelist, even, could often be persuaded to believe. With those who have money it is the question of losing it, and the anguish and squalor of coming down to narrower things; or it is the secret remorse for wasting it, the corroding shame for spending it selfishly while many hunger and freeze in sight of the riot. Then, for a real, wolfish, tearing problem, a mortgage is not a bad thing; and a note falling due at the bank and no money to pay it is very well. The problems are often social, as, whom shall one ask to dinner, or shall one be asked one's self to this or that house where one wishes to be seen. Whether a girl who has not a partner engaged for the german will have a good time at a ball is a problem involving the keenest pathos. Such problems are really agonizing, as people would own if they were honest. The domestic problems are not alone those bound up in the behaviour of the cook and the housemaid, but are also such crucial questions as to how one shall get on with a nagging wife or a brutal husband, and wear life out with the patience that brings peace at last. There are other domestic problems, such as a daughter's wish in her innocent heart to marry a fool or a drunkard, and how to prevent it, or a son's determination to bring a goose or a cat into the family circle, and how to keep him from doing it. Questions like these rob the nights of sleep, and turn the watcher's hair grey and age the soul itself. Or there is a lingering, hopeless sickness, which must be borne by the sufferer, and by those who love the sufferer; how to bear this nobly is often a problem which, if not wolfish, is inexpressibly lacerating. There are civic and moral and religious problems, from which no life is exempt, though they may not spectacularly tear at the heart like wolves. You are sometimes tempted against your conscience to side with your country when your country is wrong, or to vote for your party when your party is false to your country. You are tempted to tell a lie which shall profit you, to profess openly a creed which secretly you deny.

Such are a few of the real problems of existence. They beset ninety-nine hundredths of us, and the other hundredth may be safely left to his question of conduct in matters which fiction, our American fiction, our Anglo-Saxon fiction, staggers round and coughs at behind its hand. The books which deal with the problems noted and with kindred questions are as powerful and as important as any which treat the emotional, or hysterical, or even the equivocal questions; and they may be openly read by young people together and in all families. This is not saying that the hundredth man's or woman's case may not be freely looked after also; it is perhaps important, too, though not so important as he or she thinks; and any one may treat it who chooses. But if one chooses to treat it, one cannot do it with open doors. If one does it, one shuts one's book to nine-tenths of those who read Anglo-Saxon novels unashamed; and if our novelists were generally to do it, their novels would be kept out of the hands of the young and inexperienced, as novels are in those Latin countries where novelists habitually grasp and handle problems of that sort. There is not, and there never has been, anything to prevent the freest expansion in that direction, which our critic supposes forbidden. The young girl is not on guard there, but young girls may be very fitly guarded from looking for their knowledge of life to books that deal with the more darkling problems, because, for one thing, such books do not present a true picture of life, as a whole or in any large part.

VENGEANCE OF THE FEMALE.

Mr. Marston Wilcox is of a generation of writers whose value is not merely in their rarity, though they have always been rather rare in all languages; and his obligation to tangibility of any sort is so slight that he would probably not hold himself accountable to criticism for any want of the obvious in his work. He calls the delightful little book which Messrs. Herbert S. Stone and Company have just published for him "Vengeance of the Female" for no reason that he assigns; but as I find myself very much its friend, I do not mind the trouble of confiding to the reader that the title embodies the sense of a quite episodic allegory in a series of chapters from the life of a young American couple marrying in New York and going to live in Spain, England, and Italy. The episodic allegory is a passage in the life of the race : that interesting passage which relates to the subjection of the primitive woman by the primitive man, and the subjection of the civilized man by the civilized woman. Like the rest of the book, it is charmingly done, and the humour which plays through it is always sweet, though this is not so much to my mind as the humour that falls with a glancing light on the figures and facts of the young couple's acquaintance and experience. When its capricious gleam touches one of these in the agreeable vague where most of the story moves, it does the work of voluminous documents, and anxious study, and scientific analysis ; and seems to accomplish something even beyond these.

The way is now quite Mr. Wilcox's own way, whether he found it or not by walking with Sterne, or Heine, or de Maistre, or all three, or neither. In its fleeting touch his delicate art is more like that of the last than of the others, but it is not so much like de Maistre's as not to be distinctively Mr. Wilcox's, who is on ground indisputably his property in the personnel of his slightly caught together sketches. He gave proof, a good many years ago, of unique knowledge of a world little known to our dense Anglo-Saxon indifference, but full of grace, picturesqueness, and a somewhat fantastic ideality based upon persistent tradition. This world was that of the Spanish and Spanish-Americans who live among us here in New York almost as little recognized as the disembodied spirits whom they do not otherwise resemble. His "Real People," in an earlier book of that name, were all from such a world, and in the present book he revisits it with his hero, who finds a Spanish-American wife in it, among types already endeared to Mr. Wilcox's readers, in a social atmosphere as alien to ours as that of another planet. The story lingers here only long enough to throw its types into relief with a tender and caressing pleasantry ; and then it passes to Seville, where the married lovers go to live for a while, and where the reader finds himself at home with them, if he is worthy, among a race which has at least as much to teach ours as to learn from it. There is no seeking for traits to praise ; there is no blinking facts : and in the airy fantasticality of the mood there is a final realism which gives us the effect of instantaneous photography. At the end, when the young couple go for a brief sojourn to England, one feels that one has personally met the friends whom they leave behind basking in the Summer heat of Seville. It is saying everything to say of Mr. Wilcox's Seville that it is the Seville of Valdés, as one may know it in "La Hermana de San Sulpizio ;" and it is interesting to have the Spanish naturalist bear witness to the American observer's truth. When this observer brings his keen eye and his delicate hand to the portrayal of other Latin types among the Italians at San Remo the work has fine shades of difference that testify no less convincingly of his insight and his accuracy. His Ligurians corroborate his Andalusians by the variance which he discovers so unerringly in them. Both are Southern, both are Catholic, both are Latin, and both are delightful, but they are not alike, and they are united mainly in confirming the reader's impression of truth in the artist who has loved them well enough to know them so well.

The lesson his book teaches, in the pleasure it gives, is that there are some virtues which other civilizations possess and ours does not ; and that in order to value these one must approach an alien race with an open mind. They will not reveal themselves to prejudice, they will withhold themselves from a well-founded conviction of superiority ; we cannot get at the knowledge of Spanish and Italian virtues even by the study of their vices. Mr. Wilcox fancies these peoples different from ourselves in being more childlike, frank, and simple in their emotions, however old and complex and reticent they may be in their theories ; and this is quite the notion that their own modern novelists give of them. But it would be a pity to leave the reader with the heavy sense of a moral from the butterfly flights and poisonings of the fancy in this most winning little book. It entreats you to enjoy it, and it would not have you learn anything from it unless that is part of your pleasure. Doubtless it is because this is inveterately part of my pleasure that I have found a lesson in it ; but I assure the lighter-minded reader that he can go safely through it and come out unburdened by any sort of instruction if he prefers. I should be truly sorry, however, if he carried his ignorance so far as not to know that its charm was the effect of a talent as uncommon as it is genial, and of a skill which is never more present than when he is least conscious of it.

W. D. HOWELLS.

(Copyright, 1899, in the United States of America, by Harper and Brothers.)

THE PUBLISHERS' CONGRESS.

The Publishers' Congress held last week in London was a very practical and business-like gathering, which accomplished much really excellent work. The Publishers' Circular has published a report of the proceedings, to which we refer those of our readers who are interested in the questions discussed. The following is a brief summary of a few of the most important papers read before the Congress.

National Bibliographies.—Herr W. Muller, of Vienna, read a paper on the foundation of periodical national bibliographies, to be published in uniform manner. Progress has already been made by the "English Catalogue of Books" and the "American Catalogue of Books," which constitute an Anglo-American bibliography, and as a result of the discussion upon this paper the formation of national bibliographies on a uniform plan will, in all probability, be successfully carried out.

The Protection of New Ideas in Form and Get-up.—M. Joseph Bourdel opened up a burning question in this paper, but he failed to offer any solution of the problem other than an appeal to legislation.

The Exclusive Right in Titles.—Mr. E. Bell suggested that some method should be adopted for the registration of all distinctive titles, carrying with it the exclusive right of use during the term of copyright. There would be a separate registry of titles at Stationers' Hall, and the registrar would have a certain amount of discretion as to whether a title could be appropriated or not.

A Uniform Custom with regard to "Overs" in Printing.—Mr. S. Pawlings' paper evoked much discussion, for "overs" in printing have always been regarded with suspicion by the Society of Authors. It was eventually resolved, "That it is advisable to adopt some custom with regard to 'overs' on printing to provide for the inevitable loss (through disappearance and soilage of copies) that must fall upon the publisher in the handling of large quantities of books under a royalty agreement."

The International Protection of Publishing Rights.—Under this head there were several interesting discussions on the present state of international copyright. Mr. Putnam reviewed the position of the United States, but was not very hopeful with regard to any immediate change in the American law. Adhesion to the Berne Convention would be dependent on an absolute change in the national policy, which was committed to the doctrines of protection. The Typographical Union blocked the way of progress, for that union had greater influence than authors and publishers combined. The Italian society of booksellers had memorialized the Government to conclude treaties with the different States of South America for the rights of authors.

Agreements between Authors and Publishers.—M. Leclerc read the text of an agreement arrived at in France during 1898 by a mixed commission of representatives of publishers and representatives of authors. Mr. John Murray pointed out that a similar attempt had been made in this country, but had resulted in a complete misunderstanding. It was decided to refer to an international convention the task of studying all the customary regulations in each country between authors and publishers. This convention would report with a systematic summary at the next Congress, when it is hoped some definite agreements may be drawn up.

Canadian Copyright.—Mr. F. R. Daldy contributed a review of the present state of copyright in Canada, with which Literature had lately dealt more than once. He was of opinion that the Canadian Copyright Bill would eventually be passed.

The Length of Quotations in Reviews.—Mr. Arthur Waugh read a paper on this subject, and there was a lengthy discussion. Mr. Longman thought the English law was strong enough now to deal with the question if quotation were carried to excess, and it was generally agreed that it would be better not to attempt any further legal provision against the grievance.

The Convention of Berne.—It was decided to make special efforts to induce the United States, Russia, Holland, Sweden, and Denmark to adhere to the Convention, and a memorial is to be prepared, which will be sent round to the several Governments of these countries.

A Professional School for Booksellers.—A plan of a school for booksellers was put forward by M. Baranger, but the motion was withdrawn, as it was stated that the school had already been tried in Brussels and had proved a total failure.

Methods of Distribution.—Mr. Frederick Macmillan read a valuable paper on the various methods of distributing books, through the booksellers, canvassers, Press, &c.; and Mr. Heinemann and Mr. Nutt described the German system of book-selling, but no resolutions on the vexed subject of English book-selling were put to the meeting.

The Presentation of Books to National Libraries.—Mr. Edward Marston protested against the system of presenting five copies of each book published to National Libraries, but Mr. Murray stated that the Government remained firm on the question. Nevertheless, a resolution suggesting that the number of presentation copies should be restricted was carried.

"THE RUSSIAN BYRON."

When Peter the Great's Ambassador to the Porte stole the little nigger-boy Hannibal from a Turkish harem and sent him as a "curio" to his Royal master he little knew the value of his gift to Russia. The nigger-boy grew up to be a famous general; his son was a famous sea-captain; and his great-grandson was Alexander Pushkin, Russia's greatest poet. The centenary of Pushkin's birth (by the Russian calendar) has just been celebrated, and Africa may rejoice to-day with Russia in the greatness of the world's most famous octoroon: for—in spite of the belief that a man who is "darkly complected" cannot at the same time be "highly connected" and "greatly respected"—we should miss the explanation of Pushkin's extraordinary character if we forgot his extraordinary pedigree. Pushkin's thick lips, dark complexion, and woolly hair were not more characteristic features of the resurgent negro type in him than the fiery temperament which raised his ready Russian wit to the level of genius.

Pushkin was born in the very heat of the revolution in European literature. The literary hegemony of the Latin races was at an end; the Teutonic genius was beginning to assert itself in the intellectual centres of Europe. Shakespeare had been rediscovered; Karamzin had declared his greatness to the Russians. Richardson had been translated in all his bulk, and imitated by lesser men. Lomonosov and Derzhavin had sung their last classic odes, and the affectations of the French had sunk into disrepute. Pushkin was a schoolboy when the fall of Napoleon let national feeling loose all over the Continent.

The time was ripe in Russia for a national literature. It is strange that the three great founders of the new national school were all of foreign extraction: Pushkin the octoroon, Zhukovski, son of a Turkish slave, and Lermontov, sprung from the Lowland Lermonts. Strange, also, that they led to nationalism by the way of imitation. But they imitated new masters; they sought models suited to the Russian temperament. Pushkin found his models chiefly in English literature. But he was no servile imitator: he assimilated what he read, and reproduced it with a full flavour of his own personality. It is fortunate for Russian literature that Pushkin fell upon the hard times of Russian history; that his volatile nature was kept within bounds by the strictness of autocratic rule; else we should have had little from this most dissipated of fâneurs. Distracted, when at liberty, by the lower pleasures of the capital, Pushkin had three periods of literary fertility—twice in exile, and once in quarantine.

At the age of twenty-one, in return for revolutionary candour, Pushkin was exiled to the south of Russia, under the guise of official reporter on the devastations of the locust. Officially, the expedition was a failure; the report resolved itself into a nursery rhyme. Unofficially, it was the making of Pushkin as a poet. Away from the distractions of St. Petersburg he learned English and studied Byron. The result was "The Fountain of Bakhchisarai"—which the curious may study in an American translation by William Lewis—together with the "Caucasian Captive," and the opening stanzas of his masterpiece, "Eugene Onegin," which are in open imitation of "Don Juan." In 1824, he was in trouble again, and the authorities banished him to his native village of Mikhailovskoye, the village which the enthusiastic Russians have now bought and consecrated to his memory. Here he spent many industrious months, with no companion in the house but his old nurse, who made up the deficiencies of his education by drafts on her inexhaustible treasury of peasant poems and stories. She little knew what a power she was destined to be in Russian literature; she taught its greatest master the best that he ever learned of his native tongue and his country's traditional lore.

At Mikhailovskoye he cured himself of Byronism by the study of Shakespeare, and came to the sound conclusion that the "democratic laws of the Shakespearian drama are better suited to the Russian stage than the social conventions of Racine's tragedies." The grand result of this second exile was his tragedy "Boris Godunov"—which he always regarded as his chef d'œuvre—the story of the ousting of the usurper Boris by that other usurper, the false Demetrius. In 1826, as ill luck would have it, Pushkin came into Imperial favour once more, and the voice of the muse was once more drowned in the uproar of the capital. Nicholas, newly-seated on the throne, summoned him to Court, and declared that, for the future, he himself would be censor of his poems. Pushkin spared the Emperor's modest cheek the blushes which many of his minor poems were calculated to call forth; but, even so, he could not wholly please. He resolutely refused to convert his Shakespearian tragedy on Godunov into "a novel like Kenilworth," as the Emperor desired.

The pleasures of Petersburg were too much for Pushkin. The octoroon broke out in him, and he gave himself up to dissipation. He took to gambling, drinking, and writing prose; he thought of repentance and of death. The only poetic gleam in this period of liberty was "Poltava," a rather turgid piece, setting forth the teachery of Mazeppa in the war with Charles XII. In 1830, Pushkin fell into a double captivity. He became engaged to be married; and on his way to fetch his bride stumbled on the cholera-cordon and found himself shut up in long quarantine in the village of Boldino. At the end of his resources for entertainment, he read Coleridge, and wrote with feverish activity, producing three dramatic sketches, five stories, and a number of lyrics. The best production of this period is "The Covetous Knight," a set of tragic scenes from the middle ages, containing, perhaps, the best monologue in all dramatic literature—the monologue of the miser-knight gloating over his hoard.

His release from captivity was the end of his poetic career. During the last seven years of his life he produced nothing but a tedious account of Pugachov's rebellion, and a story founded on it. His life ended miserably, when he was only thirty-eight. Galled by the persecutions of a fashionable miscreant named Dantès, he provoked him to a duel. They met in the suburbs of St. Petersburg. Mortally wounded at the first discharge, Pushkin rolled over on his side, summoned Dantès to the barrier, and shot him—not fatally, but, let us hope, painfully—in the chest. "Bravo!" cried the dying Pushkin, as he saw his adversary fall. Pushkin was carried home. All Petersburg crowded round his house to hear the bulletins, and all Russia was plunged into mourning when he died.

MADAME BERNHARDT'S HAMLET.

In point of originality, Madame Sarah Bernhardt's Hamlet is decidedly the most surprising this generation (one might almost say any generation) has seen. And it is this originality which makes it so interesting. An English actor approaching Shakespeare's masterpiece must be to a very great extent fettered and moulded by tradition. He may determine to be as unconventional as possible, to think everything out anew for himself, but unconsciously he comes under the subtle influence of the past; without his realizing it, perhaps, his reading must run for the most part upon familiar lines. With Madame Bernhardt the case is altered. Hers is a conception of the character and of the play which has been worked out by a mind coming to the consideration of them fresh and unprejudiced. She begins at the beginning and, having formed her view, she carries it out consistently and with a keen activity of intelligence that cannot but have its effect. We have seen all kinds of Hamlets—the gloomy, the rhetorical, the middle-aged, the bombastic; but we have never before had a cheerful Hamlet. The Hamlet we are accustomed to would be a moody, melancholy creature, whatever his circumstances. If he had not his uncle's crime to brood over, he would have some other trouble. He could never have been an ordinarily happy prince, even though his father had lived and there had been no murder for him to revenge. He would always have felt the times to be out of joint and would still have cherished a sad pride in believing himself to be the most miserable person in the world. Madame Bernhardt will have none of this view. One feels that, until his father's death, her Hamlet has probably never known a care or an unhappy moment. An elegant, fair-haired youth, vigorous, active, high-spirited—he really thinks himself badly treated by fate which sets him so hard a task as the discovery and the purge of the “something rotten” which afflicts the State.

This may not be the Hamlet Shakespeare intended—I do not myself think it is—but so unconventional a reading has a great deal of interest, and Madame Bernhardt certainly makes the play “go” with irresistible energy and vigour. Her stage-management of the great scenes of the drama would win her a series of triumphs apart from her own acting altogether. All through, one sees evidence of the most careful thought and of a keen eye for every possible effect. And when to this is added the fascination of a magnetic personality, the beauty of a finished and rare art, one cannot wonder that audiences are carried away. After the precise monotony of traditional renderings, such a performance has an electrifying effect. It is magnificent, even though it be not Shakespeare as we in England read him.

It is highly probable, however, that if we in England had only the French translation to go by, we should read it in very much the same way as Madame Bernhardt. Of course, the poetry is banished altogether. This is inevitable in so literal a version as MM. Morand and Marcel Schwob have made. Merely the drama is left—but what a drama it is! The philosophy, the music, the penetrating power of the language, these are entirely gone. On the other hand, the humanity, the tragic elements, the poignant dramatic interest—these remain; and, interpreted as Madame Bernhardt interprets them, they make her production one that no student of the drama, no one who appreciates originality of conception and wonderful cleverness of execution, ought to miss. It is interesting, too, to see how the lesser characters present themselves to the French mind. Polonius becomes an altogether comic character, who quite justifies the “free and easy” manner in which Hamlet treats him. Laertes is played (with very little effect, to my mind) merely in the robustious method of the jeune premier. The gravediggers are frankly intolerable. Ophelia, on the contrary, is acted with a girlish charm and, in the mad scenes, with a haunting, innocent pathos that is infinitely pitiful and touching; and, for the rest, the play is efficiently and intelligently rendered. It is not by any means the best thing Madame Sarah Bernhardt has done, but to an English audience it is an exceedingly interesting experiment. Hers is, at any rate, a Hamlet that one will remember, and will be glad to remember, when the recollection of most Hamlets has faded like the memory of a vision and left not a wrack behind.

H. H. F.

FICTION.

Mr. Samuel Gordon's LESSER DESTINIES (Murray, 6s.) is a story of the lower orders in general. The characters include factory hands, music-hall artistes, burglars, ladies who keep coffee-stalls, and ladies who have known better days, and for whom there is money in Chancery; and, curiously enough, the burglar is the only one of them whom the author seems to know through and through. Bertie Bunker, at all events, is an amusing ruffian drawn with the sympathetic hand of a conscientious artist; and his daughter, Nancy, with her volcanic, but unrequited, passions is also, at intervals, a convincing figure. On the other hand, the atmosphere of the music-hall is not rendered so as to persuade us that the author is at all familiar with it. His work invites comparison with that of Mr. Arthur Morrison; but the differences are as striking as the resemblances. Where Mr. Morrison gives us drama, Mr. Gordon gives us melodrama. His story also resembles an epic poem in that it leaves off instead of coming to an end. A murder, a suicide, and a violent natural death dispose of three of the lesser destinies; but others, of equal interest and importance, are left unsettled. “Lesser Destinies,” though it will not stand serious criticism, is reasonably readable, and might even be popular if the atmosphere were somewhat less sordid.

MORE METHODIST IDYLLS, by Harry Lindsay (Bowden, 6s.), has all the quiet, restful charm of the first series. There is not much in the way of plot in these “short and simple annals of the poor,” but they have some literary merit, and Mr. Lindsay adopts the device, which always makes a collection of short stories more attractive, of placing them all among the folk of one village. In this respect, as in the mixture of pathos and hopefulness which pervades them, they may be classed with Miss Carey's tales, but they differ from hers in being confined to a poorer class and one for whom religion forms a large part of life. They give, we are afraid, the best side only of the lives of these Welsh miners, but they serve as one among many answers to the complaint that Puritanism does not receive sympathetic treatment in modern fiction.

THE FARM IN THE HILLS, by Florence Warden (Sands, 3s. 6d.), gives us one or two gruesome scenes in which the author has recaptured something of her early manner of “making people's flesh creep,” by which she made a certain reputation for herself at the time of “The House on the Marsh.”

ON GOD'S LINES, by Ramsay Guthrie (the Christian Commonwealth Publishing Co., 3s. 6d.), is a pleasing, if not strikingly vigorous, book of sketches of pit-villagers in Durham, from the point of view of their Methodist pastor. “Thrashed by the Lord” is one of the best tales.

DIDUMS, by Jean Macpherson (John Long, 3s. 6d.), in spite of its title, is not about a small boy or a puppy-dog, but a soulful young woman, enamoured of her brother-in-law. Her adventures and early death are described with occasional sprightliness to relieve the prevailing sentimentality.

VIRTUE'S TRAGEDY, by Eff Kaye (Macqueen, 6s.), is a cleverly-written book, dealing with society people and an unusual and interesting situation. If it is a first novel—and the pseudonym is new to us—Eff Kaye is to be congratulated on it. It displays a great deal of talent.

MEG, by Maude Crawford (Macqueen, 6s.), is a quiet story for girls, fairly well suited to the audience for which it has been written. The narrative and style lack distinction, but the conversations are natural.

A GENTLEMAN FROM THE RANKS (A. and C. Black, 6s.) is a kind of expurgated inversion of the “Hippolytus” legend.

There is much clever delineation of character, but the feature of the book is the Sophoclean irony of the situations and the dialogues.

Mr. Henry Fletcher's NORTH SHORE MYSTERY (Swan Sonnenschein, 6s.) is crude, but not lacking in sensation and "go." It will be pleasing, doubtless, to those who hanker after beautiful barmaids, bountiful bookmakers, and mysterious murders.

Mr. Alexander Vaughan has written a fairly good detective story in THE MYSTERY OF THE MEDRA (Pearson, 3s. 6d.). There is ingenuity in the plot—that sort of ingenuity that contrives to keep a secret hidden from the reader until the last chapter—and there is here and there a welcome touch of humour. Mr. Vaughan employs the time-honoured method, brought into favour first by Wilkie Collins, of dividing his story up into sections, told by different actors in the drama.

Obituary.

Professor WILLIAM GARDEN BLAIKIE, who for nearly thirty years held the chair of pastoral theology in the Free Church College, Edinburgh, was a voluminous author. Among his books are included "Preachers of Scotland from the Sixth to the Nineteenth Century," a "Personal Life of Dr. Livingstone," and "Better Days for Working People." Of this last work no fewer than 80,000 copies were sold. Dr. Blaikie also edited the Free Church Magazine, the North British Review, the Sunday Magazine, and the Catholic Presbyterian, and was a frequent contributor to periodicals. He died at the age of seventy-nine.

Mr. AUGUSTIN DALY was best known to fame as the theatrical manager who discovered Miss Ada Rehan; but he was also a playwright. He began, about thirty years ago, with a melodrama, "Under the Gaslight," in which a railway train was, for the first time, introduced upon the stage. Most of his later work consisted of adaptations. He adapted Mosenthal's "Deborah," Charles Reade's "Griffith Gaunt," and various French and German plays known to English play-goers as "Casting the Boomerang," "Dollars and Sense," "Needles and Pins," "The Great Unknown," "The Last Word," &c. His Shakespearian and other classical productions brought him a good deal of criticism for his unnecessary tampering with the text. A recent article by Mr. Norman Hapgood in the Atlantic Monthly commented severely on his treatment of the text of "The School for Scandal," pointing out that he had transferred important lines from the part of Charles Surface to that enacted by Miss Ada Rehan. The vogue of the Daly Combination had, of late years, somewhat declined; and it was generally felt that the company of Mr. Frohman was managed on more artistic lines. Mr. Daly died, quite suddenly, of heart failure, at the Continental Hotel in Paris.

Mr. AUGUSTIN BERNARD KELLY, who died last week, was a correspondent of The Times during the Franco-Prussian war, and in the fighting between the Turks and Servians in 1876. He was also a barrister, practising at the North London and Middlesex Sessions.

Correspondence.

ENGLISH HEXAMETERS.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—I am very pleased to see that you are opening your columns to a discussion on the so-called English hexameter.

One cannot help quoting in this connexion Lowell's fable for critics:—

They talk like a book of iambs and pentameters
In a way to make people of common sense damn metres.

No one has any wish to see

Mary, Mary, quite contrary

chopped up into trochees and iambs, and I hope you will lend your powerful aid to stop these attempts to imitate, as Guest expresses it, "in accentual verse the temporal rhythms of the classical poets." It is true it can be done, but only by masters of English rhythm like Longfellow and Swinburne. The genius, so to speak, of the two forms of poetry is different. The great power of the English language is its simplicity, and the great power of English verse is also its simplicity.

I have during the last ten years from time to time explored in intervals of leisure this particular desert of English literature, "white with the bones of distinguished metrists," from Bæda Venerabilis de Metrica Ratione downwards, and I truly believe that the whitest and homiest part of that desert is that particular part of it where the "quantitative" metrists have wandered.

Even Mr. Omond, whose work on English verse structure is, as The Times said, "lucid and scholarly," does not reach satisfactory conclusions, though he admits that the attempt to find accurate spondee, dactyls, and iambs in our accentually-governed verse borders on the chimerical. Why should it be necessary for writers of English verse to borrow from the Greeks the names of their rhythms, the iambic pentameter and the dactylic hexameter, when it is quite intelligible and much more English to call the respective rhythms the common five-foot and the triple six-foot rhythms? Many of the early English metres were undoubtedly derived from the old Latin hymns brought into England by the Norman monks—e.g., the rhythm of Walter Map and the rhythm of Bernard of Cluny.

Hora novissima, tempora pessima sunt, vigilemus!

Ecce minaciter innamnet Arbiter ille supremus—which may be scanned exactly like two beautiful lines in Evangeline.

Yé who believe in affliction that hópes and endúres and is pátient, Yé who believe in the beauty and stréngth of a wóman's devótion.

Mr. Rose's quotation from the Three Sheiks is very different from this, and one is inclined to exclaim with Tennyson:—

These lame hexameters, the strong winged music of Homer!

No, but a most burlesque, barbarous experiment.

The final sentence of Mr. Tarelli's letter in your issue of the 10th instant seems to hit the conclusion of the whole matter, but, as for those who want to take us back to "quantitative analysis," to them I would apply the quotation in your columns from the Psalmist, "So may we make their image to vanish out of the city."

Yours truly,

H. D. BATESON.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir.—In my remarks respecting hexameters, which you were so good as to include in your issue of May 20, the question of length of lines in English verse was but lightly touched upon, so as to keep within the limits of a letter.

No doubt we have well-known poems of more than seven feet—"The Raven" and "Locksley Hall," for instance. But these, as well as others of not quite so long a measure, such as "Lenore," "The May Queen," "The Armada," "Hymn to Proserpine," &c., have not become popular through their metre, but because their distinguished authors command attention. All of them could be broken up and printed as stanzas; indeed, the first and last-named, even by their rhyme-system, would specially lend themselves to such treatment. But to recur to the hexameter. Had Longfellow written nothing but "Evangeline" and "The Courtship of Miles Standish," would those poems have been so widely read?

Your correspondent, who quotes many interesting examples from Scripture, omits the beginning of Psalm 2—"Why do the heathen rage, and the people imagine a vain thing?"—which is not unfrequently given as a sample of a pure English hexameter. If the word "heathen" were a true spondee the verse would be perfect. Probably many would pronounce it "near enough"; but this touches the root of the whole matter, and necessitates a definition of what constitutes a correct hexameter verse. The first line of Mr. Swinburne's "Hesperia" is a perfect one:—

Out of the golden remote wild west where the sea without shore is;

And in the following five lines, from Kingsley's "Andromeda," the second and fifth are quite correct, and possibly many would so consider the third:—

Inland the floods came yearly; and after the waters a monster,

Bred of the slime, like the worms which are bred from the slime of the Nile-bank,

Shapeless, a terror to see ; and by night it swam out to the seaward.
Daily returning to feed with the dawn, and devoured of the fairest,
Cattle, and children, and maids, till the terrified people fled inland.

It is evident, therefore, that this metre can be readily written in English, but will it ever become popular? That is, will readers in general be attracted by it? If, according to the usually received rule, the fifth foot should be a dactyl and the sixth a spondee, while the four earlier ones may be either, it follows that any variety must be introduced before the penultimate foot. Then, are such changes merely to consist of variations of spondees and dactyls, or can further admixtures be allowed? In iambic lines all sorts of feet are admitted, frequently with fine effect, but then the monotony of one rhythm only would be insupportable. Is the hexameter, being possessed of two different kinds, to rely on these alone, or are others to be permitted? And, if so, to what extent?

To return to the question of length of lines: it may be remarked that poems in verse containing more than five feet are but minor ones. A short composition in any measure might find readers; but with so stately a form as the hexameter it is natural to associate a work of importance and bulk.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant.

HENRY ROSE.

Dalebury, Elmborne-road, Tooting Bec-common, S.W.

THE PEMBROKE THEORY IN SHAKESPEARE'S SONNETS.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Your interesting footnote to my letter in your issue of the 3rd invites a rejoinder, if you can spare me the space. Your reviewer declared that the Pembroke theory was "moribund." This will annoy Mr. Tyler, and I am surprised he has not replied. Only a few months ago he was writing letters in the Press to support his favourite idea. For my part, I should be glad if your reviewer's words were true, and my object has been to give the theory its death-blow. But I have waged battle with giants, and my modesty will not permit me to say that I have succeeded. I named for you three persons who were supporting, or had supported, Mr. Tyler's theory. In regard to Dr. Brandes, you very ingeniously argue that had he read Lady Newdegate's volume "Gossip from a Muniment Room" he would most likely have changed his mind. Allow me to point out that, unfortunately, this is not the effect which Lady Newdegate's book has had upon the Pembroke theorists. It no sooner appeared than Mr. William Archer wrote a two-column article in a London paper declaring that the documents from the Muniment Room in question "enormously strengthen the case." "Let me attempt to show," added Mr. Archer, "how the letters not only remove an objection to the Mary Fytton theory, but supply a missing link in the chain of evidence." And he proceeds, to the extent of a column and a half, to show it. How, then, can it be argued that this volume would have converted Dr. Brandes from the error of his ways, when, as a matter of fact, it "enormously strengthened" Mr. Archer in his belief in the Tyler theory of Mary Fytton and Lord Pembroke?

Your reviewer next quotes a passage from Mr. Wyndham's volume to prove that that able writer on Shakespeare's poems has no particular faith in the Pembroke idea. Mr. Wyndham has played a very peculiar part in this controversy, and I was perfectly well aware of the sentence you have quoted in which he appeared not to have much affection for Mr. Tyler's views. But what are the facts? Allow me to quote a leading literary journal, of April 30, 1898, which says:—

In spite of Mr. Wyndham's early protestations of neutrality on page ix., he throws the whole weight of his opinion into the scale of the Herbert-Fytton theory.

Was I not justified, then, in saying that Mr. Wyndham was a supporter of Mr. Tyler, and that the Pembroke theory was not "moribund" in his pages?

Mr. Sidney Lee has also played a peculiar part in this controversy. In 1891, in Vol. XXVI. of the "Dictionary of National Biography," he expressed the opinion that William Herbert was in all probability the "onlie begetter" of the Sonnets. You are quite right in saying that Mr. Lee repudiated this theory in Vol. LI. of the same Dictionary published in 1897. But how did he do it? In his own letter to the Daily News, October 19, 1897, in reply to Dr. Blake Odgers (who, by the way, is also a "vigorous" supporter of the "moribund" theory), he said:—"My article merely summarizes, in the briefest possible way, conclusions which will be set forth in detail in my forthcoming 'Life of Shakespeare.'" This formal repudiation, without evidence, of the Pembroke theory in 1897 was scarcely a matter to be observed with such seriousness as the convincing arguments in the volume which followed. I therefore claim that Mr. Lee was only a definite anti-Tylerian from the time that his volume was published last November—after my own articles were written.

May I add one word on the danger, if not the folly, of reading into an author's works personal confessions? Shakespeare is condemned as a libertine on the strength of the Sonnets, Lamb as a drunkard on the strength of an essay, Tennyson as a woman-hater on the strength of some passages in "The Princess," and so on. I thought Byron's sarcasm on Wordsworth had killed this sort of thing—

They who all view the "idiot in his glory"
Conceive the bard the hero of the story.

I have ventured to raise my protest against conceiving the bards the inevitable heroes of their story. I can only believe that Shakespeare beslavered a handsome man, and shared a mistress with him, when other evidence than the supposed "confession" in the Sonnets is forthcoming.

I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

CUMING WALTERS.

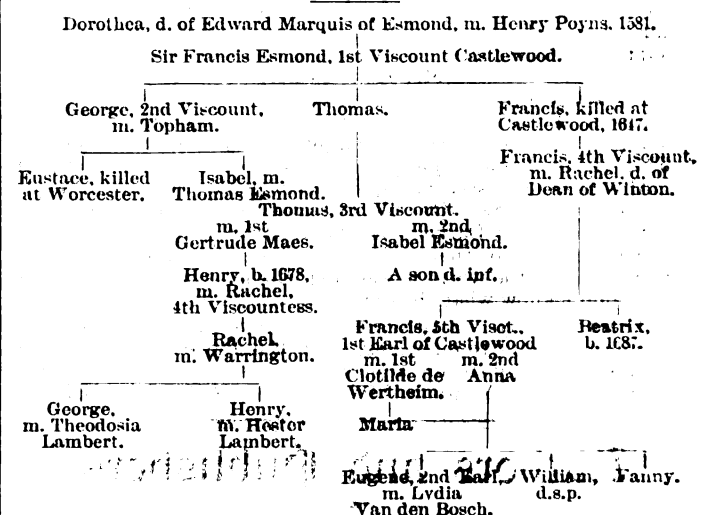

ESMOND AND THE HIGHER CRITICISM.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Perhaps some of your readers may like to see the Esmond pedigree in tabular form.

Your obedient servant,

B.

UNDETECTED PLAGIARISMS.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—The daring individual who affirmed that plagiarism had always been the plague of literature certainly punned neither wisely nor too well. But the veracity of the statement would be difficult to impugn. Every day brings to light fresh instances of literary theft, and practised, too, by well-known authors. For example, how often we hear poor Lisbeth Bede's faith in the saying, "God helps those who help themselves," as forming part of Holy Writ, referred to in illustration of George Eliot's singular insight into such minds as that of Lisbeth. Yet, as a matter of fact, we find this classical misquotation recorded about 100 years before "Adam Bede" was written. It occurs not in any work of fiction, but in a grave, not to say dismal, set of memoirs entitled "Vies intéressantes et édifiantes des religieuses de Port Royal," and published in 1752.

The context is as follows:—M. de Sacy, a prominent member of the Jansenist party, and closely connected with Port Royal, was undergoing imprisonment in the Bastille on account of his theological views. The governor felt, or affected to feel, some concern for his prisoner, and in a friendly manner reproached him with making no effort to obtain freedom through the intercession of influential friends, concluding his admonition with the pious reminder, "Does not God say in the Gospel, 'Help yourself and I will help you'?"

"M. l'Abbé (de Sacy)," continues the biographer, "and M. Desloges (a fellow-prisoner) looked at each other on hearing this new quotation from the Gospel, and, seeing them smile, he asked, 'What! isn't that in the Gospel?'"

Compare this with the passage in "Adam Bede":—

I can understand the text as he's allays a sayin', 'God helps them as helps theirsens'. . . . Well, how'm I to know? It sounds like a text?"

Another and more audacious instance of the same sort, hitherto, we believe, unnoticed, occurs in a work of much later date—namely, "The Christian." In Lord Robert Ure's account of the panic which John Storm had produced by predicting the destruction of London Mr. Hall Caine has drawn largely upon Swift's little-known "True and Faithful Narrative of What Passed in London During the General Consternation." The "general consternation" here referred to was produced, we may observe, by the announcement of that eccentric divine William Whiston—that on a given day and at a given hour the world was to come to an end. I give the original passages from Swift along with Mr. Hall Caine's version of them:—

(Swift.)

I . . . counted at least seventeen who were upon their knees and seemed in actual devotion. Eleven of them, indeed, appeared to be old women of about four score; the six others were men in advanced life, but (as I could guess) two of them might be under seventy. . . . It was remarkable that several of our very richest tradesmen of the city in common charity gave away shillings and sixpences to the beggars who plied about the church doors. . . . Three great ladies, a valet-de-chambre, two lords, a Custom-house officer, five half-pay captains, and a baronet (all noted gamblers) came publicly into a church at Westminster, and deposited a very considerable sum of money in the minister's hands. . . . I forbear mentioning the private confessions of particular ladies to their husbands. (The rest of this passage we find it necessary to suppress altogether.)

(Mr. Hall Caine.)

I counted seventeen people on their knees in the streets—'pon my soul, I did! Eleven old women of eighty, two or three of seventy, and one or two that might be as young as sixty-nine. Then the epidemic of piety in high life too! Several of our millionaires gave sixpence apiece to beggars—were seen to do it, don't you know. One old girl gave up playing baccarat and subscribed to "Darkest England." No end of sweet little women confessed their pretty weaknesses to their husbands, and now that the world is wagging along as merrily as before they don't know what the devil they are to do.

There is always a satisfaction in discovering the weaknesses of persons superior to ourselves, and the above extracts may be of interest to many sincere admirers of the authors whom they concern.

Yours faithfully,

CAMILLA JEBB.

Authors and Publishers.

Messrs. Macmillan and Co. have completed arrangements for the publication of an entirely new edition of the prose writings of Rudyard Kipling. The edition will consist of ten volumes large crown 8vo., which will appear one at a time at short intervals, at the uniform price of 6s. each. The first to make its appearance will be "Plain Tales from the Hills," which may be looked for almost immediately.

The Life of Sir William White is to be written by Mr. Sutherland Edwards, who would be glad to hear from those who possess letters or other documents connected with the subject. Messrs. Cassell and Co. will publish the volume.

A number of conflicting statements have been made about the books on which the late Mr. Wallace, M.P., was engaged at the time of his death. As a matter of fact he had nearly completed his volume on Buchanan for the Famous Scots Series, and had written a good portion of his Reminiscences. Both these books will be taken in hand by Dr. William Wallace, of Glasgow, brother of the late member for East Edinburgh, and will be published in due course.

An interesting volume on English country life of the last century will shortly be published by Messrs. Longmans, called "Passages from the Diaries of Mr. Philip Lybbe Powys, of Hardwick-house, Oxon, 1756-1808." It will be edited by Miss Emily F. Climençon. The same publishers have in the press "A Memoir of the Episcopate of Acton Windeyer Sillitoe, D.D., D.C.L., First Bishop of New Westminster, 1879-1894," by the Rev. Herbert H. Gowan, F.R.G.S., the author of "The Paradise of the Pacific," and other works; and Dean Farrar's new book, of which we have already spoken, entitled "Texts Explained."

Mr. Budgett Meakin is still at work on the proofs of "The Moorish Empire," advertised by Messrs. Sonnenschein for April last. Parts of the book, indeed, have been almost re-written since they were originally set up. It is now hoped that the volume will appear before July. Among its special features are chapters on the origin and growth of diplomatic intercourse between Morocco and Europe, and of the peculiar privileges enjoyed by the "most favoured nations" in the Moorish Empire. Mr. Meakin intends to postpone the appearance of his account of "The Moors" till he has been out again to check some of the details in Fez; but "The Land of the Moors" is announced for the autumn.

An attractive addition to sporting literature is promised by Messrs. Constable, tracing "The History of the Belvoir Hunt" from the year 1720. The author is Mr. T. F. Dale. The story of this hunt is to a large extent the history of the house of Manners, of which the Duke of Rutland is the head. Besides the pedigrees of celebrated hounds, there will be maps showing all the regular meets, the great historic runs, and the country hunted in the year 1841. The illustrations will contain copies from the collections of the Duke of Rutland, Mr. John Welby, and Sir George Whichcote, as well as of rare prints in the British Museum. There will be two editions—one a popular one and another a large-paper one printed on English hand-made paper, and limited to seventy-five copies.

Messrs. Bell have in hand a volume by Lady Dilke dealing with the "French Painters of the Eighteenth Century," a subject of which the authoress has made a special study for some years. It will contain upwards of seventy specimens reproduced in photogravures, half tone and collotype, selected from the works of Watteau, Fragonard, Boucher, Lancret, Pater, and other masters of the time. Several pictures will be included which have never been exhibited in public and have not before been reproduced. The book will be printed at the Chiswick Press, and will be ready in the autumn.

Mr. Grant Richards will publish on June 20 a book of verses by Mr. Harold Begbie, and drawings by Mr. F. Carruthers Gould, to be entitled "The Political Struwwelpeter," an exact copy of the original in the verses, in the drawings, in the printing, and in the binding, in which politics are so simplified that a child may understand them. The ordinary edition is issued at 3s. 6d., but there will be an edition de luxe on Japanese vellum, limited to 250 copies at a guinea net each.

Another book by Dean Farrar of Canterbury, entitled "True Religion," is announced by Mr. S. T. Freemantle. In the preface Dean Farrar will state briefly his views on the present ritual crisis.

Captain Winston Spencer Churchill's book on the recovery of the Sudan, "The River War," will be in two volumes, with thirty-five maps and sixty illustrations from drawings by Lieutenant Angus McNeil. It will not be published until October and will be edited by Colonel Frank Rhodes.

Miss Margaret Thomas, the Australian artist and author, has completed the record of her recent sojourn in the East, under the title "Two Years in the Holy Land and Syria," for which she has made a number of sketches in oils, which are to be reproduced in "three colour work." The book will be published by Mr. Nimmo.

Lord Tennyson is already paying the penalty of his rash eulogy on the local bards of South Australia, in his eloquent inaugural address in Adelaide. Every morning, it is said, he receives numberless fresh odes and sonnets in his honour from as yet unrecognized and unrecorded local songsters. So that he now realizes the horror his father had in opening his morning mail and finding "numberless volumes of fresh verse and never a wholesome line in prose."

We understand that the copy of the Kilmarnock (1786) edition of Burns which belonged to Mr. A. C. Lamb, of Dundee, and which brought such a remarkably high price in Edinburgh last year, is now in the market. An effort, it is said, is being made to dispose of it in America.

Among the prizes which are to be given in the literary section of the National Eisteddfod, to be held at Cardiff during the third week in July, £50 may be claimed by the writer of the best serial story descriptive of Welsh social life or Welsh history. The story is to be written in English, and will appear in the Cardiff Times and South Wales Weekly News. Mr. W. Edwards-Tirebuck and Mr. Ernest Rhys are the adjudicators.

The University of Glasgow possesses a collection of Greek coins unequalled outside of three or four of the great European capitals. In 1781 Dr. William Hunter, the physician, bequeathed to his Alma Mater his cabinet of ancient coins, chiefly Greek, to be used in the manner "most conducive to the improvement of the students" of Glasgow University. For nearly a century this magnificent bequest was comparatively neglected. Thirteen years ago, however, Mr. James Stevenson, of Hailie, near Largs, offered to bear the whole expense of publishing a proper catalogue of the Greek coins in the Hunterian collection: and during the past five years Mr. George Macdonald, M.A., the University Lecturer in Greek, has devoted himself to the task of preparing it. He has completed the first of the three volumes to which the catalogue of the Greek portion is expected to extend. The total number of coins in the Hunterian collection is about 30,000; and about 12,000 are dealt with in this first volume. Mr. Macdonald has adopted the geographical arrangement of Eckhel, as improved and extended by Barclay Head in his "Historia Nummorum." There is an introduction giving an account of the formation of the cabinet by Dr. William Hunter: and Professor James Young, the keeper of the Hunterian Museum, contributes a preface.

Mr. Fisher Unwin will publish Mr. Francis Gribble's "The Early Mountaineers" on Monday.

Messrs. Greening and Co. have in preparation, for their "English Writers of To-day" Series, monographs on "George Meredith," "Thomas Hardy," and "Arthur Wing Pinero," as well as the volumes on "Algernon Charles Swinburne" and "Richard Le Gallienne" already promised.

Further works on Dante, besides those recently mentioned in our columns, will be the "Life," by the Rev. T. F. Hogan, of St. Patrick's College, Maynooth (Methuen), and the second series of Dr. Edward Moore's "Studies in Dante" from the Oxford University Press.

A new and cheaper edition of Mr. Ulick Ralph Burke's "A History of Spain from Earliest Times to the Death of Ferdinand the Catholic" is shortly to be published in two volumes, edited by Major Martin A. S. Hume.

Messrs. Newnes have nearly ready "The Adventures of Louis de Rougemont" in volume form. It will contain forty-six illustrations by Mr. A. Pearce. The next comes in the same firm's 6d. series will be "She," by Mr. Rider Haggard, with a drawing by Mr. Greiffenhagen, and a portrait of the author. This will be followed by Maxwell Gray's "Silence of Dean Maitland."

The New Century Press, Limited, will shortly be issuing a brochure on the subject of "Free-will and Determinism in Relation to Progress" from the pen of Mr. C. J. Melrose, who undertakes to show that determinism is far from being destructive of responsibility.

The Rev. C. Dudley Lampen, whose book "The Queen of the Extinct Volcano" was published last October by the S.P.C.K., has written another story of adventure, entitled "The Stranding of the White Rose," which will be published by the same society in the autumn. The story deals with the wild and desolate north-west coast of Australia.

LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

ART.

Royal Academy Pictures, 1899. 12½ x 9½ in. London, 1899. Cassell, 7s. 6d.

BIOGRAPHY.

Letters of Benjamin Jowett. Arranged and Ed. by Evelyn Abbott, LL.D., and Lewis Campbell, LL.D. 9 x 5½ in., 262 pp. London, 1899. Murray, 16s.

Lady Louisa Stuart. Selections from her Manuscripts. Ed. by the Hon. J. A. Home. 7½ x 5½ in., 308 pp. Edinburgh, 1899. Douglas, 7s. 6d.

Life and Letters of Sir Joseph Prestwich, D.C.L. F.R.S. By His Wife. 9 x 6 in., xiv + 444 pp. London, 1899. Blackwood, 21s.

EDUCATIONAL.

The Odes of Horace. Book II. (Latin Series.) Ed. by Stephen Gwynn. 7½ x 4½ in., 111 pp. London, 1899. Blackie, 1s. 6d.

The Orations of Cicero against Catiline. (Latin Series.) Ed. by C. H. Keene. 7½ x 4½ in., xvi + 204 pp. London, 1899. Blackie, 2s. 6d.

Le Trésor de Monte-Cristo. (Modern Language Series.) Ed. by R. Proper. 7½ x 5 in., 116 pp. London, 1899. Blackie, 1s. 6d.

Matriculation Model Answers Heat and Light. (The University Tutorial Series.) Cr. 8vo., 130 pp. London, 1899. Clive, 2s.

Cæsar de Bello Gallico. Book IV. A Translation. By A. A. Irwin Nesbitt, M.A. (The University Tutorial Series.) Cr. 8vo., 22 pp. London, 1899. Clive, 1s.

Cæsar: Gallic War. Book IV. A Vocabulary and Test Papers. (The University Tutorial Series.) Cr. 8vo., 32 pp. (Interleaved.) London, 1899. Clive, 1s.

A Handbook of Translations. Latin, Part II. 7 x 4½ in., 96 pp. London, 1899. Stanford, 2s.

FICTION.

At a Winter's Fire. By Bernard Capes. 8 x 5½ in., 303 pp. London, 1899. Pearson, 6s.

Orientalism. By William S. Maugham. 8½ x 5½ in., 278 pp. London, 1899. Unwin, 6s.

Florizel's Folly. By John Ashton. Illustrated. 7½ x 5½ in., xii + 308 pp. London, 1899. Chatto & Windus, 6s.

Rosalba. The Story of Her Development. By Olive Pratt Rayner. 8 x 5½ in., 312 pp. London, 1899. Pearson, 6s.

Philip Bennion's Death. By Richard Marsh. 7½ x 5½ in., 240 pp. London, 1899. Ward, Lock, 3s. 6d.

A Marital Liability. By Elizabeth P. Train. 7½ x 5½ in., 375 pp. London, 1899. Ward, Lock, 3s. 6d.

The Experience of Dorothy Leigh. By Frances Home. 8½ x 5½ in., 261 pp. London, 1899. Routledge, 6s.

Both Great and Small. By Arthur E. J. Legge. 8 x 5½ in., 409 pp. London, 1899. Lane, 6s.

Rupert, by the Grace of God. Ed. and Rev. By Dora G. McChesney. 7½ x 5½ in., 355 pp. London, 1899. Macmillan, 6s.

Willowwood. By Esther Miller. 7½ x 5½ in., 293 pp. London, 1899. Harper, 6s.

Stuff o' the Conscience. By Lily Thicknesse. 7½ x 5½ in., 316 pp. London, 1899. Harper, 6s.

The Diary of a Condemned Man. By Alfred H. Fried. Translated from the German by S. Van Straalen. 7½ x 5½ in., 177 pp. London, 1899. Heinemann, 2s. 6d.

A Short Line War. By Merwin Webster. 7 x 4½ in., 334 pp. London, 1899. Macmillan, 6s.

Jesus Delaney. By J. G. Donnelly. 7½ x 5 in., 331 pp. London, 1899. Macmillan, 6s.

In Guiana Wilds. By James Rodway. (Overseas Library.) 7½ x 4½ in., 271 pp. London, 1899. Unwin, 2s.

The Stolen Story. and other Newspaper Stories. By J. L. Williams. 7½ x 5 in., 291 pp. London, 1899. Sampson Low.

Hunger. By Knut Hamsun. Translated by George Egerton. 7½ x 5½ in., x + 312 pp. London, 1899. Smithers, 4s. n.

Henrietta's Wish. 2nd Ed. By Charlotte M. Yonge. 7½ x 5½ in., 300 pp. London, 1899. Macmillan, 3s. 6d.

HISTORY.

Alfred the Great. Chapters on his Life and Times. Ed. by Alfred Bowker. 8 x 5½ in., xii + 260 pp. London, 1899. Black, 5s.

LITERARY.

Matthew Arnold. (Modern English Writers.) By Prof. Saintsbury. 7½ x 5 in., 232 pp. London, 1899. Blackwood, 2s. 6d.

Literary Ideals in Ireland. By J. Eglinton and Others. 9 x 5 in., 88 pp. London, 1899. Unwin, 1s.

A History of Romanticism in the Eighteenth Century. By H. A. Beers. 8 x 6½ in., 455 pp. London, 1899. Kegan Paul, 9s. n.

MISCELLANEOUS.

A Practical Handbook of Elocution. By Rose I. Patry. 7½ x 5 in., 98 pp. London, 1899. Sonnenschein.

The Library Association Year Book for 1899. 9½ x 6 in., 102 pp. London, 1899. H. Marshall, 1s. n.

Book Sales of 1897-98. By Temple Scott. 8½ x 6½ in., 158 pp. London, 1899. G. Bell, 3s. 6d. n.

The Art of Advertising. By W. Stead, Jr. 9 x 5½ in., 151 pp. London, 1899. T. B. Browne, 3s. 6d.

MUSIC.

A Wagnerian Midsummer Madness. By David Irvine. 7½ x 5 in., 343 pp. London, 1899. Grevel, 4s. n.

NAVAL.

Despatches and Letters Relating to the Blockade of Brest, 1803-1805. Vol. I. By John Leyland. 9½ x 6½ in., lxxvi + 369 pp. 1899. Navy Record Society. Subscribers only.

POETRY.

Persephone in Hades, and other Poems. By Tinsley Pratt. 7 x 4½ in., 75 pp. London, 1899. Kegan Paul, 3s. 6d. n.

The Open Road. A Little Book for Wayfarers. By E. V. Lucas. 6½ x 4 in., xiv + 310 pp. London, 1899. Grant Richards, 5s.

POLITICAL.

The Colonies and the Century. By the Hon. Sir J. Robinson, K.C.M.G. 7½ x 5½ in., 128 pp. London, 1899. Macmillan, 3s. n.

The British West Indies and the Sugar Industry. By J. W. Root. 7½ x 5 in., xvii + 168 pp. Liverpool, 1899. Root, 3s. 6d. n.

REPRINTS.

King Henry the Eighth. (The Warwick Shakespeare.) Ed. by D. N. Smith. 6½ x 4½ in., 167 pp. London, 1899. Blackie, 1s. 6d.

The Strange Adventures of a Phaeton. By William Black. (6d. Series.) 8½ x 5½ in., 153 pp. London, 1899. Sampson Low.

Adam and Eve. By Mrs. Parr. 7½ x 5 in., 520 pp. London, 1899. Macmillan, 3s. 6d.

SCIENCE.

Evolution by Atrophy in Biology and Sociology. (The International Scientific Series.) By Jean Demour and others. Translated by Mrs. C. Mitchell. 7½ x 5 in., 322 pp. London, 1899. Kegan Paul, 5s.

THEOLOGY.

The Book of Judges. (The Book of the Bible.) Ed. by the Rev. H. P. Stewart. 6½ x 4½ in., xxviii + 107 pp. London, 1899. Rivington, 1s. 6d.

Sermons. By Charles Parsons Reichel, D.D., D.Litt. With a Memoir by his Son, H. R. Reichel. 7½ x 5 in., xcvi + 421 pp. London, 1899. Macmillan, 6s.

Conferences on the Holy Spirit. Translated from the French of Mgr. Landriot by the Rev. T. T. Carter. 6½ x 4½ in., 253 pp. London, 1899. Mowbray.

What Shall We Think of Christianity? By W. A. Clarke, D.D. 7½ x 5 in., 157 pp. Edinburgh, 1899. T. & T. Clark, 2s. 6d.

TOPOGRAPHY.

Ripon Cathedral. By the Ven. W. Danks, M.A. Illustrated. 7 x 4½ in., 68 pp. London, 1899. Isbister, 1s. n.

Lichfield Cathedral. By the Rev. Canon Bodington. Illustrated. 7 x 4½ in., 66 pp. London, 1899. Isbister, 1s. n.

TRAVEL.

On the South African Frontier. By W. H. Brown. 8½ x 6 in., xxii + 430 pp. London, 1899. Sampson Low, 12s. 6d. n.

Japan in Transition. By Stafford Hansome. 9 x 6 in., xix + 330 pp. London, 1899. Harper, 15s.

Literature

Edited by H. D. Traill.

Published by The Times.

No. 88. SATURDAY, JUNE 24, 1899.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
Leading Article—Young Lives	645
"Among my Books," by Prof. Courthope, C.B.	658
Poem—"The Wife of a Poet," by "Adrian Ross"	665
Parodies—1.	659
Reviews—
Letters of Benjamin Jowett	646
Henrik Ibsen. Bjørnstjerne Bjørnson	648
Matthew Arnold	648
Lady Louisa Stuart	649
A History of French Art	650
Sacred Songs of the World	650
Francesco Crispi	651
School Histories—
Winchester—Shrewsbury	651, 652
Shakespeariana—
The Religion of Shakespeare—Caliban—Shakespeare's Hand-writing—A French History of Richard the Second—Stories from Shakespeare	652, 653
Science—
The Science of Life—Stellar Astronomy—Stratigraphical Geology—Text-book of Geology	653, 654
The Dialogues of Athanasius and Zaccheus, and of Timothy and Aquila	654
Other New Books—
The Open Road—Book Sales—Miscellanies—The Political Struwwelpeter—The Colonies and the Century—Roman Africa—An American Cruiser in the East—A Russian Province of the North—La Colonisation Française—Ecclesiastical Pamphlets—Lichfield Cathedral—Ripon Cathedral—Our Daily Fare—Sewage Analysis	655, 656, 657
Fiction—
Gerald Fitzgerald the Chevalier—In Vain—Postle Farm—An Old Rogue's Tragedy—The Secret of Sorrow—Mistress Content Craddock—The Stolen Story, and other Newspaper Stories—The Waters of Caney Fork—Strong Hearts—Tattle Tales of Cupid—The Puritans—Castle Cwrgas—The Failure of the Wanderer—A Dream of Fame—Lally of the Brigade	665, 666, 667
Recent French Fiction	667
Notes on the Dickens Sale [Mr. F. G. Kitton]	668
Correspondence— Mme. Bernhardt's Hamlet—English Hexameters (Mr. T. S. Omond)—"And Shall Trelawny Die?"—David, Earl of Huntingdon—Thackeray's Esmond	669, 670, 671
Notes	646, 661, 662, 663, 664
Authors and Publishers	671, 672
List of New Books and Reprints	672

YOUNG LIVES.

It may seem singular, if not outrageous, for a literary paper to exclaim against literary men for taking themselves and each other, and their own work and each other's work, too seriously. The case, however, is one of those in which excess of virtue tends to become a vice; and the tendency has seldom been more apparent than it is, in certain quarters, at the present time. And, of course, human nature being what it always has been, it is in the case of the younger men of letters that the symptoms are exhibited in their most aggravated form. Instead of going on diligently with their own work, dreaming their own dreams, and completing their own education, some of them seem to have fallen into the habit of writing each other's lives, composing elaborate monographs on each other's works, and anticipating posterity's estimate of each other's genius. A few weeks since, we noticed a biographical eulogy of Mr. Kipling which would hardly have been inadequate if it had been presented as a biographical eulogy of Shakespeare. It has been announced that a second monograph on the works of Mr. Kipling is being prepared by Mr. Richard Le Gallienne. A life of Mr. Le Gallienne himself by a writer whose name we do not recollect has been advertised; and other lives of other young writers have been promised by the publishers. The facts, taken together, may be said to constitute a "new situation" in literary affairs; and we confess that it is a situation that we do not like the look of, and one to which we should like to see men of taste oppose a policy of "continuous pressure."

Perhaps the most reassuring feature of the situation is the scornful tone taken towards his flatterer by Mr. Kipling himself. He said, in effect, in a note to the author which the author printed in the book, that "this sort of thing" was better left unprinted until after the man to whom it referred was dead. We shall look, with some interest, to see whether Mr. Le Gallienne, when his turn comes, will be equally blunt and disdainful. If he is, the policy of "continuous pressure" will be in full swing, and we may soon see the "new situation" modified. Otherwise things are likely to go from bad to worse, with the result that a number of respectable writers, who are doing good enough work in their way, will be made ridiculous by extravagant laudation. For, of course, in books of this kind, laudation is bound to predominate, not merely because the courtesies of log-rolling require it, but also in order to justify the existence of the books. It is part of the rules of the game; and, however well the praise may be justified, it is clear that little illumination is to be expected from a critic who is pledged to it from the start.

Nor is the implied contract to flatter the only thing which impairs the value of these biographies. The very proximity of the object drawn is almost certain to derange the perspective of the drawing. Mr. Chamberlain once observed that great men are like mountains—one must see them from a distance in order to realize how great they are. It is also true that one must see hills, and little men, from a distance in order to realize how small they are; while in the case of the literary man (great or little) of thirty or thereabouts the metaphor is capable of a further development. If the man of letters of that age is to be compared to any sort of eminence, it should be to a mountain of volcanic origin which the internal fires are still engaged in throwing up. It is the destiny of some volcanoes to remain, like Etna, permanent features of the landscape; while it is the doom of others to disappear, like that Ferdinanda Island, which sprang up in the Mediterranean in 1831 and had declined into a sand-bank by 1832. So with literary men. Some of them whose names are not very often in the papers will go on from strength to strength; others—including, perhaps, some of the noisiest—will find that their true level, like that of Ferdinanda Island, is beneath the waters of oblivion. At any rate, it seems wiser to wait till the period of active eruption is over before undertaking to measure their height and determine their stability.

It is not only because these biographies of our junior men of genius are so apt to be misleading that objection should be taken to them. So far as that goes, Populus vult decipi. A more serious consideration is that of the probable effect of these pompous panegyrics, and this grave recording of the most commonplace events of their lives, upon the junior men of genius themselves. It can hardly be a happy or a healthy one. It is not merely that it may tempt them to pose—a man often poses for the fun of the thing and goes on doing good work all the same—nor that it makes them think too much of themselves. So long as good work is done, one can forgive the workman from being keenly alive to its merits. The real danger is that it will engender that self-consciousness which is so destructive of a man's capacity for doing good work. The true artist has no interest in his personality that is comparable with his interest in his art. It is the beauty of the work of art, and not the applause that he may get for it, that attracts him; and so long as he can continue in this frame of mind, he is also likely to continue to improve. But to write books about him when he is just at the beginning of his life's work, drawing his attention to the fact that his personality and his beautiful soul are the things that really interest the public, is the surest way to prevent him from ever coming to any good. It arrests growth, much as you arrest the growth of a flower by constantly pulling it up by the roots to see how it is getting on.

Fortunately, however, this last analogy is not complete. The flower is entirely at the mercy of the gardener, whereas, as Mr. Kipling has proved, it is within the power of a junior man of genius to snub a premature biographer. We heartily commend his admirable example to others. If they follow it, their biographers will be comparatively powerless to harm them. If, on the other hand, they allow themselves to be persuaded to take their "young lives" too seriously, we are convinced that the artistic output of their later lives will suffer—a result for which the temporary satisfaction of their vanity will hardly be a sufficient compensation.

Mr. Justice Cozens Hardy, in deciding last week the case of the Clarendon Press v. Messrs. Marshall and Messrs. Gill, probably did not anticipate the storm which his decision has since aroused, or realize that he would be accused of putting the study of the New Testament into the hands of an exclusive and privileged body. The defendants' manual quoted largely from the Revised Version so as to show the changes made by the Revisers. All that the University Press complained about was that they had not first obtained the necessary licence to quote. No new or unfamiliar point of law was involved. The Revisers' translation of the Scriptures enjoys copyright under the same statute which bestows copyright upon

Mr. Gladstone's translation of Horace and Messrs. Butcher and Lang's translation of Homer. The only difference is that the copyright in the Revised Version is perpetual because it happens to be the property of the University of Oxford. All that the University has done, however, has been to suppress a cram book for the compilation of which their property had been employed without their leave. This is hardly to be accounted an irreparable wrong to scholarship or to the study of divinity, and students will not suffer very much if they have to look at the Revised Version itself and find out the differences for themselves.

The School World, Messrs. Macmillan's excellent new monthly educational magazine, is devoting a series of articles to "The Schools of Public Men," and in its June issue it arrives at men of letters. The list can hardly be called complete—the Eton list, for instance, omits Mr. Balfour, Sir Frederick Pollock, and Mr. Robert Bridges—but it is accurate enough for general purposes. The data supplied do not, it must be confessed, give a very high place to the best known public schools, and certainly lend support to the complaint that they turn out boys too much on a pattern and cramp the imagination. The poets and novelists, as well as the critics, come as a rule from the smaller schools; a great number, too, hail from the Scotch universities, and many have studied on the Continent. We should like to see the School World follow up its lists with a classification of different branches of literary work and departments of public life, and the numbers of successful men the different schools have supplied to each. This would be a useful undertaking in these days of educational controversy.

In his address at the Women's Institute on "Modern American Writers," Mr. Hamlin Garland declared that the habits of the people made it impossible for the decadent novel to have any vogue in the United States. Though it is true that, in the days of the Chap Book, Chicago tried hard to make culture hum decadent tunes, the lecturer was probably right upon the whole. The decadent novel, as we know it in England, is, in the main, the bitter cry of women clamouring for something which they think they ought to have and do not see their way to get; and, if what one hears is correct, such women do not flourish on American soil. The American woman knows what she wants, and also knows how to get it. What she wants is "a good time," and if her husband does not provide it for her at any sacrifice of his personal convenience, he is guilty of "mental cruelty," and can be divorced amid the applause of the community. Consequently it is too much to expect the long-drawn wail of stories of the decadent school to awake any answering echo in her bosom.

Reviews.

Letters of Benjamin Jowett, M.A., Master of Balliol College. Arranged and Edited by Evelyn Abbott, M.A., LL.D., and Lewis Campbell, M.A., LL.D. 9 x 5½ in., 202 pp. London, 1899. Murray. 16/-

It was objected in some quarters to the "Life and Letters of Jowett," published two years ago by Mr. Evelyn Abbott and Mr. Lewis Campbell, that it was overweighted by its correspondence. From their present volume, which they describe as "merely a supplement" to the biography, we are able to form some idea of the mass of valuable epistolary matter from which they had to select. These "Letters of Benjamin Jowett" number several hundred and very few of them could be spared. We are inclined to think, indeed, that they surpass in interest the collection included in the former volume. This applies in especial to the correspondence classified under the head of "European Politics" and consisting mainly of letters addressed by the late Master of Balliol during a period of many years to his old pupil Sir Robert Morier, who, after having filled many minor posts in the diplomatic service, successively represented this country, as Minister or Ambassador, at Lisbon, Madrid, and St. Petersburg. This correspondence forms, in the words of the editors, "the record of a watchful, unwearying friendship, outspoken yet sympathetic, to which it would be difficult to find a parallel." We may add that it discloses a side of Jowett's character and a range of his intellectual interests which will for most readers possess the charm of complete novelty, and without which their previous conception of him would have been signally incomplete. In these letters he discourses of high international politics with a confidence of speculation and prediction which few probably save his intimates suspected him of entertaining, and on which events, it must be admitted, have in many instances supplied a somewhat pathetic comment. That in some respects they are calculated to heighten one's estimate of the writer's general ability is not to be denied. They are full of shrewd and sound reflections on the European situation—just such reflections, in fact, as we might expect from one who had studied the relations of States in the school of Thucydides; and here and there, as in the remarks made as long ago as 1877 on a British annexation of Egypt, they display flashes of real political prescience. But on the whole the final impression left by them is that of the dangers which beset the academic intellect theorizing in vacuo on a science so desperately inexact as that of international politics. It is rather disconcerting for instance to come across a piece of prophecy like the following delivered about the time of the Eastern Question in the autumn of 1876:

Russia may be bankrupt and scattered now, but ten years hence with a railroad and a fleet on the Black Sea she will be immensely increased; she will have her seat of Empire at Constantinople and will be mistress of the Mediterranean east of Italy. . . . Whether Bismarck will move or not is the question of the moment. Bismarck is master of the situation because he is able and probably willing to act.

The action or inaction of Bismarck was, as we all now know, predetermined by the fact that Russia had been guaranteed the neutrality, if not the support, of the other two empires up to a certain point in her anti-Turkish adventure, and that beyond that point she was to be left to get what she could out of England. This of course Jowett could not know; but then, without "knowing," why "prophecy"? Sir Robert Morier's correspondent, however, in spite of his hazardous guesses at the future, is really better worth listening to when, as above, he is simply indulging his natural taste for political speculation. Much else in these letters is, in fact, only "common form" of the party to which he belonged, and it is curious to trace in it all the pseudo-democratic Whiggery at home and superstitious belief in military Cæsarism abroad which characterized that singular political product, the Palmerstonian Liberal of the middle century. Jowett describes himself as "much struck" with the Napoleonic "Idées" and thus writes of their author:—

He is not scrupulous, and perhaps his Court may be a mass of immorality and his Ministers dishonest jobbers, but he is the only man who sees the end many moves on [as far as Sedan?] and understands not only France, but Europe and the times. His programme seems to me to be a Kingdom of Italy, an Empire of Germany, probably an extension to Belgium and the Rhine (if at any juncture it can be done without the risk of a European war), free trade, influence in the Mediterranean, with more distant visions of resettling Hungary and Spain.

The Kingdom of Italy was almost in sight when this was written (Sept., 1860), but of all the rest of the ambitious programme, the "extension to Belgium and the Rhine" in all probability summed up the whole Napoleonic policy, and in the former of these enterprises the history of the Benedetti Treaty was to exhibit the object of Jowett's admiration as the easy dupe of Bismarck.

In 1877 he writes:—

It is certain France will go to war with him [Bismarck] in two or three years' time, and therefore he is perhaps justified in anticipating, or rather would be so if there were not a way out of war by giving up Lorraine.

But a little later on he adds:—

It is possible also that the pride of France will be satisfied with nothing but retaliation on the Rhine. War is more and more an affair of money, and France is yearly becoming richer and Germany poorer perhaps.

If Bismarck engages in war with France "he will probably fail." But in any case Jowett "is inclined to think that England, whether it be prudent or not, will be forced into the war"; and he goes on to commit himself to the simply amazing proposition that not only Ireland but, of all nations in the world, "Scotland" would be "ready to join as one man for France, and the High Church party, and the upper classes have also a strong sympathy with the French." And here again is a strange echo of the talk so often heard at that day about England and the English spirit:—

John Bull is old and very fat, fonder of talking than of moving about. . . . He has no clear idea of what he would do, nor ever can have, for his brain is full of cross currents—love of money, national vanity, a speech of Gladstone or Bright. The monied classes, and those who fear political change, are generally for peace; the newspapers, like the Army and Navy, upon the whole for war, because it is for their own interest.

It would be kinder, perhaps, to Jowett's memory to discontinue these extracts. One piece of unwritten "ancient history," however, is too interesting not to be cited:—

A friend of mine, Mr. Keene of Swyncombe, has the papers of his great uncle, Sir Benjamin Keene, who was the English Ambassador in Spain in the reigns of George I. and George II. Among these papers is a letter from Lord Chatham offering to give up Gibraltar if the Spaniards would make war on France and assist in retaking Minorca. The Spanish Ambassador was an Irishman named Wall: the negotiation went off; but the fact of Chatham having offered it is very curious. I read the letter and the answer, marked "Most Secret."

The "miscellaneous" letters are full of the characteristic attraction of Jowett's epistolary style, which, indeed, possessed many of the merits of the best letter-writers—ease, naturalness, and a happy mixture of the literary and colloquial. The letters which have aroused most interest and been most frequently quoted are those in which with singular penetration and breadth of sympathy he discusses the character of the first Lord Westbury. One side of the ex-Chancellor—his weakness—is, no doubt, well observed: though it has certainly escaped the notice of the superficial observer in general:—

What an extraordinary man: he is gifted with the greatest power of speech I have ever known. He is one of the kindest of men, and one of the weakest, very sensitive and always wanting sympathy. But this the world will never understand, nor should I mention it except to a person who understands human character. A weak man of extraordinary abilities is always misrepresented, especially if he has, like Lord Westbury, uncommon courage and self-reliance. (Is not this partly the story of Louis Napoleon?) I believe that if he had ever had a real friend in life he might have been one of the greatest men of his time.

The mutual liking of Jowett and Lord Westbury is, on the "two-of-a-trade" principle, a little surprising, since both were masters in their various ways of a peculiarly incisive and sententious form of sarcasm, though no doubt the lawyer used it considerably more often than the divine. One would like to have been present at a conversation between them when both men were on their mettle.

DR. BRANDES ON IBSEN.

Henrik Ibsen. Björnstjerne Björnson. Critical Studies. By George Brandes. 9 x 6 in., xvi. + 171 pp. London, 1899. Heinemann. 10/- n.

This volume is not merely interesting in itself, but it is valuable as an indication of the advance of Ibsen's reputation among cultivated persons throughout Europe. After a youth of struggle and misapprehension, after an early middle life only partly appreciated even in his native country, the Norwegian playwright has lived on to see himself extremely distinguished in every division of the globe. Observed from this point of view only, the career of Ibsen is a romance of literary life, and it is this progressive element in the development of his fame which is particularly insisted upon in the work before us. Three times—in 1866, in 1882, in 1898—Dr. George Brandes, the most authoritative critic of North-Eastern Europe, concentrated his attention on the work of Ibsen as it had at that time revealed itself. The present volume is made up of these three successive appreciations. We recollect no critical study, of equal gravity and importance, which has come into existence in like conditions. The triple essay is, as Mr. Archer justly points out in his introduction, "not a focussed appreciation of the whole of Ibsen by the whole of Brandes . . . but a contemporaneously-noted record of the ever-developing relation, throughout more than thirty years, of these two remarkable minds." These words suggest another consideration of value—namely, that the book is as important as a revelation of the methods of Dr. Brandes as of those of Ibsen himself.

The translation of this book has been performed by Mr. William Archer, whose competence is confessed. He has prefixed an introduction, from which we have already quoted a few words; this aims at providing a brief guide to the successive publications of Ibsen, which it divides into three lists, those issued before 1867, those between that date and 1881, and those since 1882. These lists, and Mr. Archer's remarks upon them, will be found very useful; but we do not know why, except by a pardonable inadvertence, Mr. Archer has omitted from the second of them the Digte ("Poems") of 1871, which should come between "The League of Youth" (1869) and "Emperor and Galilean" (1873). This volume of occasional lyrics holds a place in the development of Ibsen's mind with regard to art and man, which Mr. Archer, we are sure, would be the last to underrate. We are glad that Mr. Archer refers to the poems of Dr. Brandes himself, which were first collected last year, and which deserve attention from all his admirers, although they reveal no strictly poetic endowment in the illustrious critic.

We commend Dr. Brandes' triple study of Ibsen to all those who have preserved an open mind in presence of the great Norwegian dramatist. There is no question that the appreciation of Ibsen in this country, if it was at one time furthered, has long since been merely disturbed and bewildered by the way in which a certain class of his English admirers have made him a pretext for the furtherance of their own fads. Women's rights and vegetarianism, anti-vivisection and free love, and heaven knows what else that is revolutionary and tiresome, have been marshalled behind the passive figure of this unfortunate old gentleman. All this must have had the advantage of making him talked about, and therefore of securing him readers, but it has brought him serious and unmerited discredit. Those who have read Ibsen himself, while neglecting what Mr. Punch once called "the Ibscene," know how entirely the sectarian treatment of his works misrepresents them. Dr. Brandes, at all three stages of his inquiry, wrote in entire unconsciousness of the English propaganda, the striving and crying of the Ibsenite axe-grinders. What we receive from him, therefore, is a purely literary, and therefore exclusively legitimate, examination of the works themselves, in relation to one another and to the masterpieces of previous literature. We do not always find ourselves in unison with Dr. Brandes in his judgments, which are never those of a blind admirer, but we must acknowledge them to be always luminous and always sane.

Perhaps in order to eke out the book in its English form, there has been added to the critical triad of studies on Ibsen an essay on Björnson, published by Dr. Brandes in 1882. Mr. Archer excuses the disproportion between the treatment of the one poet and of the other by saying that the last seventeen years of Björnson's life have been less interesting to the student of literature than to the politician. Yet we cannot help recollecting that they have produced in drama "Over Ævne" and "A Gauntlet" and "Geography and Love," and in prose fiction "Flags are Flying" and "In God's Way," "Mother's Hands," and "Dust," to name no others. It seems difficult to form a general idea of the work of Björnson if we are to ignore all this his latest activity. Hence, although Dr. Brandes' remarks, especially on the effect produced on early readers by the peasant romances, have considerable value, we are not able to think this study quite worthy to rank with the extremely masterly and complete triple appreciation of Ibsen.

POET AND CRITIC.

Matthew Arnold. By George Saintsbury. (Modern English Writers). 7½ x 5½ in., vi. + 232 pp. London, 1899. Blackwood. 2/6

"Modern English Writers," the series just commenced by Messrs. Blackwood with the monograph before us, is the latest of that numerous family which was founded some twenty years ago by the "English Men of Letters." Professor Saintsbury's volume on Matthew Arnold ushers it into the world under the fairest auspices. Acting on the undeniably sound principle which he lays down in his preface, and which is peculiarly applicable to his special subject, he has given the reader what is much more of a critical study than a biography of the distinguished poet-essayist; and this although he anticipates the objection that he may seem to have discussed Arnold's works and "things literary" in general "too minutely." We can only say that we hope his successors in this series will follow the example which he has set. Now that we have got from "Men of Letters" in general down to "Modern Writers," the methods of the trained critic are more and more needful, and the services of the biographer are less and less in request. We have only to run the eye over the list of promised volumes, which includes the names of Stevenson, Tennyson, Ruskin, George Eliot, Browning, Froude, Thackeray, and Dickens—writers on most of whom we have had memoirs and biographical studies in abundance—in order to recognize the wisdom of the rule which Professor Saintsbury has prescribed to himself. Some of these classics—Tennyson, for example, and Dickens—have already been the subject of elaborate biographies; and of the inward and spiritual lives of nearly all of them we know as much already as we are ever likely to know. The most industrious and fortunate of biographers could do little more than add a few personalities of the “mainly-about-people” kind, and we hardly want a “Modern Writers Series” to do that.

Professor Saintsbury is excellently well suited with the subject he has chosen. A hearty admirer of the poet, yet well “on this side idolatry,” and a genuine appreciator of the merits, despite his often profound dissent from the theories, of the critic, he enjoys also the melancholy but inestimable advantage, shared by only too many of us, of being of an age coeval, so to speak, with that of Arnold’s Muse, so that her earliest utterances appealed to his nascent poetic sensibilities, and his critical faculty matured paulo passu with the development of the poet’s powers. These conditions are, of course, ideally favourable to the attainment, in the fulness of time, of a perfectly judicial attitude of mind; and Professor Saintsbury’s judgment on Arnold’s work as a whole, both in prose and poetry, is eminently sane and well-balanced. On the prose in particular, which is the harder of the two for him to judge quite fairly, he seldom fails to hold the balance with a steady hand. No impartial critic, for instance, can object, we think, to the chapter entitled “In the Wilderness,” with its occasionally severe but always measured animadversions on Arnold’s unfortunate adventures in Biblical exegesis and polemical theology in general; while on the other hand no such critic could complain of any lack of generosity in his recognition of the eminent services rendered by the literary essayist to English letters.

It is in his dealings with the poetry, however, that Professor Saintsbury is most characteristically himself—that is to say, as acute and penetrating in his analysis, as irritating in his occasional moods of dogmatism or flippancy, as interesting and stimulating always, whether we agree with him or not, as his many previous exercises in criticism have taught us to expect. On one page we meet with a really admirable appreciation of the qualities of “Empedocles on Etna,” or an unsparing but conspicuously unprejudiced exposure of the essential weaknesses of “Merope”; on another the jaunty dismissal of “Despondency” as “a pretty piece of melancholy,” which “with a comfortable stool will suit a man well.” But, on the whole, there are fewer flings of this description than sometimes disconcert us in work from the same accomplished but somewhat wayward hand; and the general estimate of the first series of Poems, high as it is, keeps well clear of exaggeration. It is certain, at any rate, that a volume which contained such gems of the purest poetry as “The Scholar Gipsy,” “Mycerinus,” “Sohrab and Rustum,” with its unequalled close, “Isolation,” “A Summer Night,” the “Shakespeare sonnet,” “In Utrumque Paratus,” and the third part of the “Church of Brou”—to name but these—would in any but a period of utter critical decadence have at once raised its author to a place in the first rank of poets; and the age in which such a volume could pass almost unnoticed deserves all the hard things that Professor Saintsbury says of it. To the second series of Poems, published two years later, it is impossible to accord quite such high praise; but they, too, were deserving of a much better fate than they met with, and their reception completed the discouragement which was no doubt the secret of Arnold’s addicting himself for the next twelve years—that is to say, from his thirty-third to his forty-fifth year, an age when the poetic impulse in most men is usually waning, if not altogether extinct—exclusively to prose. We sometimes console ourselves by saying that to this intermission we owe the incomparable “Essays in Criticism,” but our right to that consolation is doubtful. Arnold’s critical work could hardly have lost any of its value by being postponed for another decade, and indeed might possibly during that time have rid itself of some of the whim and “will-worship,” to borrow his biographer’s word, which at present disfigure it; whereas the lyrical Muse, as we all know, declines to “wait.” And it is painful to reflect that a poet of such power and charm should have been deterred by contemporary lack of appreciation from attempting, until it was too late, to add to his too scanty bequest of exquisite verse.

A FRIEND OF SIR WALTER’S.

Lady Louisa Stuart. Selections from her Manuscripts. Edited by Hon. James A. Home. 7½×5¼in., 308 pp. Edinburgh, 1899. Douglas. 7/6

Lady Louisa Stuart has been hitherto known as the granddaughter and, in some sense, the biographer, of Lady Mary Wortley Montagu; and as a friend of Scott’s, one of the few to whom he told the secret of the Waverley Novels. We are not sure that the present volume will increase her reputation. The fact is that she was really nothing more than a very cultivated and intelligent old lady who happened to be daughter of George the Third’s first Prime Minister Bute, the most unpopular Minister of the eighteenth century, and granddaughter of its most remarkable woman, as well as an intimate friend of the most popular author of the nineteenth. She also lived to a very unusual age, which always give people who retain their faculties a rather unreal importance. But with all the desire that every one must feel to think pleasant things of a charming old lady, who presents herself to us armed with such powerful introductions, we must in mere honesty face the plain truth about her. And there is no doubt about what that is. Lady Louisa Stuart is not a figure that can stand alone. It is due to her memory to mention that she seems to have felt this herself, for the only thing she ever consented to publish was the sketch of her grandmother, and to that she consented very unwillingly. One is glad that she yielded on that point; but, for the rest, it is proof of her good sense that she steadily resisted the flatterers who are always ready to persuade “persons of quality” that the compliments of society may be taken as a foretaste of the serious judgment of the public at large. The present volume consists of a memoir of John, Duke of Argyll, and his family, written by Lady Louisa for her friend Lady Scott (wife of Admiral Scott, not of the poet), a few new letters to and from Sir Walter, and a couple of tales in verse, called the “Fairies’ Frolic” and the “Diamond Robe,” each of which is accompanied by a somewhat lengthy and very discursive introductory note. The Argyll Memoir, which occupies about half the book, is sufficient proof of what we were saying just now. Lady Louisa interests us when she is writing to Scott or gossiping about her grandmother, because anything at first hand about Scott or Lady Mary is secure of our interest. But she has not got the gift which made her grandmother one of the great company through whose casual touch the most uninteresting personages are given an interest which is not their own. And so there will not be very many outside the descendants of these ladies who will care for so many details about the nursery affairs or the love affairs of Jane, Duchess of Argyll, and her daughters. The Duke is, indeed, in a different position; but of him we do not get so much, and, indeed, would gladly have had more. He is the Duke of the incomparable scenes in "The Heart of Midlothian"; and how more than gratefully would we give all that we are told here about the dull "Jane," whom he so strangely made his Duchess, for one more half-hour between him and "Jeanie." Of the daughters, the only one of any interest is Lady Mary Coke, and she is of interest only for her curious matrimonial adventure, and for the amazing vanity which made her imagine Maria Theresa's main occupation was to bribe servants to poison her and postboys to drown her! By far the most amusing page in the book is Lady Louisa's delightful account of the story, as told by Horace Walpole to Lady Bute, of his being called out of bed at five in the morning to receive Lady Mary, who came to consult him under the terrible misfortune of losing her courier, who had been seduced from her service by the Empress in order that she might be conveniently assassinated on the road between Paris and Calais!

Lady Louisa was no poetess, and her verses are of no importance. The note to the "Fairies' Frolic" gives a curious picture of Mrs. Montagu and the famous bluestocking assemblies. What is of most real value in the book is the new letters, four of Scott's and eight or ten of Lady Louisa's. Sir Walter's are delightful, of course, with the old ring of humour and manliness and simplicity about them, and, here and there, a touchingly beautiful allusion to the sorrows of his old age; and Lady Louisa's are pleasant, interesting, excellent letters. Of them we could not easily have too many; nor ever enough of Sir Walter's. So that this part, at least, of Mr. Home's volume needs no justification.

FRENCH ART.

A History of French Art. By Rose G. Kingsley
9x5½ in., 517 pp. London, New York, and Bombay, 1899.
Longmans. 12/6 n.

Miss Kingsley is already favourably known both in Paris and London as a brilliant lecturer on the French pictures and painters of the nineteenth century. In the present volume she treats a larger subject matter, including in her survey French architecture and sculpture as well as French painting, while its time area, compendiously expressed on the title page, is from 1000 to 1899 A.D. She tells us that the scheme of the book is due to the suggestion of M. Antoine Barthélemy, who has contributed to two of its most interesting chapters, particularly that entitled "The French race and soil." Here we have a careful and minute analysis of the racial elements which enter into the composition of the modern Frenchman. The Roman, the Gaul, the Frank, the Burgundian, the Norman, the Goth—each has contributed some element to the French character, but the resultant note is given as the keen artistic sense which manifests itself in every part of France. To every factor in the problem full justice is done, except to one, and that one, as we cannot but think, counts for a good deal in the artistic life of France of to-day. There is no mention of the considerable tincture of Jewish blood which, since the days of Louis XIV., has passed into the national life.

Of course, in a book dealing with so many and such large subjects, a certain inequality of treatment must be expected. The architecture of France cannot be adequately treated of within the limits the writer has prescribed for herself, and, in consequence, the architecture prior to the Renaissance has to be dealt with summarily in some dozen pages. But Miss Kingsley has managed to collect for us the names of most of the earlier architectural sculptors, mostly Flemings, who, when sculpture ceased to be anonymous—that is, at the beginning of the fourteenth century—executed those superb monuments of which the Philippe le Hardi and the Puits de Moise, at Dijon, are the most universally famous. It is interesting to remember that when Sluter executed these noble works Donatello was in his cradle.

Miss Kingsley rightly protests against the theory that the French Renaissance was a movement due to the invasion of Italian artists and workmen, but we cannot but think that, in her natural desire to insist on French originality, she underrates the influence of Italian ideas in sending medieval France "to seek after the springs of sweetness in the Hellenic world."

The chapter in which she discusses the effect of the Revolution is most interesting, and her verdict is that it conferred on Art a fourfold benefit. It gave liberty to artists—liberty for the free exercise of their profession. It created the Museum of the Louvre, and art galleries and schools in the provinces. It inaugurated, by the hand of Lenoir, a museum of the History of French Architecture and Sculpture. Lastly, it

Laid the foundations on which the admirable administration of Fine Arts in France to-day has been developed—a system so perfectly organized, so public spirited, so wisely generous, as to serve for a model which other nations might copy with enormous advantage both to artists and the public at large.

We have no space to follow Miss Kingsley in her elaborate sketch of the art production of France since the Revolution. She passes in review all the great names of the various schools. David and the Classics, Géricault and the Romantics, the old landscape painters, Millet and the peasant painters, the military, the genre, and the portrait painters, the religious and decorative painters, and the impressionists. Of course, with such a method, it was inevitable that some of the grands silencieux should have too little attention, and some of the tapageurs should receive too much. Some ten lines to Pointelin, twenty to Degas, and five pages to Courbet seem hardly to meet the justice of the case. But, as Miss Kingsley says in her preface, "life is short," and she has written a useful and compendious treatise on a truly gigantic subject.

A RELIGIOUS ANTHOLOGY.

Sacred Songs of the World. Translated from One Hundred and Twenty Languages. Edited by H. C. Leonard,
M.A. 8x5½ in., xx.+223 pp. London, 1899. Stock. 6/-

Yet another anthology, and of a new kind. The editor here aims not at collecting the finest religious poems of all languages, nor those which most closely resemble Christian thought, but at choosing one or two characteristic pieces in each case. He hopes in this way to give a general view of the religious aspirations of men, though some of the verse may be poor poetry: so at least we understand from his preface, and the book, as a whole, answers to his conception. It has, however, some obvious failings. The finest religious poems in the world are the Psalms and parts of the Prophets of Israel; yet we find ancient Israel represented only by one passage from "Isaiah the Younger," which Mr. Leonard has put into blank verse. He might fairly answer that the Old Testament is in every hand; yet no selection of religious verse can be complete without it. Mr. Leonard would have done better to omit the Old Testament frankly, because it is impossible to point to any one passage as being the best of all when there are so many of the best. It is impossible to deny that he has spoiled the passage of Isaiah, which might just as well have been given in the majestic version we know. Mr. Leonard cannot even plead a consistent plan, for a few pages on we find a prose prayer from the Hebrew of Gamaliel II. The hymns from Hebrew other than Biblical, however, are quite in place; they are not easily accessible, and will be new to most readers.

The difficulty of compiling such a selection, and yet keeping it within bounds, is so great that we fear it is impossible. If only the great literary languages were included, the thing might be done; and then we might hope for a more adequate selection from Greek and Latin. But Mr. Leonard gives hymns from a number of obscure Indian tribes, frankly materialistic and of small interest in themselves; and there are many similar tribes, Asiatic, African, and American, which are unrepresented. The classical languages are represented only by a Greek hymn to the Barth, and a passage from Seneca. But if Seneca, why not Aratus? Seneca, too, most certainly does not represent the average Roman beliefs and aspirations; the religious piety of Rome is seen more truly (such as it was) in those old scraps of hymns in Varro, or the Song of the Arval Brethren. These would have made an interesting parallel with the Toda and his cow or the Khond and his plow. If a Spanish epitaph, or elegy, is admitted, why not a few of the pathetic epitaphs of the Greek Anthology? Take German, again: a character sketch of a good Bishop and the Archangels' song from Faust are alone selected. Might we not expect something of Luther's, say Ein feste Burg? Goethe can hardly be said to give voice to the religious aspirations of the German race. From literary English we have none but Chaucer's Good Parson and Pope's Universal Prayer. The former ought, we think, to have been ruled out, together with the German Good Bishop; Pope's hymn is welcome, but why not Whittier's hymn of tolerance, and the splendid opening to In Memoriam? Many other criticisms of the like sort might be added. And finally, references should have been given to the printed source of each hymn.

The book, then, is by no means an ideal anthology; but it is distinctly interesting. Its faults, after all, are chiefly faults of omission, and we have already acknowledged the difficulty of the task which Mr. Leonard set before him. There are some really fine hymns in this volume. The hymn of St. Columba is beautiful, and rendered in pretty rippling verse. Another charming piece is the Penitential Cry of Ephraem the Syrian. The Soul's Anchor, a seventeenth-century hymn from the Manx, is strong and dignified. Fine, striking thoughts are to be found in plenty, not only in Europe and Asia but sometimes among the uncivilized tribes of the earth. Such is the touching Dirge for a Child which Gill brought from Polynesia. There are many pieces in the collection which ought to be in our hymn-books, instead of the sentimental trash we so often see there. We recommend it to the notice of compilers.

CRISPI.

Francesco Crispi. By W. J. Stillman, L.H.D.
8½ x 5½ in., 287 pp. London, 1899. Grant Richards. 7/6

In his opening chapter Mr. W. J. Stillman is careful to explain that he has never been admitted to the intimacy of the Italian statesman. Hence it happens that this biography is devoid of those personal touches which make biographies live; but it is impartial, judicious, and well-informed. One may read the volume from cover to cover without completely realizing what sort of man Crispi was—or, at all events, without realizing more than that he seldom puts himself out in order to make himself agreeable; but one cannot read any of it without gathering valuable information as to Italian politics. Crispi's alleged megalomania, for example, is well summed up. It

Has only the basis, that he always insisted that Italy should take her position amongst the Powers as a nation of thirty millions of people ought, and that the position which Cavour placed her in should be maintained, as one of the active Powers of Europe, with rights and obligations as to the general condition, under the alternative of declining with Spain and Portugal. The result of the last ten years is to show even him that his was an idle dream. Italy is incapable of any foreign policy but that of a protected Power. Civic virtue is at too low an ebb for the nation to have any active policy. The corruption of personal ambitions has eaten up the general ambition of its Government. . . . Crispi's dream was an idle one, and perhaps his greatest sorrow is to see its disillusion.

This, of course, is just what would have been said of Bismarck, if Bismarck had failed to make a success of his United Germany. How the course of modern history would have been affected if Crispi had been a German and Bismarck an Italian is an interesting speculation. Two points about which the mind of the general reader is somewhat of a blank are lucidly expounded by Mr. Stillman. One of these is Crispi's connexion with the financial crisis, and the other is Crispi's alleged divorce.

The former story is rather a complicated one, but the essence of it is set forth in the following sentences:—

He spoke against the Parliamentary Commission to examine the state of the banks, which led to the Banca Romana crash, not, as the report of the Commission showed conclusively, because he had any personal or corrupt interests involved, but because he saw, as did most others who had no interest or passion in the matter, that the promoters of the step were those who cared more for the weakening of the Monarchy or their personal interests than for the purity of Italian politics, and hoped more from scandal than from reform. Crispi opposed it as likely to produce a scandal which would discredit the country, and proposed in preference the legal reform of the system of banking, and the subsequent unsensational rectification of the condition of the banks.

As regards the alleged divorce, which has also been explained by Mr. W. L. Alden in the Nineteenth Century, Mr. Stillman is equally explicit and informing. The first Madame Crispi was a laundrymaid, to whom the statesman became attached when he was a prisoner in Turin—a circumstance which throws a curious light upon the internal economy of the Italian prisons. She followed him with the Thousand to Sicily in the ambulance service, and he went through a form of marriage with her at Malta. But the ceremony was invalid, even by Maltese law, though Crispi did not know it at the time. So, relations being strained between them, Crispi married another lady who had already borne him a daughter. Mr. Stillman justifies his conduct thus:—

Crispi, like most public men in Italy and the East in general, had only the Eastern idea of sexual morality. To him woman was a mere accessory to existence, for his life was so absorbed by his political passions that they left him practically indifferent to everything else. The only person who, after his early romance, has called out his real affection was his daughter, to whom he has been ready to sacrifice his life and everything in it. To legitimize this daughter he married civilly her mother.

The book is interesting, though its style does not always reach perfection.

SCHOOL HISTORIES.

A HISTORY OF WINCHESTER COLLEGE, by A. F. Leach, F.S.A. (Duckworth's Public School Series, 6s.). Mr. Leach is, at the outset, almost as unsparing of established beliefs as in his book on the state of education in England under Edward VI. The old Wykehamist will be not a little disconcerted to read that William of Wykeham was not the architect of Winchester College, and that only in a modified sense can he be termed the "inventor of public schools." Winchester College, we are told, was no novelty "either in being a collegiate church with a grammar school attached, or in being a preparatory school for a University college, or in the admission of commoners." It was only by virtue of its combination of all these characteristics on a grander scale than had yet been seen that it may be called the first of public schools. In coming to this conclusion Mr. Leach brings to light many points of interest in the history of English educational institutions. He assigns the introduction of grammar schools to Augustine, the apostle of the English, and shows how such a school existed at Canterbury in the year 631 and another at York in 734.

But, whatever Winchester and New College may have owed to earlier foundations, the influence of Wykeham's model upon the schools and colleges of a later date exhibits one of the most striking features in the history of English education. The guiding spirit of Wykeham, which can be traced in almost all the educational institutions of the later Middle Ages, found its noblest expression in the work of Chichele and Waynflete; in the foundation of All Souls' and Magdalen School and College; and in the traditions which Waynflete carried with him from Winchester to Eton. But it was not only in its buildings, establishment, and statutes that Winchester was a model to other foundations. "There can hardly be a doubt," says Mr.

Leach, "that the school of Grocyn, Chandler, Warham took the lead in the introduction of Greek into the curriculum of schools." The records consulted by the indefatigable author are equally favourable to the high example in learning set by the sons of Wykeham in the succeeding centuries. Legend, too, is in agreeable accord with fact. The State visit of Elizabeth to Winchester in 1570 gave rise to the story, "how seeing the picture of the Bibling rod on the school walls she asked one of the boys whether he had experienced its charms, when he replied, like Æneas to Dido in Virgil's second Æneid" :—

Infandum, Regina, jubes renovare dolorem.

Winchester plays an equally important part in the modern development of public schools. Thomas Arnold himself was a Wykehamist, nurtured under the genial and inspiring influence of Dr. Goddard. That Goddard was comparable to Arnold may be gathered from the following touching story :—

The future editor of Thucydides was one day set on to construe a difficult passage in his favourite author, and gave a rendering to which Goddard objected. Arnold ventured to advance one or two arguments in support of his rendering. "I see what you have been reading, Arnold; but you mistake the meaning of the authorities whom you quote." "I don't think I do," returned Arnold sturdily. "Very well," said the headmaster quietly, "then go to your place and we will hear some one who can construe it my way." When school broke up the Doctor retired to his library, and was relating what passed there to a friend when there came a rap, and Arnold entered, looking very crestfallen. "I have come to tell you, sir, that I have found out that I was wrong." "Ay, Arnold," said Goddard, holding out his hand, "I knew you would come."

At no other school are there so many relics still existing to bind the present with the past as at Winchester.

The secret of England's success as a political body lies in its gradual development of the old to meet the ends of the new, instead of making a clean sweep of the ancient to clear the field for the modern. In no sphere of life, in no institution, is this more pronouncedly shown than in this school.

This characteristic of Winchester is best illustrated in the vocabulary known to Wykehamists as "notions." These Mr. Leach has used here and there where they rise naturally from his text, but he has lost one or two opportunities of giving local colour to his narrative by means of them. Thus in writing of the Roundhead occupation of Winchester—which he shows to have been less serious in its results than is commonly believed—he might have shown the significance of the clump of trees overlooking the town from the south-west, known as "Oliver's Battery." In his learned researches into the endowments of the college he mentions "Non Licet Gate" without explaining its picturesque history. Through this gate, which leads from the college meads to the outer world, the unfortunate Wykehamist was "furked" or expelled. Over the gate, according to tradition, his clothes were disdainfully handed to him upon the end of a fork. Hence the term "furk," which is also overlooked by Mr. Leach. In the author's frequent allusions to the Bishop's Palace and the college precincts, the old Wykehamist will look in vain for some mention of "Paradise Lost" and "Paradise Regained," "Arcadia," "Sicily," "Logie," "Salve Diva Potens Corner," "Og, Gog, and Magog." A chapter on "Notions" might even have been introduced to take the place of that entitled a "School of Poets," which serves no purpose but to reveal the nakedness of the land. But if in burrowing in the records of bygone history, Mr. Leach has occasionally overlooked some of the still existing remnants of the past preserved in Winchester "notions," it is, after all, a slight defect in a book which is little less than a treasure-house of important facts, marshalled with impartial acumen and almost unerring accuracy. There is one mistake, however, for which few old Wykehamists will easily forgive Mr. Leach. It is unpardonable to say that the Wykehamists have never been victorious in the Public Schools Racquets Competition, which was won by Winchester in 1889.

ANNALS OF SHREWSBURY SCHOOL, by G. W. Fisher (Methuen, 10s. 6d.).—It has been said that the history of a great public school is the history of its headmasters. This is particularly the case with Shrewsbury, owing to the long tenure of office of many of its headmasters and to the peculiar triple government under which the school was placed by the revised charter of 1877. A system of checks and balances was adopted; St. John's College, Cambridge, appointed the head and second masters, while the Bailiffs of the Town had the power to veto the election on "reasonable grounds," and exercised a joint control with the headmaster over the school property and expenditure. And so it was that the prosperity of the school depended on the strength of the headmaster to hold in check the pretensions of the Bailiffs. In the time of Meighen (headmaster 1583-1635) the Bailiffs resorted to physical force in order to eject the second master, whom they "misliked," but the women of Shrewsbury, who cannot have "misliked" him so much, held the school house for four days and three nights, "effectually resisting all attempts on the part of the Bailiffs to force an entry." Under Challoner (1636-1644) the school numbered as many as 600 boys, but when Shrewsbury fell to the Parliamentary forces Challoner was ejected bonis omnibus exutus, and many of the boys followed him in his subsequent scholastic wanderings. Both the numbers and the reputation of the school now steadily declined, with some assistance from the Bailiffs, who absorbed the school funds in law suits against the school ordinances, until, with Atcherley (1771-1798), the state of things is described as deplorable. Then new ordinances were made and a new governing body appointed by Act of Parliament, and the school received a new lease of life and prosperity with Dr. Butler.

Dr. Butler (1798-1836) ranks with Busby, Keate, and Arnold as a headmaster; by his "example in remodelling our public education" he gave a stimulus "which has since acted on almost all the public schools of the country." He raised the school to its highest pitch of scholarship. His successor, Dr. Kennedy (1836-1866), fully upheld the high reputation of the school, despite a fall in numbers in 1841 owing to the foundations of Cheltenham, Marlborough, and Rossall. Shrewsbury came under the Public School Act of 1868, and three years later received a new governing body. In 1862 the picturesque but dilapidated buildings in the town were deserted, and the school migrated to its present beautiful site at Kingsland. Mr. Fisher gives an interesting account of the school library, which, in 1819, was spoken of as second only to that of Eton. Towards the close of the eighteenth century many books disappeared, and others were mutilated for the sake of the illuminations. Such excursions in libraria by the boys seem to have been frequent; even in Kennedy's time it happened. The illustrious headmaster found a small boy lying in the library surrounded by weighty tomes, with the library ladder on the top of him. "Good God, the poor boy's dead," cried the headmaster; but the boy moved and opened his eyes; "Boy, I'll flog you." Mr. Fisher is at his best in writing of Dr. Butler and Dr. Kennedy, but we regret that he does not give us any of the "Kennedy" legends, for what Jowett was to Balliol Kennedy was to Shrewsbury. The chapter on "School Athletics" is sketchy and is not as good as the rest. Otherwise, the volume is most interestingly written, and, thanks to careful study of all the existing documents relating to school and town, is most exhaustive. All Salopians, past, present, and future, owe Mr. Fisher a large debt of gratitude.

SHAKESPEARIANA.

The character of THE RELIGION OF SHAKESPEARE, chiefly from the Writings of the late Mr. Richard Simpson, M.A., by Henry Sebastian Bowden (Burns and Oates, 7s. 6d.), is sufficiently indicated by Cardinal Vaughan's imprimatur. Like Mr. Pym Yeatman's recent "The Gentle Shakespeare," which made an amusing appearance in the Law Courts, it is a polemical treatise designed to claim the dramatist as a Catholic sympathizer in the religious disputes of his day. The controversy is barren and not a new one; the rehandling of it by Mr. Bowden is due, we suppose, to Mr. Carter's "Shakespeare, Puritan and Protestant." Competent and impartial students have long ago come to the conclusion that Shakespeare is not fairly to be put down as either Catholic or Protestant. As was the case with more than one of the acute Elizabethan thinkers, his speculations ran on lines quite other than those of theological polemic. He takes neither side; if you will, he transcends them both. Nor do we find anything in Mr. Bowden's book or in Mr. Carter's which should reasonably lead to a modification of this opinion. We do not, therefore, propose to follow Mr. Bowden in detail through his attempts to read Catholic philosophy and Catholic ethics into sonnets and plays. Part of the book is his own; the rest is based upon published and unpublished writings of the late Mr. Richard Simpson. Mr. Simpson, as Mr. Bowden says, was an unwearied investigator of Elizabethan literary material. Unfortunately his judgment and his reasoning powers were by no means on a level with his industry. It is with some amusement that we find his editor confessing that "occasionally his interpretations may seem strained and far-fetched, but even then they are interesting as proofs of his ingenuity and research"; for obviously it is not proofs of Mr. Simpson's ingenuity but proofs of the correctness of the thesis which he puts forward that alone could serve Mr. Bowden's purpose. Indeed, the whole argument of the book is vitiated by the constant exercise of an "ingenuity" which consists in saddling Shakespeare in propria persona with opinions put dramatically by him in the mouths of his characters. The diplomatic arguments of Pandolph before King John, the Bishop of Carlisle's fanatical defence of the "divine right" of Richard II., the sentiments of Coriolanus upon the unwashed multitude—what are you to think of a critic who deliberately produces these as containing Shakespeare's own views upon the questions at issue? In the chapter on "External Evidence" we think that Mr. Bowden succeeds in showing the absurdity of Mr. Carter's contention that the list of Warwickshire residents in which John Shakespeare's name occurs contains the findings of a Commission aimed not at Papists but at Puritans. He does not, however, show any reason for doubting the statement of the Commissioners themselves that John Shakespeare's absence from church was due, not to his religious opinions at all, but to the fear of process for debt. With his defence of the forged "spiritual will" of John Shakespeare we cannot agree. He produces no evidence which is independent of the bona fides of the supposed forger himself, John Jordan. Either Mr. Bowden's own scholarship or his printer has served him ill, for we find in the book a number of somewhat amazing verbal errors. "Godstone" appears for "Godstowe," "Symond" for "Symonds," "Factotemi" for "Factotum," "melicent" for "Melicert," "Braun" for "Brandes."

For the Shakespeare Society of New York, always indefatigable in hunting out illustrative material for its publications, Mrs. Eleanor Grant Vickery has translated Rénan's "philosophical drama" of CALIBAN. Prospero takes Caliban with him to Milan, where the monster heads a democratic revolution and deposes his benefactor once more from the Dukedom. The play is interesting as a somewhat cynical pendant to The Tempest, but we should have thought it hardly necessary to translate it.

SHAKESPEARE'S HANDWRITING (Asher) is a pamphlet by Mr. A. Hall, of Highbury, containing facsimiles of two fragments from the manuscript of the play of Sir Thomas More. This manuscript is a theatre copy of the play. Certain passages in it are written upon separate scraps of paper and pasted over some of the original matter which had come under the disapproval of the Master of the Revels. Mr. Hall, following the late Mr. Simpson, thinks that Shakespeare may have been the author of these alterations, and he publishes the facsimile for comparison with Shakespeare's acknowledged handwriting. Mr. Simpson's "ingenious" conjecture does not, however, find favour with the best critics.

The Rev. John Webb's TRANSLATION OF A FRENCH METRICAL HISTORY OF THE DEPOSITION OF KING RICHARD THE SECOND (Bell) was originally published in the "Archæologia for 1823," and is now reprinted by Miss Beale, of the Cheltenham Ladies' College for the benefit of students of Shakespeare's Richard II. The chronicle does not throw much light on the play, for there is no reason to suppose that Shakespeare knew it, but it is, as Miss Beale says, "a very lively and circumstantial account of the period."

In STORIES FROM SHAKESPEARE, written and illustrated by M. Surtees Townesend (Warne, 6s.), the best things are the pictures. These are numerous and good; but one is not much impressed by reading:—

"Methinks it is like a weasel," said Hamlet, with a twinkle in his eye.

"It is backed like a weasel," said Polonius, smiling feebly.

"Or like a whale?" said Hamlet.

"Very like a whale," said Polonius.

"Then I will come to my mother by and by," said Hamlet.

"I will say so," said Polonius, getting away from Hamlet as fast as he could.

SCIENCE.

The Science of Life. An Outline of the History of Biology and its Modern Advances. By J. Arthur Thomson, M.A. (Victorian Era Series.) 7½ × 5 in., x. + 246 pp. London, 1899. Blackie. 2/6

Every student of science is, on the very threshold of his subject, struck with the amazing modernity of it. Chemistry, as we now understand it, dates back only 125 years to the time when Lavoisier laid its foundations in the overthrow of the phlogiston theory and the introduction of empirical methods; modern physics may be said to have grown up since the days of Newton, half a century earlier; astronomy may claim a slightly more venerable age by reckoning Galileo as its true founder; mathematics alone can boast antiquity, reaching back to the days of Euclid. When one comes to those branches of natural philosophy which are more particularly concerned with the animate section of creation, the crude modernity of them all is, at first, almost incredible, and it is difficult to realize that biology has only just emerged from its darkest age. Every science, of course, has had its precursor in some form of study—a wild mixture of superstitious belief and fallacious deductions, with here and there a spark of real truth. Geber, we are taught, founded chemistry in the early Christian era, and Paracelsus, the fifteenth century charlatan, was sufficiently advanced in his views to think him out of date, whilst Boyle exposed Paracelsus and did good work in the sixteenth century. Becher, Stahl, and their immediate contemporaries assisted the introduction of modern ideas as far back as the latter half of the seventeenth century. But the chemistry of those days, the chemistry even of Priestly, Black, Scheele, and Cavendish, was not the same science as that of Berthollet, Dalton, Humphry Davy, Dulong and Pettit, Gay Lussac, Mitscherlich, Wohler, and Liebig—the chemistry of to-day, the exact science founded on inductive methods and accurate experiment.

It was, in fact, the supersession of deductive reasoning from faulty premises, by cautious induction from close observation, that marks the birth of modern science—a change which, in the cases of most forms of science, occurred during that fertile period from the close of the seventeenth to the middle of the eighteenth centuries. In biology, however, this transition was even longer deferred. The superstitions which clustered round the sanctity of life, blinded all inquiry and frustrated every endeavour at real research, and it was not until the chemist had paved the way that the biologist was evolved. Though Aristotle may have been aware of the nutritive functions of the blood, Galen's jargon about the vital spirit and the animal spirit still hampered even that stern inquirer after physiological truths, of comparatively recent times, Haller, and only received its death-blow at the hands of nineteenth century physiological chemists, such as Wohler. The history of a science whose rise has been so closely associated with the "memory of living man," whose study is so intimately connected with our every-day life, is of itself an interesting and a fascinating subject. It is of this theme that Mr. J. A. Thomson's latest book treats. It is, as he admits, a venturesome undertaking to try to deal with it in some 240 pages of crown octavo in fairly large print. But we are now sufficiently acquainted with the author's lucidity and conciseness, two characteristics unfortunately but rarely met with in scientific writers, to expect the little book to set out its facts in a clear and comprehensive fashion. This it certainly does. If, however, the reader expects to find in it a popular sketch of the rise of modern biology, he will undoubtedly be disappointed. It is a sternly technical hand-book of dates and names, and, as such, will prove of much service to the scientific student, especially as, despite its smallness, it is singularly complete, and traces in a clear and business-like manner an outline of the whole history of every branch of the subject. It is, in fact, a connected dictionary of dates in brief, of great service to the thoroughly grounded student, but unintelligible, probably, to the layman or the dabbler. This may or may not be a fault according as it is the intention of the series to which it belongs to cater for the one class or to the other. It has the merit of making no attempt to cater to both.

Where the author expresses his opinions, he is invariably interesting, and his estimate of Huxley is particularly noticeable, both for the vigour with which it is expressed and for the fact that it represents what will, in all probability, be the ultimate verdict of scientific posterity on his position as a biologist. Huxley was a teacher, not a discoverer; he was gifted with a master-mind—a combination of the scientific with the practical order of intellect. Accurate in his reasoning, fearless in his opinions, a close observer, capable of the widest range of perception, keenly alive to the value of practical research—in short, a teacher who revolutionized study by his insistence on the necessity for original work as an essential part of even the beginner's curriculum—he, yet, has left no monument, has made no mark on the trend of the development of biology, with which his name can be associated. As Mr. Thomson puts it:—

Although an inspiring teacher, he founded no school; although the cutting-edge of evolution doctrine, he added nothing directly to its content: although most keenly interested in physiology, he made no physiological discoveries; although he systematized the teaching of biology, he added very little to its capital of ideas.

It is curious, by the way, that Mr. Thomson takes exception to the classification of Huxley as a morphologist. It seems to us that he was first and last a morphologist, and that his physiology was inseparable from his work as a morphologist. The author's final conclusion about him has the double merit of accuracy and humour.

If he had worked less for fisheries, he might have worked more at fishes; if he had paid less heed to the Bishops, he might have done more for biology; but such reflections are gratuitous.

The most interesting chapters in the book are certainly those on "The Physiology of Animals," "The Conditions of Life and Death," and "Cell and Protoplasm," all dealing with the foundations of the healer's art, and all bringing home to one how little we still know of the science of life, and how near we are in this respect to the darkest ages in knowledge. The ancients prescribed crushed lion's heart for cowardice; the most modern physician gives pig's gastric juice for indigestion, or injects thyroid extract to cure myxoedema. We laugh at the one, but we chronicle the other as the very latest development of an enlightened science, worthy of all men to be received, and meriting for its discoverer that he be acclaimed great and wonderful by a grateful public.

The remarkable advances made by astronomy in the present century are perhaps nowhere more strikingly visible than in the department of our knowledge of the so-called "fixed stars." The very name shows how far we have gone beyond our forefathers, for every one is now well aware that many of the "fixed stars" have proper motions in comparison with which a falling meteor crawls across the sky, and the flight of the earth in its orbit at seventeen miles per second is a mere dawdle. Mr. W. H. S. Monck's INTRODUCTION TO STELLAR ASTRONOMY (Hutchinson, 8s. 6d.) is valuable as elucidating a branch of research which is scantily treated in the text-books, and as setting forth the main outlines of our present conception of the stellar universe. The book begins with a brief historical retrospect, followed by an account of the ways in which the relative light of the stars—on which alone our study of them can be based—is measured, with some pertinent criticism of the existing photometrical methods. The unit which astronomers customarily use to measure these gigantic interspaces between world and world is the distance which light travels in a year. Mr. Monck suggests with reason that it would be more convenient to take as unit the distance from the earth of a star whose parallax is one second, which is about $8\frac{1}{2}$ "light-years," and has the advantage of giving the distance of any star, whose parallax has been found, with a rather less laborious calculation than is now necessary. He then deals with the proper motion of the sun and the fixed stars—to accept an inevitable bull—and then goes on to the work of the spectroscope, which has done as much for stellar astronomy as the telescope did in clearing up the mysteries of the Solar System. The latter half of the book describes what has been learnt of the constitution of the various types of stars by the wireless messages brought by the ether and interpreted by the prism or the grating, and blends suggestion with exposition in a fashion which gives this excellent little book an interest both for the student and the general reader.

The Natural Science Manuals issued by the Cambridge University Press have lately received an addition in the shape of THE PRINCIPLES OF STRATIGRAPHICAL GEOLOGY, by J. E. Marr, M.A., F.R.S., University Lecturer (Cambridge University Press, 6s.). When the elements of geology have been grasped, and the study of a treatise is the next platform to which the student must aspire, Mr. Marr's book may be taken up with advantage, as it stands upon an intermediate level. All geologists will welcome its appearance, more especially those who are about to take up field work.

Professor Lapworth's INTERMEDIATE TEXT-BOOK OF GEOLOGY (Blackwood, 5s.) has had a history not unlike that of recent species of shellfish. It first saw the light so far back in the Quaternary period as 1854, when it left the hands of the late David Page. At intervals varying from one to four years it is met with in successive editions, occupying different strata, as it were, until 1888, when the present editor came upon the scene. He has now once more added considerably to the size and value of the book, and made it occupy about the same relation to the modern science as Page's work did to that of half a century ago. Though the struggle for existence among science manuals is now only exceeded by that of living organisms, the present volume is well equipped at all points, and will continue to thrive as in the past.

ANECDOTA OXONIENSIA.

The Dialogues of Athanasius and Zaccchæus, and of Timothy and Aquila. Edited with Prolegomena and Facsimiles, by F. C. Conybeare, M.A. 9x8in., 11x. + 104 pp. Oxford, 1898. Clarendon Press. 7/6

These two curious anti-Jewish dialogues are here edited for the first time in the original Greek, as Part VIII. of the classical series of "Anecdota Oxoniensia." Their interest lies, not so much in their subject-matter, as in their citations of the New Testament, and in the light thrown (by the latter of them especially) upon the history of Aquila and the sources of Epiphanius' treatise "De Mensuris et Ponderibus." We will follow the editor in denoting the two dialogues, for brevity's sake, by the symbols AZ and TA. In preparing the Greek text of AZ he has collated a version in the Armenian ("Paralipomena" of Athanasius now being printed at Venice, the title prefixed to which is "Questions and Answers; or a give-and-take of arguments between Athanasius, Bishop of Alexandria, and Zacchæus, a Jew," the general subject of discussion being the Divinity of Christ. From certain dogmatic phrases employed in AZ, this dialogue in its present form cannot well be older than A.D. 300-320; while the title of TA, and certain allusions in it to the doctrine of the Trinity, refer that dialogue to the time of Cyril, Bishop of Alexandria—i.e., 420-430 A.D. But from the archaic character of the gospel texts imbedded in TA, from the many traces of affinity between the two dialogues, and from signs of the influence of AZ in early Christian literature, Mr. Conybeare concludes that both go back to some much earlier source; and that this lost documentary basis may have been the dialogue of Papias and Jason in the second century, mentioned by Celsus the Epicurean and by Origen, and possibly used (either itself or a document similar to it) by Tertullian in his anti-Jewish writings. This is only a surmise; but Mr. Conybeare works it out with much learning and ingenuity, and claims to have made good his point so far as this: that the lost documentary basis of these two dialogues, whatever it was, was known to Tertullian; that it influenced Cyprian; and that it was in the hands of Origen, and possibly of Irenæus and Justin Martyr. So far as we can here estimate Mr. Conybeare's discussion of an obscure question, his contention has reasonable probability.

An interesting chapter in Mr. Conybeare's introduction is his discussion of the New Testament citations in TA. These, he shows, are not altogether explicable from the text of the canonical gospels or from any attempted harmony of them; for they contain original matter not found in the canonical gospels, and certain sayings of Jesus are found in a different context from that in which the gospels present them. Thus, the last verse of genealogy in Matthew i., v. 16, is at one part of the dialogue cited by the Jew with the additional words, καὶ ἰωσήφ ἐγέννησεν τὸν ἰησοῦν τὸν λεγόμενον χριστόν. The Christian has rallied him with ignorance of the pedigree of Jesus; and the Jew apparently tries to confute his assertion of our Lord's divinity by appealing to a passage which implies that He was the earthly son of Joseph. This, Mr. Conybeare argues, must have been the form in which the original author of the dialogue read this verse in his copy of St. Matthew's Gospel, for unless copies of St. Matthew had actually contained it, no Christian writer would have made the Jewish interlocutor appeal to it. It is, of course, possible (as Mr. Conybeare seems to imply) that the passage was tampered with by the early Church by the omission of the words in question. But, ingenious as Mr. Conybeare's argument is, we should hardly be prepared to set aside the unanimous evidence of the Greek codices of the New Testament on the authority of this obscure dialogue, in which, it may be remarked, the verse in question appears in three different forms. Nor, assuming the genuineness of this particular form, need the phrase ἐγέννησεν, occurring in such a genealogy, carry all the force that the Jewish interlocutor is supposed to give to it. In the human genealogy of our Lord, Joseph may be spoken of as what some of the early Fathers call His σαρκικός πατήρ without implying denial of His Divine Sonship. Among other points discussed is the question whether the expression τα ἔκγονα ("seed" or "descendants") τῶν ἀποστόλων is to be understood literally of their physical descendants or figuratively of "apostolical succession." Throughout the work Mr. Conybeare has supplemented a wide acquaintance with early Christian literature by a familiarity with Armenian sacred writings not always at the command of theologians.

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

THE OPEN ROAD (Grant Richards, 5s.) is a little volume, very prettily and neatly bound, of extracts, in prose and verse, from the best authors, compiled by Mr. E. V. Lucas for the purpose of "providing companionship on the road for city-dwellers who make holiday." The editor adds, perhaps a little superfluously, that it "has no claims to completeness of any kind." It would, indeed, be disgrace to our literature if this boast could be made for any anthology of three hundred pages. It is a charming volume, however, and strikes a note of modernity which will not fail to please readers who complain that the compilers of anthologies are too fond of following a beaten track. It contains something from Shakespeare, and something from Milton, but also something from writers who have won their laurels as recently as Mr. John Davidson, Mr. Bliss Carman, Mr. Maurice Hewlett, Miss Nora Hopper, and the Rev. H. C. Beeching.

The new volume of Mr. Temple Scott's annual summary of BOOK SALES (Bell, 15s.) embraces the principal sales of books held between July, 1897, and the same month in the following year. Lower priced books are in this new volume generally omitted. This is, we think, an improvement, it being simply impracticable to crowd into a reasonable number of pages a really full report of the second-hand book market, which would necessitate notices of thousands of works of little interest or value. The most that can be done is to make a judicious selection, and in this the compiler has attained a good measure of success. The experience of several years has shown that although "Book Sales" cannot be said to have ousted "Book Prices Current" from its position, it yet forms a good record at a cheaper price and will appeal, no doubt, to a public of its own. The entries number nearly 4,000, and are evidently indexed with great care. Mr. Scott's Introduction too is well worth reading by collectors with an eye to future operations, and the tabular analyses of the prices realized at different periods by the works of Stevenson and Kipling as well as the Kelmscott Press publications are original and interesting. These analyses were printed in our issue of June 3rd last, and should be compared with the present year's statistics when they are available.

Two volumes of MISCELLANIES (7s. 6d. n. each) conclude Messrs. Constable's Library Edition of Fielding, which consists of twelve volumes in all. It is not claimed that the "Miscellanies" are complete, but only that they are representative. As Fielding wrote twenty-five plays, and a large number of fugitive pamphlets on matters of ephemeral interest, several more volumes would have been needed to include them all, and the enterprise of printing them in this costly format would hardly have been profitable. The selections made by the editor include "Tom Thumb the Great," "The Apology for the Clergy," "A Journey from this World to the Next," "A Clear State of the Case of Elizabeth Canning," "The Journal of a Voyage to Lisbon," and some essays.

THE POLITICAL STRUWWELPETER (Grant Richards, 3s. 6d.), will not, perhaps, figure largely in a future history of political caricature because its subjects—the very amusing "Story of the Duke of Bunnygorst" for example—are, for the most part, rather ephemeral; but Mr. F. C. Gould (whose drawings are now on view at the Continental Gallery in Bond Street), recasts the familiar pictures in his best vein of genial humour, and Mr. Harold Begbie is often happy in his verse, as in "The Story of the Protestant who wouldn't":—

Sir William was a brawny Rad,
A wealth of cheek Sir William had;

But one day, one twin-letter day,
He said, "I will not join the fray:
I don't care what the papers say,
No party will I lead to-day!"

Or,

Let me see if little Tanner
Can assume a suaver manner:
Let me see if he is able
To look pretty at the table.

Of the pictures, perhaps, "Johnny Head in the Air" wins the palm—"with tilted nose, Johnny, Member for Montrose." But the most serious politician will hardly maintain his gravity wherever he may open the book.

THE COLONIES AND THE CENTURY, by the Hon. Sir J. Robinson, K.C.M.G., late Premier of Natal (Macmillan, 3s. n.), is a revised and expanded version of a paper read by the author, a year ago, before the Royal Colonial Institute. The sentiments are admirable, though the style is somewhat too suggestive of the University prize essay in its rhetorical insistence upon the obvious. By way of appendix Sir J. Robinson reprints a paper which he contributed to the Westminster Review in July, 1871, on "The Future of the British Empire." This shows that, thirty years ago, there were those who doubted the desirability of retaining the colonies as part of the Empire. "The Empire," Sir J. Robinson then wrote, "cannot be dismembered piecemeal. If the vast and glorious structure, raised through so many ages by so much toil and sacrifice, is to fall to pieces, the collapse will be sudden and complete rather than partial and gradual."

The sub-title, "Archæological Walks in Algeria and Tunis," sufficiently explains the purport of ROMAN AFRICA, by Gaston Boissier, translated into English by Arabella Ward (Putnam, 7s. 6d.). It is history written with special reference to "remains," and ranges from the time of Dido to the time of the schools of rhetoric. In discussing the former subject, M. Boissier not only gives us a psychological analysis of Dido's passion for Aeneas, but also professes to identify the cave in which the event occurred which sent Rumour on its pilgrimage through the Carthaginian cities. His comments are luminous and suggestive: but he is, at times, too anxious to squeeze information out of the classical passages which he quotes. For example, on Juvenal's "De conducendo loquitur jam rhetore Thule" he remarks, "Thule, the island at the end of the world, spoke of providing itself with a professor of Rhetoric." This, surely, is interpreting a satirist too literally. As well might the author allege, on the same poet's authority, that Hannibal crossed the Alps in order to please the boys, and become a fit subject for a rhetorical exercise. On the whole, however, the book is well worthy of M. Boissier's reputation as a lucid exponent of classical archæology, and the translation is good, though the use of the word "employées" for civil servants not of the feminine gender will fail to satisfy the purist.

We suspect that had it not been for a pardonable desire to repeat the story of Manila Bay as a colophon, AN AMERICAN CRUISER IN THE EAST, by John D. Ford, Fleet Engineer U.S. Navy (Allenson, 12s.), would not have been furnished up for publication, and that it might have been better so. Four hundred and forty pages are devoted to reciting established or familiar facts concerning the countries and ports touched at in the ordinary course of a three years' commission on the China station, to which are tacked on four short appendices in a strained effort to bring the volume up to date with reports of the Chino-Japanese war and the earlier American hostilities in the Philippines. Thus the tail is made to wag the dog. Between the mass of extraneous instruction and the cruiser there exists about as slender a connexion as that of the Cornishman's pasty "with the course of meat all through." Of incident the voyage was, agreeably perhaps for the narrator, less so for the listener, prosperously free. It was not necessary to tell us that "the Chinese belong to the Mongolian race"; that "tea is universally used," and so on; though when we learn that "the Chinese are a progressive people" we certainly have something new. The incursions inland into the domains of history are, on the whole, correct summaries, though the writer is in error in stating that "the Chinese of Formosa acknowledged the Emperor of China in the latter part of the sixteenth century, and since that time Formosa has formed part of the Chinese Empire." It was in 1682 that the fugitives of the Ming dynasty gave their adherence to the Emperor, after having expelled the Dutch from Fort Zelandia. And in dealing with the Constitution and Government of Japan the author makes the common slip of speaking of the "dual system of government"; the Shōgumate was never more than an investiture and devolution of military power from the Emperor, who remained supreme. The abrupt concluding pages treat of more recent times, and contain a vigorous description of the naval engagement off Cavite. The book closes with the fall of the curtain on the first, or Spanish, act of the Philippine drama.

A high degree of excellence is gained for A RUSSIAN PROVINCE OF THE NORTH, by a P. Englehardt, Governor of the Archangel, translated from the Russian by Henry Cooke (Constable, 18s.), by the qualifications of the author and the efficiency of the translator. As the account by a Governor of his own province it deserves attention, while the able treatment of the subject saves it from any ex parte character or the dryness of an official report. The works of Mr. Trevor-Battye and Mr. F. G. Jackson have already contributed to a better knowledge of Northern Russia among Englishmen, and the present volume will further dispel the haze which may be said, for many, still to hang over the remote coasts of the Arctic Ocean. The pro-consulate described is a large one, even for Russia, and embraces the islands of Novaya Zemlia, Vaigach, and Kolgueff, the vast Samoyede tundra, the great Petchora district, the whole of the White Sea littoral, including the Holy Islands, the Monastery of Solovetski, the Kola Peninsula, and the Murman, or Lapland, coast up to the confines of Norway. To each of these we are taken in the tour of inspection, and the author interweaves past history with present development and incidents of travel in a very skilful manner. That the conditions of life among the dwellers on these rugged shores remain both arduous and primitive is undeniable, but the Governor is sanguine as to the era of prosperity about to dawn with the establishment of telegraphs and railroads. Important among the undertakings of his administration is the choice of a harbour at Ekaterina, in the Gulf of Kola, which he extols as about to give Russia "an open window, looking out not only towards Europe, but on the whole wide world beyond. . . . In the never freezing waters of the Murman our fleet will find secure and convenient anchorages, whence it will be able at any season of the year to steam forth into open sea." This port will be connected with St. Petersburg by rail, and the whole of Western Russia will be opened to a new and direct route for foreign trade.

But, while eagerly forecasting the future, the author is no less capable of reanimating the past. His description of the old races offers abundant ethnographic as well as current interest. Of them the Ziriāns, belonging to the Permian branch of the Finns, still constitute sixty per cent. of the population of the Petchora district. Their name would seem not to be known to Nestor, but several of their customs are shared with the tribes of the Volga, of whom a study by M. Smirnov was recently noticed in Literature. Inferior to them in all respects are the Samoyedes, those roving, thriftless children of the tundras, among whom yet lurks a furtive Shamanism, and who may, perhaps, represent the transition stage between Mongol and Finn. But for all, Ziriān, Samoyede, and Lapp, their protector predicts complete absorption, a racial extinction more thorough than the fiercer methods of the old Novgorodian freebooters ever could effect.

The appendices furnish industrial statistics, and maps and illustrations are in accord with the rest of this admirable work, upon which Mr. Cooke is to be congratulated.

M. Leopold de Saussure, in this book just published by M. Alcan, PSYCHOLOGIE DE LA COLONISATION FRANÇAISE DANS SES RAPPORTS AVEC LES SOCIÉTÉS INDIGÈNES (3f.50c.), says a number of things which have hitherto been left to foreigners to say. The colonial methods of the various nations, he points out, differ according to the psychological differences between them, and it is unjust to hold this or that Governor or administrator responsible for failures which are inherent in the very psychology of peoples.

The thesis when thus stated is not merely plausible but indisputable, and it is no doubt fertile in suggestion. M. de Saussure's object in this book, however, is not to illustrate it in an exhaustive study of the whole problem of French colonization, but only with reference to one portion. France, he says, does not know how to deal with the natives in countries in which the conqueror is in the minority. She always adopts a solution just the opposite of that aimed at by the great colonizing peoples, the Romans, the English, and the Dutch.

And the French system is not the fault of the governing classes but of the blend of sentiments, beliefs, and notions which constitute French national character. Just as Louis IX., when he wished to obtain the support of the grand Khan to conquer Syria, thought that the best way was to convert him to Christianity, and sent out monks to show him comment il devrait croire, so Paul Bert immediately upon his arrival in Tonkin posted up at Hanoi the Droits de l'Homme. The two acts are, in M. de Saussure's opinion, typical. The blunders of the French colonial crusade, he thinks, do not differ essentially from those of the middle-age crusades.

Just as [says he] the old Spanish conquerors saw in the curious civilizations of Central America diabolical practices, unworthy of respect, which it behoved them to destroy, so, in the civilizations of Indo-China, in these monuments of the traditions and wisdom of refined peoples, we see only civilizations hostile to our domination, which we endeavour to undermine so as to transform them to our own image.

Even the history of the French Canadians and the visit to Paris of Sir Wilfrid Laurier did not seem to teach Frenchmen the obvious moral. M. de Saussure tells the truth bluntly:—

If we delay changing the system, the possessions which have cost us so much blood and money will fall into the power of the Anglo-Saxon.

He finds the remedy in a diagnosis of French national dogmas which fatally condition the policy of France with native races. His book belongs to "historic psychology," and he follows in the wake of M. Gustave Le Bon. The book is an admirable example of luminous French thought.

THE ANGLICAN CONTROVERSY.

The Bishop of London said last year that the main characteristic of the Church of England is "the method of sound learning"; and the Church Historical Society (whose pamphlets are published by the S.P.C.K.) is certainly true to the principles of Dr. Creighton, its president. It has issued, since its inception two or three years ago, fifty-six publications, ranging in price from 2d. to 4s., which may be taken as representing the mind of the English Church (to use the word with a double emphasis) at this time upon many disputed questions. Professor W. E. Collins' "Four Recent Pronouncements" (No. 56, 3d.) is a typical production. It deals with the statement of the English Church Union of February 27, with the Memorial of the "Churchmen's Union" of March 3, with the reply of the Church Association of March 9, and with the reply of the National Protestant Church Union of March 24. Proceeding purely from the historical standpoint, and without taking sides, it points out the various inaccuracies—sometimes of the most glaring description—which these societies were led into by the excitement of party warfare. The contemplation of the hasty misstatements which Mr. Collins has pilloried remind us irresistibly of the answer of a schoolboy, who, not hearing aright his teacher's explanation of the word "Hell" in the Creed, wrote in his paper, "Hell is the place of party spirit." Mr. W. H. Hutton contributes a very short aperçu of "The English Reformation" (No. 53, 1d.), which gives the opinion of an able and candid historian as to what led to the Reformation, what really resulted from it, and what inferences may be drawn from it at the present day. His conclusion is a very curious comment on recent Parliamentary utterances:—

Modern politics have familiarized us with the opinion that laws with which we disagree must be disobeyed, and that if there is enough disobedience there will be a change of law. This view has high authority, but it is essentially immoral. We must obey the laws and formularies of the English Church.

Mr. W. J. Birkbeck's translation of Professor Bulgakoff's "The Question of Anglican Orders" (No. 55, 6d.) is less for the general public than are the two former pamphlets. The Russian theologian's essay owes its interest to the fact that it is a critical examination of Cardinal Vaughan's "Vindication" of the Pope's Bull on this subject. It regards the defence of the Anglican Archbishops as conclusive against the Roman objections, though it does not depart from the rigid orthodox position as to the filioque clause and other matters. We have treated these publications of the Church Historical Society at greater length than we can usually devote to pamphlets, because both their matter and the eminent persons concerned in them give them a high value. They supply just the necessary corrective to the slovenly misunderstandings of many books and more newspapers.

OTHER PAMPHLETS.—Dean Church's weighty article "On the Relations between Church and State" (Longmans, 1899, 1s.) has been again reprinted from the "Christian Remembrancer" of 1850. The lapse of fifty years has not made it old-fashioned or abated its reasonable force. Mr. Morris Fuller has given the same title to a letter addressed to the Archbishop of Canterbury (Skeffington, 1899, 1s.). It is a learned and temperate appeal for a properly constituted Archbishops' Court, in which the spiritual and temporal authorities shall be found. Mr. Fuller wishes, also, for an appeal from this Court, not to the Privy Council, but to a National Synod, that is, to "the Archbishops and Bishops of the whole Anglican Church." Both these pamphlets are valuable at this time when a scheme for the reasonable self-government of the Church is probably in the making. Canon Teignmouth Shore's "Auricular Confession and the Church of England" (Cassell, 1899) is a reprint from an article in the Nineteenth Century some years back. It is an able attempt to minimize the teaching of the Prayer-book upon this subject, but the danger of such an exercise is that it encourages others to undertake the maximizing process. Dr. F. G. Lee criticises "The Ecclesiastical Situation in 1899" (T. Baker, 1899) from his own standpoint, which he describes as "Tractarian." He left the English Church Union because "Liberals alone had secured the management of its affairs," and he regards the recent Benefices Bill as having abolished "stability and security."

The latest Cathedral books are LICHFIELD CATHEDRAL, by Canon Bodington, and RIPON CATHEDRAL, by Archdeacon Danks (Isbister, 1s. n. each). The former volume is illustrated by Mr. Holland Tringham, and the latter by Mr. Herbert Railton. Canon Bodington, in particular, writes in a lively style, and with a sense of the humorous as well as of the picturesque. He knows what to quote, as witness this charming excerpt concerning a seventeenth-century Bishop of the diocese:—

Judge Jones never went to the Bench at the beginning of a Term but he fasted and prayed the day before, and oftentimes got Dr. Hackett to come and pray with him. . . . Sir Julius Caesar never heard him preach but he would send him a broad piece, and he would often send a Bishop or a Dean a pair of gloves, because he would not hear God's word gratis.

OUR DAILY FARE (Ward, Lock, 1d.) contains some good recipes, and will be useful to housekeepers of small means and smaller experience.

Mr. J. A. Wanklyn, the author, with Mr. William John Cooper, of SEWAGE ANALYSIS (Kegan Paul) has long enjoyed a high standing in the sanitary world as the author of the valuable "ammonia method" in water and sewer analysis. At the present moment, when there is a tendency to discard all chemical purification of sewage and to trust both treatment and disposal to the digestive capacity of bacteria, the unbiased experience of a chemical analyst of thirty years' standing forms a refreshing counter-blast. Packed away in an attractive form for a somewhat repulsive subject will be found much valuable matter for the sanitarian and the perplexed municipal councillor. In regard to the important question of sewage treatment, disposal, and utilization, Mr. Wanklyn's view is that Oxidation may be effected without the aid of bacteria and by simple aëration. . . . Settlement [in tanks] and decantation of the supernatant liquid combined with aëration and the action of oxygen carriers are the processes by the aid of which sewage may be converted into a comparatively clean water fit to be run into the river.

Mr. Wanklyn favours the utilization of the solid products of precipitation as guano, and of the liquid effluent, where possible, over a farm. What he says will certainly make town authorities pause before they hand over their tanks and works to be converted into so-called "bacteria beds" by the biological faddist.

Among my Books.

"LITERÆ HUMANIORES."

Perhaps I may be allowed, under the heading "Among my Books," to offer a few remarks about the present position of books which are not mine in particular, but which, while they ought to be everybody's, are yet, I fear, coming more and more to be nobody's. The question is one which seems to be occupying the minds of many persons who have a right to speak on it with authority. Within the last few weeks we have had an address on Classical Education from the Vice-Chancellor of Cambridge University, a Romanes Lecture on Humanism in Education from Professor Jebb, and, lastly, a very suggestive speech on cheap literature by Mr. John Murray to the International Congress of Publishers. I have been so much struck by the contrasted lights thrown on the subject by these eminent authorities that it has occurred to me that something might be gained by bringing together their different views in a single paper.

Mr. Murray—and no one can speak on the subject with more knowledge—describes the governing facts of the situation forcibly and picturesquely. He is reported to have said :—

The gradual encroachment of journalism into the domain of books was a danger which could not be disregarded. Readers in these days were numbered by millions where in the times of their grandfathers they were numbered by thousands. By a colossal expenditure of money they had taught them how to read; by modern discoveries in printing and illustration they had placed within their reach an enormous mass of printed matter—he could not apply the word literature to it as a whole—but they had not yet taught them how to read or what to read. They revelled in pages of snippets and scraps, which were always trivial, often worthless, not unfrequently pernicious. They demanded their reading served up to them day by day and week by week, as their American friends would say, "like hot cakes."

Thirty years ago Mr. Lowe said in the House of Commons that we must educate those who were our masters in the sphere of politics. The "millions," as Mr. Murray says, are now our highest Court of Appeal in the sphere of taste; but something is apparently still wanting in the education of our æsthetic judges. So at least thinks the Vice-Chancellor of Cambridge, who begins his address with an axiom on which Literature has commented with pleasant irony, but which, in view of Mr. Murray's facts, it seems not quite unnecessary to enunciate.

The first object of the student was the cultivation of intellectual taste, the formation of sound judgment which would enable him to discriminate between what was deserving and what ought to be condemned, what was best worth knowing and what might be left in the division of the unknown.

By what kind of education is this result to be secured? A generation ago the answer would certainly have been by a ground work of scientific, rather than of what is known as classical, education; and I imagine that the Vice-Chancellor himself would have been then of that opinion. Now he says frankly that—for reasons which I need not repeat as they have been discussed in Literature—he is not. He falls back on the necessity of classical education, and all the defenders of literæ humaniores will welcome the support of so vigorous an ally. Some of us, however, are a little startled at the somewhat remarkable reservations with which this aid is to be granted. The classics, we are told, are no longer to be regarded as a school of taste in the old sense of the word.

Milton, Pope, Johnson, Addison, and Macaulay—these were the masters of form. The highest eulogium on a man of letters then was to say, "He is a scholar." The reverence in which we held classic learning still led to idol worship; pictures were prayed to and not saints; books, rather than the ideas of the author, were studied; grammar instead of speech. It need to be argued that the classics had set the standard in style. It was so no longer. At the Universities, however, one would still hear criticisms of Stevenson or Kipling. "He is a clever writer," they would say, "but no scholar." But would any one read him if he were? Fancy "Treasure Island" or "Plain Tales from the Hills" done into Johnsonese. The end of this century had developed a style of its own which bore very little relation to that of Demosthenes or Cicero.

I am afraid it must be recognized that the cultivation of taste is here confused with, what is a very different thing, the cultivation of style for its own sake. The confusion is, indeed, as old as the Revival of Letters. Style for its own sake, the imitation of the mere manner and diction of the ancient authors, was the aim of that section of the Italian Humanists, headed by Bembo, who used to be called the Apes of Cicero. But the aims of these men were ridiculed by Erasmus, the real founder of classical education in England; and, with all deference to the Vice-Chancellor, they have been equally repudiated at all periods by those Englishmen who have most ardently insisted on the value of classical education. We have studied the classical authors as our masters in the art of expression, knowing that the Greeks and Latins were the first to teach men how to say accurately what they had thought justly; the manner in which a subject should be conceived as a whole, and its parts properly arranged; the reason why one word is better fitted than another to convey a writer's meaning. But we have never taken them as models for imitation in the spirit of those who, in the cant of our day, call themselves "stylists"—as if a good style could ever be formed apart from the subject matter. If Milton, Johnson, and others happened to imitate the superficial manner of the ancient writers in any particular, it was only because they found in their modes of expression something analogous to their own thought and their own time. And herein, in my judgment, lies perhaps the main use of the study of the classics on the Erasmian principle. The Vice-Chancellor of Cambridge, like many others, has noticed how rapidly, in the higher regions of science, those whose training has been exclusively scientific are overtaken by those whose education has hitherto been only classical. The reason is plain: the former have learned only facts; the latter have learned the right way to use the imagination and judgment in interpreting facts.

The study of the classics is scarcely less useful as showing us the points in which the standard of taste is, and must be, permanent. The Vice-Chancellor of Cambridge, holding the view that he does about style, naturally believes that there is no permanent standard of taste. Two of his sentences show this :—"Milton, Pope, Johnson, Addison, and Macaulay—these were the masters of form"; and, "The end of the century has developed a style of its own, which bears very little relation to that of Demosthenes and Cicero." I will not labour this point, but will put in opposition to Dr. Hill's opinion that which has lately been said on the subject in the best possible way by Professor Jebb in the Romanes lecture:—

Classical studies help to preserve sound standards of literature; they develop a literary conscience. We have no Academy of Letters in England, and, for my part, I am with those who hope that we shall never have one. But no doubt we must desire to have what Mr. Matthew Arnold called "a public force of correct literary opinion, possessing within certain limits a clear sense of what is right and wrong, sound and unsound." In concluding this lecture I would venture to say that such a force of correct literary opinion is just what an intelligent humanism should contribute to supply; not as an academy does, in a public corporate form, but through the influence and example of individuals.

To every word of this I subscribe; but, at the same time, I feel that unless the advice of Mr. Jebb be read in connexion with, and be qualified by, what has been said by Mr. Murray, it will be a vax clamantis. He himself, indeed, is well aware of the danger ahead. He says in his lecture:—

It is not difficult to lose such standards, even for a nation with the highest material civilization, with abounding mental activity, and with a great literature of its own. It is particularly easy to do so in days when the lighter and more ephemeral kinds of writing form for many people the staple of daily reading. The fashions of the hour may start a movement, not in the best direction, which may go on until the path is difficult to retrace.

Yet taken by themselves, his words might be interpreted as a recommendation to leave Humanism to advance itself on the principle of laissez faire. With some sort of tastes this would be the best course to pursue. For the satisfaction of the natural instincts of the "millions" the money market and the rule of demand and supply may safely be left to operate. The taste of those who desire above all things intellectual novelty can also be trusted to find its own level. The æsthetic Epicureans will discover their man; a coterie with all the money, the machinery, the enthusiasm, and cleverness at its disposal, will impose him on the public; and, as far as nature allows, such qualities will deservedly succeed. In the one case a certain spontaneous movement of atoms, in the other a number of educated sympathies, working with a recognized aim, push the public taste in a particular direction. But no inward vital energy of this kind will act on behalf of an ancient tradition like Humanism. At present, no doubt, the Universities keep up the old standard of classical education, and those who are educated in them help, in a scattered way, to diffuse what they have learned over the surface of society. But these isolated units can no more make head against a great body of instinctive taste, such as that described by Mr. Murray, than men in a crowd can direct its movements by reason and argument. What I should like to press on the consideration of both Mr. Murray and Mr. Jebb is that, if the cause of Humanism and sound literature is to be advanced, if, indeed, it is to be preserved, it must be by the organization of intellectual forces. As Mr. Jebb says, we do not want an Academy of Letters in England; but we do want the influence and example of individuals who will uphold a standard of correct taste, and we want these individuals to act together on public opinion. Literature, in the old sense of the word, needs a public made up of authors, publishers, readers, and critics, all co-operating for the promotion of a recognised interest. We require some common centre for writers who, while they wish for fame and money, are ready to acknowledge that money is not everything, and that, for true literary success, opinions must be weighed as well as counted; for publishers so proud of their traditions as to be content, in the cause of Humanism, with moderate gains; for critics sufficiently instructed and sufficiently courageous to dare to tell the truth to the author and the public. That all these elements are in existence, I know very well; that they can be brought together—at least, to a much greater extent than at present—by co-operation in the Universities, in the professions, in the publishing world, and in the Press, I do not doubt; that if such a nucleus of opinion could be formed, it would gradually attract to itself an ever-growing amount of public sympathy, I hold as absolutely certain. But unless some such organized effort be made by those who are really interested in the matter, I confess I should feel a difficulty in sharing Mr. Jebb's confidence that "the position of humanism in this country at the close of the century is much stronger than it was at the beginning."

W. J. COURTHOPE.

PARODIES.

I.

Of what, asks M. Joseph Texte, in his recent book on Rousseau, does the history of literature consist but of imitation and borrowing? The question is of the nature of a paradox, and it contains just that modicum of truth which endows a paradox with life. The history of literature shows a series of unconscious imitations and of conscious plagiarisms, and the products thus begotten develop just like the species of the evolutionist. If they are only sterile repetitions of a pattern they die; if they renew the prototype with a fresh and useful quality of their own they live and fructify. But imitation of this kind is still "the sincerest flattery." The imitator may outshine his original, but he does not otherwise re-act upon him; still less does he turn and rend him. That parricidal yet often highly useful work is reserved for the parodist. The poet who, in the last century, clothed the husks of metaphysics in heroic verse, and showed with so much satisfaction to himself and his readers that everything had its due place in the universe, might have prolonged a foolish life but for that special imitator the parodist. His end came when Canning (or one of his collaborators) wrote, in the Anti-Jacobin, "The Progress of Man," a didactic poem. Payne Knight and his school could not survive this:—

Oh, who hath seen the mailed lobster rise,
Clap her broad wings, and, soaring, claim the skies?

The dramatic burlesques of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries are the best instance of parody being used to castigate extravagance or futility. It is seldom, perhaps too seldom, used for this purpose nowadays. Hayward's imitation of Macaulay, which has been often quoted, is a piece of pure criticism. "Whether Whigs or Tories, Protestants or Jesuits were uppermost," said Macaulay, "the grazier drove his beasts to market; the grocer weighed out his currants; the draper measured out his broadcloth," and so on through a host of trades. As Hayward said, there need be no limit to this until every occupation has been particularized. In the Browningsque of Calverley it Might, odds-bobs Sir, in judicious hands

Extend from here to Mesopotamy.

Hayward's "The apothecary vended his drugs as usual; the poulterer crammed his turkeys," &c., is certainly a parody, though it does not fulfil the requirement which some authorities have laid down of being different either in subject or in treatment from its original. One such modern imitation is worth extracting from Mr. Quiller Couch's "Adventures in Criticism," in which he exposes the not infrequent ineptitude of Richard Jefferies and his school, and of the trivialities of country lore with which they delighted cockney readers. It is a pretty exact application of Jefferies' method to the Brompton Road instead of to a country lane.

Here and there along the street, grocery stores and shops of Italian warehousemen may be observed, opened here as branches of bigger establishments in the City. Three gilt balls may occasionally be seen hanging out under the first floor windows of a "pawnbroker's" residence. House agents, too, are not uncommon along the line of route. The appearance of a wrinkle, when extracted from its shell with the aid of a pin, is extremely curious. There is a wrinkle stall by the South Kensington Station of the Underground Railway. Underneath the stall the pavement is strewn with shells, where they have fallen and continue to lie. Close to the stall is a cab-stand, paved with a few cobbles, lest the road be worn overmuch by the restless tramping of cab-horses, who stand here because it is a cab-stand. The thick woollen goods which appear in the haberdashers' windows through the winter—generally inside the plate glass—give way to garments of a lighter texture as the summer advances, and are put away, or exhibited at decreased prices. But collars continue to be shown, quite white and circular in form; they will probably remain, turning grey as the dust settles on them, until they are sold.

This is, however, a special class of parody—for parody does not always play the part of critic—but that class is, perhaps, the highest, and it suggests the remark that parody of whatever kind, however you may define it, must always have one quality—humour. It may not always ridicule, but (though Barrow does not include it in his analysis of wit) it must amuse. It must be something more than imitation, it must be burlesque. This is what Jeffrey forgot in the rather too solemn disquisition on the nature of parody with which he prefaced his review of the "Rejected Addresses." The highest kind he thought to be not only an imitation of an author's style, but a representation of the actual thoughts which he would think on a given subject. This omits the essence of parody—the spirit of contrast, the "sudden glory" of laughter with which we are surprised into a new enjoyment of the serious and the familiar—the magic touch by which the parodist reminds us, in the words of Shaftesbury, that "ridicule is the test of truth," and shows how easy is the leap from the sublime to the ridiculous. There are so-called parodies that do not amuse. The interminable verbal parodies of particular poems which form part of the business of comic papers often make us "tired."

My heart leaps up when I behold
A bailiff in the street, or Barham's

Not a sou had he got, not a guinea or note—

these and their like too often induce nothing but depression. But this is the lowest form of parody. It is only a verbal contortion and does not provoke merriment like the conscious and successful imitation of an author's manner, nor does it pay him the compliment of satire. What it is in imitation (where the object is satire and not flattery) that makes so irresistible an appeal it would be curious to inquire. Is any attack upon our gravity so sure or direct as when we see a well-known actor's or a friend's gestures or manner of speech "taken off"—at any rate, when we see it for the first time and well done? Perhaps it is the spice of malice from which humour can never be quite emancipated in our defective nature. The parodist has a wider field than the actor, for he can satirize without "bad form," a natural defect—e.g., stupidity, which in literary matters should have the grace not to give an opportunity to the scoffer.

Parody has played its part, and an honourable one, from the dawn of letters, and it is strange that no comprehensive history of it exists in the English language. There is, of course, a classical collection made by Mr. Walter Hamilton, a work of immense industry, and forming, with its copious notes, a mine of information on the subject. But, though it by no means leaves other ages or other countries untouched, it is concerned chiefly with modern English and American productions. A learned ecclesiastic of the last century, the Abbé Sallier, wrote a "Mémoire sur l'Origine de la Parodie," and a French student of a more recent date, M. Octave Delepierre, has made a beginning on the history of parody in all ages in his "La Parodie chez les Grecs chez les Romains et chez les Modernes." But he by no means exhausted the subject, and on the history of English parody in particular he leaves much to be desired. Such a history would, if it embraced all countries and all times, be a mighty volume containing much matter of the greatest moment not only to the history of letters but to the study of the human mind.

No sooner does the Muse of Poetry make her first entry upon the stage than we see her followed by an impish mannikin ready to travesty her too inflated utterances and mimic her too expansive gestures. Homer, it is well known, did not escape. The "Batrachomyomachia" or the "Battle of the Frogs and Mice" is the first instance recorded of the kind of parody affected in later times by Boileau in his "Lutrin," by Pope in his "Rape of the Lock," and by Philips in his "Spendid Shilling"—viz., the mock epic which clothes a petty theme with the dignity of heroic verse. The type became much in vogue among the Greeks, who delighted in parody, but the date of the "Batrachomyomachia" is hard to fix. Some scholars have asserted that Homer was himself responsible for it. Perhaps—like Corney Grain imitating Mr. George Grossmith's imitation of himself—Homer had the notion of satirizing his own less successful disciples. But the rhapsodist who recited epic poems was generally followed by some one who gave a comic version of his performance. Many names have come down to us of the Greek parodists of the sixth and fifth centuries before Christ, such as Hegemon and Hipponax, for both of whom the claim has been made that they were the founders of the art. One, Eubœus of Paros, in the time of Philip of Macedon, wrote four books of parodies—surely a somewhat dreary performance. Aristophanes made some fun out of the great Athenian tragedians, and so did Lucian, but they have never been dealt with quite as they deserved. Sir Theodore Martin said no man should parody a poet unless he loves him, just as Heine said "Let no man ridicule mankind unless he loves them." The beauties of the Attic drama do not suffer from a recognition of their defects. We have a very different idea of stage requirements, and hence it has resulted that we find a new virtue in some of the verbiages of the Athenian dramatists. They rise, for us, into absurdities. I do not know, I regret to say, who is that unrecognized benefactor of mankind who wrote a "Fragment of a Greek Tragedy"—a masterpiece I have never seen in print. I would not willingly put it into the hands of a schoolboy, but I cannot refrain from a brief quotation of which even those who only know the original through a verse translation such as Plumptre's will recognize the beauty:—

CHORUS—O gracefully enveloped-in-a-cloak

Head of a stranger, wherefore, seeking what,
Whence, by what way, how purposed, are you come
To this well-nightingaled vicinity?
My cause of asking is, I wish to know.

Alcæon's reply is followed by a dialogue in which, according to the usual style, each question and each answer has to be fitted into a single iambic line, and is duly padded out for the purpose. At length the Chorus comes nearer to the point, and asks the stranger's name:—

CHORUS—Your name I not unwillingly would learn.

ALCÆON. Not all that men desire do they obtain.

CHO. Might I then know at what your presence aims?

ALC. A shepherd's questioned tongue informed me that—

CHO. What? For I know not yet what you will say.

ALC. This house was Eriphyle's, no one's else.

Presently the chorus breaks into a "strophe."

In speculation
I would not willingly acquire a name
For ill-digested thought.
But, after pondering much,
To this conclusion I at last have come "Life is uncertain."
This have I written deep
In my reflective midriff,
On tablets not of wax.
Nor with a stylus did I write it there
For obvious reasons—Life, I say, is not Divested of uncertainty.

And, lastly, here is the crisis :—

ERIPH. (within). O, I am smitten with a hatchet's jaw.
In deed, I mean, and not in word alone.
CHO. Methings I heard a sound within the house
Unlike the accent of festivity.
ERIPH. He cracks my skull, not in a friendly way.
It seems he purposes to kill me dead.
CHO. I would not be considered rash, but yet
I doubt if all be well within the house.
ERIPH. Oh! oh! another blow! This makes the third.
He stabs my heart, a harsh, unkindly act.
CHO. Indeed, if that be so, ill-fated one,
I fear we scarce can hope thou wilt survive.

The Romans knew parody, but after the conquest of Rome by Greece the indigenous wit of the Latins was never replaced by the rollicking humour of their conquerors. Cicero discusses parody; Virgil suffered at its hands, and Catullus, especially his "Phaëlus ille quem videtis hospites," inspired countless versifiers down to the Middle Ages. Parody undoubtedly flourished under the later Empire—the walls of Pompeii show its spirit in abundance. One Imperial parody has come down to us—that, namely, on the verses written by Florus, the historian, at the Court of Hadrian, beginning

Ego nolo Cæsar esse
Ambulare per Britannos
Scythicas pati pruinas, &c.

The good-humoured Emperor replied :—

Ego nolo Florus esse,
Ambulare per tabernas
Latitare per popinas, &c.

The scholars of the Middle Ages were always fingering the classics with a view to twisting all awry their words or their matter. Their Centones or patchwork compositions made up of odd lines from a classical poet suggested parody; but they did not confine themselves to the classics. The Bible, the Mass and other ecclesiastical offices, and the poems of chivalry, all came ready to their hand when they were in the mood to sing the joys of the bottle or the sins of the Pope. Or they pressed the old Pagans into the service of the Church, and the writer of the "Art of Love" taught the truths of the Gospel under the title of "Ovidius Christianus." Parody, it may be said, played during the Renaissance a distinct part in the struggle for freedom. But with the dawn of modern literature the parodist found a new field for action, into which we must glance in a second paper.

F. T. D.

Notes.

Not the least notable feature of the Charing-cross Hospital Bazaar, which has been held this week at the Albert-hall, was the "souvenir," edited by Mr. Beerholm Tree, with contributions from a great many men and women of letters, artists, and composers—all of distinction in their art. "Art for Love" was the legend which the cover bore, which meant that all Mr. Tree's collaborators had made the Hospital a present of their contributions. Mr. Tree's enterprise was rewarded with remarkable success. To get original poems from the Poet Laureate, Mr. Swinburne, Mr. Henley, Mr. Davidson, Mr. Watson, Sir Lewis Morris, Mr. Watts-Dunton, and Mr. Stephen Phillips; essayettes from Mr. Birrell and Mr. Andrew Lang; stories and sketches from Dr. Conan Doyle, Mr. Anthony Hope, Mr. Frankfort Moore, Mrs. Humphry Ward, and Mr. Zangwill; playlets by Mr. Henry Arthur Jones and Mr. Haddon Chambers—this was enough to make up a "souvenir" of great and lasting interest. But this does not nearly exhaust even the list of the literary contributors. We have not mentioned Mr. Anstey, Mr. William Archer, Sir Robert Ball, Sir Walter Besant, Mr. Burnand, Mr. W. L. Courtney, Miss Violet Hunt, Dean Hole, Mr. Sidney Lee—but the list is too long to give in full. As to the artists and the composers—one can only say that every name among them is well known, and that they have all sent good and interesting work. Portraits and specimens of handwriting add to the personal value of the "souvenir," which is well arranged and excellently produced by the Nassau Press.

Mr. Swinburne's poem, "At a Dog's Grave," seems to be a fervent plea for the recognition of animal-souls—

Shall friends born lower in life, though pure of sin,
Though clothed with love and faith to upward plight,
Perish and pass unbidden of us, their kin,
Good-night?

Mr. Henley's fragment of verse has that distinction, that sense of a large and vivid outlook upon life, which animates all his best work. It is so short that we may quote all its eight lines :—

A sigh sent wrong,
A kiss that goes astray,
A sorrow the years endlong—
So they say.

So let it be!
Come the sorrow, the kiss, the sigh!
They are life, dear life, all three—
And we die.

After this the Poet Laureate's eulogy of the Stella stewardess (in the manner of Mr. George R. Sims) sounds rhetorical rather than poetical.

Tell me the tale again, mother,
Tell me the tale again,
Of the cheery start and the joyous trip
And the folds of the fog and then—
How men may be heroes in their death
And women as brave as men.

Still, it is good enough rhetoric, and the subject is a fine one. Sir Walter Besant discourses pleasantly of Charing-cross. His article and Mr. Birrell's seem to be the only two which have any direct reference to the object of the bazaar, though Dean Hole pleads eloquently for "flowers for the sick" :—

I pray you to whom God gives gardens, lend
This happy solace which the flowers bestow,
Where pain oppresses, and where few befriend
To cheer the suffering and to soothe their woe.

Mr. Pett-Ridge, too, sketches the waiting crowd of visitors at a hospital's door on Sunday afternoon. But, whether the contributors refer directly to the charity they are to benefit or not, they are all attractive, and they make up a volume that is much more than the usual ephemeral souvenir.

One is interested to hear Mr. Hall Caine's view of those six-penny novels which are at present vexing the book trade. He gave it to the newsvendors of Liverpool on Tuesday, and it was favourable, his opinion being that the reduction of the price will result in enormously increased circulations, and that novelists will, in the main, produce the same sort of fiction for sixpence as they are now in the habit of producing for six shillings. His latter contention is probably right. One can no more imagine Mr. George Meredith imitating Mr. Hall Caine in order to please the multitude than one can imagine Mr. Hall Caine imitating Mr. George Meredith in order to please the elect. As regards the former point we have already given our reasons for doubting whether the conditions allow of such an extension of sales as would give writers in general any reason to rejoice; nor are we at all sure that such an extension of sales would be an unqualified advantage. Novel-reading is not the whole of life, and novels do not constitute the whole of literature; and if all the novels that appear, or even any appreciable proportion of them, were to sell in the huge numbers which Mr. Hall Caine contemplates, one could only conclude that a considerable number of people must be wasting on fiction a considerable amount of time that might be more profitably employed.

After Fleet-street there is no place more sacred to the memory of Dr. Johnson than Bath; and the meeting of the Johnson Club last Saturday, at the Castle Hotel, led to the revival of the many reminiscences of the lexicographer and his circle of famous friends who visited the town. During the proceedings M. Gennadius, the prior of the club, unveiled a tablet erected to the memory of Mrs. Thrale, and Mr. J. F. Meehan, the well-known Bath archaeologist, read a paper on "Dr. Johnson and his Bath Circle." Reynolds, Gainsborough, Gibbon, and Garrick were all connected with Bath, but Mr. Meehan naturally dwelt more upon the inner circle of Johnson's friends—Boswell, Mrs. Thrale, and Fanny Burney. Catherine Macaulay, the heroine of one of Johnson's most incisive retorts, was also an inhabitant of Bath. Some one had facetiously called Johnson's attention to the fact that she was very fond of dress, and even put on rouge. "It is better," he replied, "that she should be reddening her own cheeks than blacking other people's characters." Miss Burney is associated with Bath not only through her residence in the town, but for the vivid picture of the society life there which she drew in "Evelina." The reading of Mr. Meehan's paper was prefaced by an appropriate menu, including Johnson's favourite pudding of rump steak, kidneys, larks, and mushrooms.

In the course of his address to the Bibliographical Society on Monday evening Sir E. Maunde Thompson gave a very lucid and interesting sketch of the history of handwriting in England between A.D. 800 and 1400. At the earlier date there were two styles in use in this country—the semi-uncial hand, known generally as that of the school of Lindisfarne, which was in use throughout the north of England, and the uncial hand, brought into the south by the Roman missionaries. The origin of the former can undoubtedly be traced to Ireland, and its use was introduced at Lindisfarne by some of the Irish Monks from Saint Columba's foundation at Iona. The graceful half-uncial hand which was used with such success in Ireland had a longer life than any of the national styles brought into use in Western Europe, and the Book of Kells is a magnificent survival of this beautiful form of handwriting.

But, as education spread, the half-uncial hand had to give place to lighter and more convenient forms of calligraphy. The new form brought into use was distinguished mainly by its pointed and elongated characters. The MS. of Bede's Ecclesiastical History is the best specimen extant of the Anglo-Saxon handwriting of this period. From the numerous Charters in the British Museum it is discovered that this new form of handwriting underwent various modifications in the different kingdoms of the Heptarchy. It obtained its most artistic form in Mercia, while in Wessex it was characterized by heavy and rugged outlines. In the tenth century, however, the different forms in use in England began to approximate to one general standard, the finest example of which is contained in the Charter of Athelstane, dated 931.

From the date of the Norman Conquest the Anglo-Saxon forms became extinct, and the history of English handwriting follows somewhat closely the history of handwriting in Western Europe. The official Norman hand then brought into use was a round minuscule form. An excellent example of this "charter" hand is to be found in the Domesday Book, though a more beautiful specimen is the Cartulary of St. Swithin, written at Winchester about half a century later. The necessity for retaining certain English letters to express particular English sounds marks a difference between the Norman system used in this country and that used abroad. In the thirteenth century English handwriting attained its highest excellence. It was exact, round, firm, and uniform; but decadence set in in the fourteenth century by the introduction of a weak cursive hand.

Dr. George Ferdinand Shaw, who died last Monday, was a distinguished Irish scholar, and also a distinguished Irish journalist. He had been a Fellow of Trinity since 1848, and a Senior Fellow since 1890. It was expected that, if he had lived, he would have been elected to the Vice-Chancellorship, which is at present vacant. He began his connexion with journalism as a leader-writer on the Nation, had been joint editor of the Irish Times, editor of Saunders' News Letter, and principal leader-writer on the Evening Mail. Originally a Conservative, Dr. Shaw advocated Home Rule as a follower of Isaac Butt, but did not transfer his allegiance to the "forward" party subsequently organized by Mr. Parnell.

The publication of Prof. D. S. Margoliouth's pamphlet entitled "The Origin of the Original Hebrew of Ecclesiasticus" has had a startling effect on Biblical scholars, for the author of it aims at nothing less than the absolute overthrow of the almost universally received opinion that the Hebrew text found at Cairo represents the actual Hebrew composition of about B.C. 200. The controversy may possibly become very acute, but it is to be hoped that it will not assume the form of personal acrimony. We have authority for stating that the editors of the Cambridge and British Museum fragments respectively have as yet seen no cause whatever for a change of opinion. On the critical questions involved we will not touch here, but Mr. Israel Abraham's statement (in the Jewish Chronicle of June 16) that a great writer who died in 942 quotes the present text verbatim, would dispose of the theory that the Hebrew is a version made about A.D. 1000. This may lead Prof. Margoliouth to place the supposed translation a century earlier. But in any case the problem is a difficult one and demands the fairest consideration by each party of the arguments advanced on the other side.

In an article on "Parodies" to be found in another column reference is made to the curious "centones" made up of odd lines taken out of classical authors. In the Middle Ages it was the fashion to compile Bible stories in this manner out of Virgil or Homer. Nowadays students have, as a rule, better ways of spending their time; but a curious little book (Tyne, Stockport, 1s. n.) reached us the other day in which something of the kind is attempted, with the difference that a great number of authors are drawn upon, and the reference is given after each line, which rather interferes with the continuity of the sense, such as it is. "May" is the title of the book, and its author, Mr. I. D. Burton, describes it as a "poetic mosaic," which is said to consist of "one thousand nine hundred and twenty-eight lines from one thousand nine hundred and twelve authors." The quotations are arranged so as to make a new and original rhyming composition. As, for example:—

As the moon glitters coldly alone,
Marie Corelli : Song, "A Romance of Two Worlds."
A tired Queen with her State oppressed,
Jean Ingelow : "Divided."
Lying in the beauty of descended rest;
F. H. Trench : "Sonnet on Richard C. Trench."
From zones of deep heavens unknown,
M. Alinda Bonacci-Greene : "The Clock Tower."
The cloud-isles' rosy tips,
William Sawyer : "Painted Window."
Like phantom passenger ships.
J. T. Chapman : "In a Graveyard."

Do we not remember something of a similar kind, and rather more amusing, which began—

"I dreamt I dwelt in marble halls"
With "the dark girl dressed in blue"?

It is an ingenious exercise, and may have afforded the compiler an innocent pastime, which the contemplation of the printed and published result hardly succeeds in passing on to the reader.

A candid confession, interesting at once to authors and publishers, is contained in the latest report of the commissioners of the Chelsea Public Libraries :—

As the majority of books are somewhat expensive to purchase when new, it may be of interest to report that these books are usually bought in the second-hand market at a cheap rate : as, owing to the large part the reviewing of books now takes in the columns of the daily and weekly Press of all kinds, the "review copies" of new books soon come into the book-sellers' hands.

It is the sort of admission that makes authors and publishers angry ; but, if the practice educates the public up to insisting upon seeing new books as soon as they are published, it will do more good than harm. Free libraries are many, and free copies of expensive books are few, so that many free libraries will have, in the end, to go into the market and buy in the ordinary course.

One notices with satisfaction that the Library is acquiring a collection of prints and drawings illustrative of Chelsea topography, of which the commissioners speak with pride. In the absence of a municipal museum for London on the lines of the Musée Carnavalet at Paris, these local collections have a great interest and value, and the free libraries are at present the most convenient centres in which to accumulate them. The collection at Chelsea includes eighty-one drawings by Mr. W. W. Burgess, R.E., which are said to "afford a unique survey of the most historical and picturesque portions of the parish."

The Dean of Ely, in his sermon on Shakespeare, preached at Stratford-on-Avon on April 3rd in commemoration of his birth, and now published by Messrs. Cornish, of Birmingham, draws especial attention to the reverence for women shown by the poet. The theme is of course no new one. De Quincey even went to the extreme of calling Shakespeare "the absolute creator of female character." In comparing the heroines of Greek tragedy to those of Shakespeare, he says, "These are fine marble groups, but they are not the warm, breathing realities of Shakespeare ; there is no speculation in their cold marble eyes ; the breath of life is not in their nostrils ; the fine pulses of womanly sensibilities are not throbbing in their bosoms." With characteristic ingenuity De Quincey avoids all mention of the women of Homer and Virgil. To mention characters so lasting in their impression as Dido, Nausicaa, and Penelope was foreign to his object. He would have been on safer ground if he had confined himself to English literature. No English poet before Shakespeare gives us heroines of such genuine flesh and blood. Chaucer's "Prioress" presents a comely picture, but her character is subjected to no test. His Cressida is hardly more than the passive instrument of passion, the incarnation of physical beauty, mediæval, and not for all time. The Wife of Bath is a clever caricature. The women of Spenser are not so much individuals as the abstract impersonations of particular virtues or vices.

The book which Mr. William Stead, jun., has written on the "Art of Advertising" (T. B. Browne, 3s. 6d.) contains some interesting contributions to the history of that Publicity Department to which we devoted an article a fortnight since. Among other things Mr. Stead presents a facsimile of the earliest known Press advertisement, which was issued by William Caxton from the Almonry at Westminster. It ran thus :—

If it please any man, spiritual or temporal, to buy our pyes of two or three commemoratives of Salisbury use, emprinted after the form of this present letter, which been well and truly correct, let him come to Westminster into the Almonry at the red pole, and he shall have them good and cheap.

Some early examples of advertisements of books are also given. It will be seen that they differed, in many ways, from the announcements to be found in our own columns. Here is one from the Mercurius Politicus of October 4, 1648 :—

The Reader is desired to peruse A Sermon Entituled A Looking-glass for Lechers, preached at St. Peters, Pauls War, on Sunday, Sept. 24, 1648, by Paul Knell, Mr of Arts. Another Tract called A Reflex upon our Reformers, with a Prayer for the Parliament.

Here is one from the Mercurius Politicus for January, 1652 :—

Trenodia Gratulatoria, an Heroick Poem : being a congratulatory panegyrick for my Lord General's late return, summing up his successes in an exquisite manner. To be sold by John Holden, in the New Exchange, London. Printed by Tho. Newcourt, 1652.

The multiplication of magazines is another subject on which Mr. Stead enlarges. He tells us that there were only 220 magazines in 1837, and that there are now 4,276 ; and he states his opinion that the cheapening of the price has been attended by a "marked improvement in the appearance and contents." Our readers are aware that our own views are less optimistic ; but we have pleasure in pointing out to the magazine editors of the new school where at least one intelligent and sympathetic admirer of the pudding-basin-full-of-gelatinous-matter policy is to be found.

The Atlantic Monthly thinks America has had a little too much of the British novelist—not as a visitor and a friend, of course, but as a public reader. For one thing, the audiences do not listen ; they only say "Is that the great man who wrote what's its name? Well! he is not much to look at, is he?" But this is partly due to the suspicion that these "advertising pilgrimages" are undertaken by writers who have exhausted the patience of their native country, and the Atlantic Monthly warns the intending pilgrim against "lecturing people who are lectured, without alien aid, to the full measure of endurance, and telling stories to people who need restraint rather than example in such practices."

The interest of the hour, in literary circles in Scandinavia, is centred in the animated controversy arising out of the suppression of Dr. Edward Brandes' novel, "Det Unge Blod" (Young Blood), on the score of impropriety. As is usual in Scandinavia, where it is difficult, at any time, to discuss any issue apart from the personalities connected with it, the controversy has become somewhat of a party question, and all sorts of irrelevant issues have been dragged in. Some of the Norwegian critics had the bad taste to draw the name of Dr. George Brandes, who has always been on the side of what is admirable and best in letters, into the discussion. Each school has its champion. The followers of the older and staid school, who hold that certain subjects are unfitted for artistic treatment in the novel pure and simple, are met by the propagandist school with a problem on the end of their spear on the one side, and by the free lances who have "Art for art's sake," emblazoned on their banner on the other ; and now the question has reached the pamphlet stage.

The works of two other Danish writers were involved in the original attack—"Studenter" (Students), the first book of a writer calling himself Sören Jyde, and "Troskabsprøven" (The Test of Faithfulness), of the well known Peter Nansen. Dr. E. Brandes, as the leading critic of the paper Politiken, was first attacked for giving both books an undeservedly favourable notice, merely because they were Tendensromaner, running on the same lines as his own book—in fact, of holding a brief for books of this nature and misleading readers who looked to him for guidance. The last addition to the dispute is a brochure by Dr. Alfred Ipsen, containing a violent attack on Dr. Brandes and his following, called "Dr. Edward Brandes and Politiken—an open letter to the readers of Politiken." It is honest and well meant, and no doubt expresses the opinion of the bulk of the reading public, but it leaves the question of what is legitimate matter for artistic treatment exactly where it was before.

The English read more than the people of other countries ; but, according to a German journalist, Dr. Bernhardt, this is no evidence of superior culture—quite the reverse. For what do the English read? What sort of literature is it they devour in tramcars, waiting-rooms, railway carriages, and even at concerts and theatres in the intervals? Not literature at all, but fiction of the worst "backstage" type, which in Germany would be cast aside scornfully by any schoolgirl of thirteen. The doctor admits that a few good books are read by the minority. Biographies, if they are piquantly personal, and travels of an adventurous description are always in demand, but history (unless it relates to Imperialism and Empire-building) and philosophy are almost entirely neglected. Among the biographies and autobiographies which Dr. Bernhardt declares spring up in the English publishing market like mushrooms he singles out for praise Barry's "Life of Parnell," Mr. Sidney Lee's "Shakespeare," and Sir Duffy's (sic) "Life in Two Hemispheres."

At the fire at Penicuik-house, Midlothian, last week, many old and rare volumes were destroyed. The books burned included the "Breeches Bible." It was thought that the Bible which belonged to that redoubtable Scotswoman, famed in the annals of the Kirk of Scotland, Jenny Geddes, had also perished in the flames, but on an exhaustive search it was found among the débris.

The latest craze in the old-book world is for literature relating to the abolitionist movement, and high prices have recently been paid for mere pamphlets which a few months ago were thought little of. A demand is growing for anything relating to slavery as it existed in the United States from the time of Wilberforce to the War of Secession, the period thus covered being about the years 1789-1860. Proclamations announcing rewards for the recovery of runaway slaves, statutory enactments, books and pamphlets issued or published between the dates in question have increased enormously in value of late, and will soon be difficult to procure. Strangely enough, these old-time curiosities are being sought for principally in England, and some notable discoveries have recently been made. One was a pamphlet with a rude cut of a slave auction on the first page. It was bought at Lambeth Marshes for a few pence, and re-sold in New York for the equivalent of £5.

The sale by Messrs. Sotheby of the Wright collections of books, autographs, and prints which came to a conclusion last Monday was, of its kind, the most important that has occurred for some years. In many respects the collections were unique. The first three days were devoted to printed books, including the Dickens series to which reference was made last week, and the 838 lots fetched in the aggregate £8,690, a very high average; but, speaking generally, the prices obtained cannot be taken as general standards, for a large number of Mr. Wright's volumes possessed exceptional value, owing to the fact that they were presentation copies containing autograph notes, &c., from the authors. For instance, there is no second copy of Thackeray's "The Irish Sketch Book," first edition, presented, with an inscription, by the author to Mrs. Carlyle; and, therefore, the £61 paid for this book is not the market price of other copies of the same edition. But included in the sale were a few ordinary first editions of famous books, and for these high figures were obtained, especially for the works illustrated by Rowlandson and Cruikshank. The principal items in this class were:—Charles Lever, "Tale of the Trains," in the original parts, £18 10s.; W. Combe, "Dr. Syntax, Tours, &c.," the three series with coloured plates by Rowlandson, £33; Ackermann, "Microcosm of London," coloured plates by Rowlandson and Pugin, in perfect condition, and probably the finest copy ever sold at auction, £30; Thackeray, "The Second Funeral of Napoleon," the very scarce little book in drab paper covers, £29, "Vanity Fair," in original parts, £38 10s.; Grimm, "German Popular Stories," with etchings by Cruikshank, two vols., £68; "The Vicar of Wakefield," two vols., first edition in original calf, £63.

But the special feature of the collections was the "extra illustrated" books. A few fetched very high prices, but many were sold for less than they cost their owner to compile. Indeed, extra illustration is one of the most arduous and costly, and, at the same time, one of the least remunerative of hobbies. It has the effect too often of nearly destroying the value of a book as a book, for in overloading the pages with illustrations, which, however fine in themselves, have frequently little relevancy to the text, it reduces a work to little more than a literary curiosity. A typical example of this was the "Life of Sir Joshua Reynolds," two vols. extended to seven by the insertion of hundreds of splendid portraits and engravings and numerous autograph letters. This fetched £46, but a cursory glance at their contents showed that it must have cost very much more than that to make up the seven volumes which in their way formed one of the most interesting series in the whole of the sale. In the case of the "Life of Reynolds" every leaf—this is the practice of the thorough-going extra illustrator—had been taken out and separately inlaid, while every name of a person or place occurring in the letterpress was underlined with two lines in red ink, and on the opposite blank sheets were placed the illustrations bearing on the points underlined. Of the other notable "extra illustrated" volumes the principal were Morley's "Bartholomew Fair," one vol. extended to six, £101; "Life of Mrs. Jordan," two vols. extended to five, £190; "Life of Edmund Kean," two vols. extended to eight, £299 5s.; another copy, two vols. extended to four, £130; "Life of John Kemble," two vols. extended to eight, £170; Macready's "Reminiscences," two vols. extended to six, £77.

The final portion of the sale was taken up with the dispersal of a valuable series of autograph letters, the principal being a set of sixty-four letters of David Garrick in excellent condition which were offered at a reserve of £400, and were sold for £445. For letters of other theatrical celebrities the following were the highest prices paid: Mrs. Centlivre, a letter of 3 pp., £13 5s.; Colley Cibber, a letter of 2 pp., £17; Mrs. S. Cibber, a letter of 3 pp., £16 10s.; Kitty Clive, a letter of 2 pp., £26 10s.; G. F. Cooke, a letter of one page, £23; John Henderson, a letter of 3 pp., £25 10s. For the letters of literary men, for which the competition was keen, the best prices paid were: James Boswell, a letter of 4 pp., £18; Lord Byron, a letter of 4 pp., £17 10s.; Charles Churchill, a letter of 2 pp., £18; Goldsmith, a letter of 1 page, £20; Dr. Johnson, a letter of 2 pp., £26 10s.; Pope, a letter of one page, £2 6s.; Sir Joshua Reynolds, a letter of one page, £6 15s.; Richardson, a letter of one page, £6 15s.; Richelieu, a letter of one page, £4 17s. 6d.; Rousseau, a fine letter of 3 pp., £4 8s.; Scott, a letter of 4 pp., £10; Sheridan, a letter of 2 pp., £2; Mrs. Siddons, a long letter to Sheridan, £10 5s.; Smollett, a letter of one page, £6; Sterne, a letter of 2 pp., £10 5s.; Thackeray, a letter on two small octavo pp., £16; another of one page, addressed to Mark Lemon, with a rough sketch and eight lines of verse, £36. An octavo page of the MS. of "The Newcomes" went for £21 10s.; and "The Literary Club," list of the original members 1764, made out by Lord Stowell, first name on the list Sir Joshua Reynolds, £16 10s.

Another collection of books of a more special kind is in the market, consisting of 25,000 volumes and pamphlets on Political Economy belonging to Professor Foxwell. This library, which is the result of twenty years' assiduous collecting, and contains the work of many diametrically opposed thinkers in this most changeable of sciences, includes books from the libraries of Adam Smith, Arthur Young, and McCulloch. It would, as the Economic Journal suggests, "be an untold treasure for the new London University."

The copy of the third and last impression of Caxton's "Golden Legend," printed in 1493, most probably by Wynkyn de Worde, of which we gave some account in our issue of June 10, has been sold by Messrs. Hodgson, of Chancery-lane, for £99. The same firm have an item of interest to collectors of first editions of Mr. Kipling's works, which will be included in their sale to be held next week. It consists of thirty-five numbers of the Week's News—a periodical published at Allahabad between January 7 and September 15, 1888, each issue containing a contribution from Mr. Kipling, this being the earliest form in which many of his stories originally appeared. The paper is the first one which has been put up for sale by auction.

THE WIFE OF A POET.

The wife of a Poet, biographies show it, has happiness rich and rare ;

In rapturous revel he deigns to dishevel her carefully done back hair.

He calls her to listen, with glances that glisten, to songs of his sensitive soul,

While she is discerning by odours of burning, that Cook, with her fancies of penny romances, is finding a heaven with X 37, and dinner is done to a coal !

Oh, there's nothing that's weary or hard

In the life of the wife of a Bard ;

No maiden would choose to reject or refuse

The offer to marry a son of the Muse !

Her duty should bring her to cherish her singer with readiness prompt and gay

When nature beseeches for pines or for peaches, clear turtle or Crown Tokay ;

For him in a holder of jewels must smoulder cigars of a flavour unique,

And as for the payment for food and for raiment, if creditors claim it she never must name it, for if he should know it the sensitive poet would warble no more for a week !

For a singer's a flower in the sun,

And he shuts at the sight of a dun ;

The creditor storms and the creditor snees—

There's not any money in sons of the Muse !

A poet in passion must follow the fashion by choosing a love for life,

Some Beatrice, or a Petrarchian Laura, or somebody not his wife.

It's strictly de règle for her to inveigle the Bard into tropical rhyme ;

The wife, if neglected, must not be dejected or deeply affected, but try to be happy on prose that is scrappy and frequently snappy, and leave to her betters, the "onlie begetters," the sonnets and letters whose raptures and rages the subsequent ages will read in his pages, and weepingly wonder why destiny's blunder had torn him asunder from somebody fitted with him to be knitted if law had permitted and he could have fitted and quietly quitted the woman half-witted and not to be pitied who fettered his fancy sublime !

For the wife who would check or control

Such a beautiful union of soul,

Deserves to be slated in all the Reviews

For marring the life of a son of the Muse !

ADRIAN ROSS.

FICTION.

GERALD FITZGERALD THE CHEVALIER, by Charles Lever (Downey, 6s.), is a story of the days of the decline, and of the days when the decline had become a final fall, of the Young Pretender. The Pretender here pictured, however, is not the juvenile, handsome, and debonair Prince Charlie of the songs and tales of Hielan' lads and lasses ; but a Pretender whose bloated and drunken features spoke of the weak character that had failed to maintain the dignity of manhood as he had failed to uphold his cause. The son of this Pretender is the hero of the story—and no very striking hero either. One cannot help feeling a kind of pity for him ; but, truly, there is so much of fustian pride and melodramatic circumstance about his career that even this pity evaporates. Lever must have lost interest in him ; otherwise the fustian and the melodrama would have been given their artistic values. The Chevalier appears, disappears, and reappears in the course of the narrative in such curious wise, and often with hardly a word of warning, that the reader wonders what on earth the author is intending to do with him. It turns out, after all, that he is to be but the means by which a couple of Jesuits may scheme a little plan for the benefit of the Church ; and even that ends in nothing through his weakness, and with the help of a loaded blunderbuss in the hands of a drunken Father Kelly. As a story "Gerald Fitzgerald" will add little to Lever's fame. Indeed, we are of opinion that Lever himself had no very great notion of it, which will perhaps explain why it is that the story was passed over by him when he prepared his collected novels for a new issue. But there are in it some excellent pieces of writing—notably, the description of young Fitzgerald's interviews with Alfieri, and the chapter entitled "A Salon under the Monarchy." The character with which Lever seems to have taken most pains is that of Gabriel Riquetti, Comte de Mirabeau. If he be not the Mirabeau of history he ought to have been. "Gerald Fitzgerald" appeared serially in the Dublin University Magazine. The present is the first edition in book form in this country ; but we call to mind an American edition with, we believe, the imprint of the house of Harper Brothers.

IN VAIN, by Henryk Sienkiewicz, author of "Quo Vadis," translated by Jeremiah Curtin (Dent, 4s. 6d.), may be of interest to the admirers of Sienkiewicz as the first book of an author whose readers, the translator assures us, are counted by millions in the British Empire and America. He also adds that it is not included in the author's collected works—surely a poor reason for translating it. The astounding success of "Quo Vadis" as a book had its parallel in the success of the "Sign of the Cross" as a play ; and it is difficult to explain either, from any accepted standpoint of literary or dramatic criticism.

"In Vain" is in some ways a remarkable book for a youth of eighteen, but it is an étude de mœurs, too local in colour to be of general interest. It has none of the great scenic effects, none of the pageantry, the wealth of stirring incident of "Quo Vadis" or "With Fire and Sword." Those books were at least painted on large canvases with bold effects and brilliant colouring. In the present book, however, the characters of Augustinovich and Gustav are subtly depicted, and the life of the students, with the beauty of their dreams and the sordidness of their actual lives, is brought very vividly before us.

Whilst recognizing fully the difficulties of translation, one has a right to demand an English equivalent where a literal rendering is merely nonsense. To give an example : Augustinovich is telling Gustav of his meeting with a widow and daughter, the latter being a desirable match. He says :—

"I will advise them both to marry."

"The youngest thee?"

"What dost thou wish, my dear? A man grows old ; moreover, I think that we shall greet the soon with a hairy palm."

The italicized words explain our meaning—but will convey none to any of the million readers.

'POSTLE FARM, by George Ford (Blackwood, 6s.), has all the power of its predecessor, "The Larramys," without the latter's slightly overdone brutality. There are a few striking improbabilities in it, and a suspicion of insanity is a drawback to the most charming heroine. Moreover, rightful heiresses, concealed deaths and births, &c., belong to a feebler sensational school. But there is so much picturesqueness and force, and something so near originality without affectation about the style, that it is safe to class the book among those novels that will not die with the season.

AN OLD ROGUE'S TRAGEDY, by "Rita" (Hutchinson, 6s.), has much of the sprightliness and vivacity which we have come to associate with that lady's work. The novel, however, is of unequal merit. There are plenty of bright strokes in the book, occasional touches of pathos, and now and then a scrap of clever dialogue. The character of Molly Ronayne, the pure-minded and gentle ingénue, is sympathetically drawn—indeed, "Rita" is at her best when dealing with the more natural and simpler types of womanhood—and Aunt Patricson is a sufficiently creditable creation. "Rita" can at times write so well that we find it the more difficult to forgive her for writing badly; for instance, such solecisms as "garments disported by their wearers," "dim-lighted," &c., are almost as unpardonable as the following sentence:—

Aunt Patricson's anecdotes of the aristocracy was in itself a privilege almost worthy to be placed as an extra in the weekly accounts especially to American visitors, and Mrs. Wetherly viewed herself with magnanimous eyes for resisting the temptation.

The test of a tragedy lies, of course, in the answer to the question, "Is it inevitable?" and the tragical romance which Mr. Cecil Headlam has published under the title of THE SECRET OF SORROW (Macquenn, 6s.) does not, in our opinion, stand that test; the reason of the failure lying in the superficiality of the characterization. The psychological conception on which the story turns is strong, and new to English fiction—though there is something like it in one of the novels of M. Henri Rabusson—and we are willing to believe that the tragic conclusion would, granted a particular temperament on the part of the hero and heroine, follow from the premises. The trouble is that those temperaments are not delineated—are hardly even hinted at. We never get to know the personages presented. We are left to guess at their temperament from their tragedy, instead of being made to see that the tragedy was the outcome of the temperament—an inversion of the proper order of things in fiction. The book, however, abounds with irrelevant cleverness, and is far better written than the average novel. Mr. Cecil Headlam is a writer who is sure to do good work in the future, though he has yet to prove that fiction is the medium most appropriate to his talents.

AMERICAN STORIES.

The work of Annie Eliot Trumbull has already gained for her some reputation in America, but, so far as we are aware, MISTRESS CONTENT CRADDOCK (Allenson, 5s.) is the first of her books published in this country. Many will consider it dull, for it is practically devoid of action, but it contains some quaint humour and gives a pleasant picture of the early settlers in Massachusetts. Fiercely puritanical, they were, at the same time, terribly long-winded, but the author's style adapts itself naturally to theirs. Thus she writes:—

The girl looked down at the awkward and immature organism which had ceased, some hours earlier, to fight against its environment.

The organism is a young frog in a child's hand. Still, this story is written with much insight into character and sympathetic feeling.

THE STOLEN STORY AND OTHER NEWSPAPER STORIES (Sampson Low, 5s.) is evidently the work of an American. The book provides plenty of entertaining reading and throws light on the differences between London and New York journalism. The case, for example, of the Princeton graduate who, as soon as he had ceased to be "the wondrous half-back of the best football team in the Western Hemisphere," went into a newspaper office and was deputed to spend all his working hours at the docks, writing up "stories" about the dead bodies fished up by the harbour police, would be difficult to parallel on this side of the Atlantic. The account, too, of an orgy and a bonfire at Princeton is worth reading.

A pleasant gallery of characters appear in Mr. Opie Read's Tennessee romance, which he has called THE WATERS OF CANEY FORK (Innes, 6s.). As in "David Harum"—a book which presents more than one point of resemblance to this—we are introduced to one of those little townships which seem, by contrast with the monster mushroom-cities of America, even more old-fashioned than a sleepy English village. This is fit ground for some of those whimsical types which are handled so admirably by the better sort of American novelist. Luke Radshaw is a worthy example of the combination of shrewdness and tenderness which made Mr. Westcott's hero so engaging a personage; and the other members of his household are little less excellently drawn. Perhaps the doctor, who tells the story, is something too much of a prig; it is curious that the hero in "David Harum" was one of its least interesting characters. "The Waters of Caney Fork" is original, humorous, and true to life.

One is a little appalled by the preface which Mr. George W. Cable prefixes to his latest book, STRONG HEARTS (Hodder and Stoughton, 5s.):—

Taking that great factor of life, which men, with countless lights, shades, narrownesses and breadths of meaning, call Religion, and taking it in the largest sense we can give it; in like manner taking Poetry in the largest sense possible; this cluster of tales is one, because from each of its parts, with no argument but the souls and fates they tell of, it illustrates the indivisible twinship of Poetry and Religion; a oneness of office and of culmination which, as they reach their highest plane, merges them into identity.

For two of the stories hung on the thread of this idea we care little. Their careful workmanship and faithful execution does not save them from being dull. On the other hand, "The Solitary" is a powerful study, containing passages of great beauty. It is the history of a man who, in a desperate struggle against drink, deliberately cuts himself off from civilization and, unaided, fights and vanquishes the enemy. The night before the passing steamer takes him from his self-chosen retreat, the solitary holds a vigil.

On the islet the night deepened. The moon had not risen, and the stars only glorified the dark, as it in turn revealed the unearthly beauties of a phosphorescent sea. It was one of those rare hours in which the deep confessed the amazing numbers of its own living and swarming constellations. Not a fish could leap or dart, not a sinuous thing could turn, but it became an animate torch. Every quick movement was a gleam of green fire. No drifting, flaccid life could pulse so softly but it betrayed itself in low bent outlines. Each throb of the water became a beam of light, and every ripple that widened over the strand, still whispering "I have gone astray," was edged with luminous pearls.

The merit of the short stories in TATTLE TALES OF CUPID, by Paul Leicester Ford (Constable, 6s.), is to be found rather in elaboration of detail than in grandeur of conception. They only narrate such simple incidents of courtship and married life as are suitable for the public which subscribes to the American magazines; but the dialogue is bright and pleasant, though it generally stops short of being epigrammatic. Occasionally one comes upon a passage which, if the observation be true, brings into clear relief certain striking differences between English and American manners. Mrs. Atherton argued, in a recent novel, at some length that the alleged American chivalry towards women does not exist. One is reminded of this by Mr. Paul Leicester Ford's accounts of conversations at fashionable New York clubs, as, for instance:—

"Hello Tyler!" said the man his wife had refused, "don't mean to say you've actually ceased to be one of the 'submerged tenth'?" How and where is your superior moiety?"

"When I left Mrs. Tyler before her fire, ten minutes ago, she was very well."

"By George! If I had as clever and pretty a wife I don't think I should dare to leave her alone. I should be afraid of the other men."

Harry turned away to hide his frown; but, as he went towards the door of the billiard room, rejoined:—"Perhaps it wouldn't be safe with your wife."

"But you are not afraid, I understand," called the man irritably, "so I take it you won't mind if I drop round there for a few minutes this evening, eh?"

"Certainly not," responded Harry suavely, but gritting his teeth.

In England one would say that this is a lady novelist's account of the proceedings at a men's club; but Mr. Paul Leicester Ford is not a lady novelist.

Mr. Arlo Bates's novel THE PURITANS (Constable, 6s.) gives an admirable and amusing picture of men and things—material and psychic—in modern Boston. The characters are sympathetic and the wit and humour not far to seek.

CASTLE CZVARGAS, by Archibald Birt (Longman, 6s.), is "a plain story of the romantic adventures of two brothers, told by the younger of them." It is a nice little book, something after the "Lorna Doone" model without any too perilous likeness thereto. The style is easy and the sentiment fresh and wholesome.

THE FAILURE OF THE WANDERER, by Charles Denny (Constable, 6s.), seems intended for a mild variation of the "Sentimental Journey." It reminds us a little of "Then there came another locust and carried away another grain" in its succession of charming female puppets that take it in turns to dazzle the susceptible Wanderer. Occasionally there is a pretty and dainty episode, but more often the thing irritates. And Italian young women call their lovers "Carissima mia"—which is unusual.

Jean Delaire relates in A DREAM OF FAME (Long, 3s. 6d.) a simple and pretty story of a girl who dies because she is not allowed to live for painting; and G. E. Mitton's heroine in FIRE AND TOW (Hutchinson, 6s.) is blown up with dynamite on the last page for no other reason, obviously, than that a palmist had predicted she would never marry. However, she managed to crowd a good many experiences into her short hour of life, including that of driving a night hansom.

We are glad to see LALLY OF THE BRIGADE, by L. M'Manus, in Mr. Fisher Unwin's half-crown series of Popular Copyright Novels.

RECENT FRENCH FICTION.

At the present time no school of fiction predominates in France. While the idealistic novel, à la Sand, is quite out-of-date, the naturalistic school, the outcome of Flaubert's realism, is fast losing its hold upon the public, surviving merely in the rosserie of certain subjects. Historians of literature will, no doubt, call the last decade of the nineteenth century a period of transition. Yet what is most sought after appears to be a satirical representation of French society, with a curious elaborate psychology, almost pathology, as a background.

Foremost, of course, comes the picture of Paris life, mœurs parisiennes, as the phrase is, an excellent instance of which type of novel is found in M. Depardieu's "Anna." It is the love-story of a beautiful girl who rides a bicycle and is the daughter of an hotel-keeper somewhere near Ostend. She is also a swimmer and is rescued when in danger of drowning by young Roulers, the representative of an old family who have lost their money and retained their prejudices. Of course, the pair fall in love, to the consternation of old Roulers, who insults Anna's father and repents his rashness when he discovers that he has the title of Duke de Torrenuova and a large fortune. A curious character is that of Comte de Sarzac, a decadent poet, spiteful, vicious, talentless, with a mother in the pay of the secret police. Readers will exercise their sagacity in finding out the prototypes of these interesting wrecks of the old aristocracy.

The new aristocracy fares no better at the hands of M. Noë, the author of a fierce onslaught against the judges of the Third Republic. If we must believe him, the appointment of a judge is attended with very doubtful intrigues, in which the Protestants play the chief part, being the wire-pullers at the Ministry of Justice. Monsieur le Premier—i.e., the Presiding Judge—was once an attorney in an obscure provincial town; his marriage and his infamy secure him an appointment on the Bench. As he is unintelligent and vicious, he is involved in scandals, and saved only by the efforts of a Deputy, a financier, and his wife. Though arrested one day as a burglar in a house to which he paid frequent calls in the master's absence, the maid remaining at home, he is finally chosen as a Councillor at the Court of Cassation. He probably sits at the Chambre Criminelle, for the author seems to have little confidence in any but the judges who, like Monsieur de Ribeyrat, remain faithful to past ideals of government.

M. Schuré's "Double" brings us down to the people and is at the same time an instance of the scientific preoccupations of contemporary fiction. "Le Double" is a story of double personality. The painter Marrias is the victim of this distressing peculiarity which hinders the progress of his art. Another and more serious danger soon arises in the shape of Tenebra, the nickname he gives a woman who is destined to become his evil angel. But the good angel is near in the shape of a Flemish artisan and his piancée, a work-girl who sits as model for a wonderful picture that Marrias intends for the Salon. After some difficulty, the artist manages to stop on the downward path, and, as Tenebra fades out of his memory, his "double" disappears also. Ars vite salvatrix is the motto of this weird and effective novel. It is the author's first attempt at fiction, and a fair promise for the future. There is, however, now and then, a little lack of that supreme lucidity at which all Frenchmen aim in their writing, and there are a few insignificant failures in the nice adjustment of the different parts of the book, like so many stones in a variegated mosaic. But these are slight defects in a work which has notable qualities; a careful style, an intricate interweaving of symbol and reality, and very delicate shading in the evolution of the capital scenes.

With Jeanne Mairat, we are introduced into the American colony in Paris, "a small city in a large one—rather a village, with its rivalries and cliques"—and to some pathetic love-stories, of which "Sybil" is one; while M. Maisonneuve once more describes his favourite provincial tragedies and liaisons with Madame Bovary's granddaughters as heroines; and a writer, new and unknown to Paris criticism and reportage, signing himself "Arnault," attempts a very subtle and carefully-written psychological study, in which he pleads for love against mere contracts sanctioned only by the traditions or laws of a country with an eloquence worthy of the Duke of Monmouth in the Tower defending against the Bishops his love for Lady Wentworth.

M. la Jeunesse's latest effort aims at horrifying the reader at a great expense of imagination and rather cheap trickery of style. The story, it must be owned, fails to move us. That a littérateur cannot reach notoriety in Paris because he has no talent has little interest in itself, and that he should cry over a cat, to whom no one will give shelter, tempts us to play the Philistine. However, there is some freshness in the character of a Salvation Army girl, whose ideal is cheerful self-sacrifice; unfortunately, the closing scene in the hotel-kitchen adjoining the burnt-down charity bazaar is simply ghastly in its studied mixture of sensuality and horror. It is a proof of a singular lack of natural sensibility.

M. la Jeunesse is not the only novelist whose heroes are men of letters. Daniel Lesueur's recent study of actors' ways and lives would be most interesting if the hero, Essnault, was not a playwright. There is no greater bore in fiction than the man of letters. If we are to believe certain authors, there are only littérateurs in France. The type is becoming dreadfully commonplace. By definition a littérateur is incapable of playing an important part in a work of fiction, as he generally lives like a respectable bourgeois in a third-floor flat near the Étoile or the Luxembourg, and his adventures, when he has any save those in an editor's office or in his own study, possess singularly little interest. One is almost inclined to admit that Mlle. de Bovet is in the right in making all officers tender heroes and all men of letters or University professors villains. The former are brave and win women on whom they have set their eyes, the latter instil their venomous scepticism drop by drop into the public mind, and in return are deceived by womankind, Jacques de Montdauphin and Pierre Larive being the best representatives

- * "Anna." By Félix Depardieu. Ollendorff. Fr. 3.50.
- "Monsieur le Premier." By Michel Noë. Plon. Fr. 3.50.
- "Le Double." By Ed. Schuré. Perrin. Fr. 3.50.
- "Sybil." By Jeanne Mairat. Ollendorff. Fr. 3.50.
- "Louissette." By Maisonneuve. Plon. Fr. 3.50.
- "Pour Remettre à Franck." By Arnault. Ollendorff. Fr. 3.50.
- "L'inimitable." By Ernest la Jeunesse. Fasquelle. Fr. 3.50.
- "Comédienne." By Daniel Lesueur. Lemerre. Fr. 3.50.
- "Pris sur le vif." By Marie Anne de Bovet. Lemerre. Fr. 3.50.
- "L'innocente de Rochebignon." By Edouard Dupré. Perrin. Fr. 3.50.
- "Roberte." By Léon Barracand. Colin. Fr. 3.50.
- "Les Messieurs de Sérillac." By J. des Ferrières. Ollendorff. Fr. 3.50.
- "L'aiguille d'or." By J. H. Roeny. Colin. Fr. 3.50.
- "Le Sang des races." By Louis Bertrand. Ollendorff. Fr. 3.50.
- "Histoire mirifique de Saint Dodon." By Maurice des Ombiaux. Ollendorff. Fr. 3.50.
- "La Mongautier." By Ernest Daudet. Plon. Fr. 3.50.

of these two tendencies of national energy and national decadence.

It is curious that in Mlle. de Bovet's "Pris sur le vif" should be included a short story almost similar to a very remarkable novel, "L'Innocente de Rochebignon." The story that M. Dupré has to tell us, with singular power of touch and felicity of expression, is about an idiot girl. The first lesson nature teaches her is cruelty, when she strikes dead with a well-aimed stone a passing rabbit. She grows up, feels within her, as an instinct, an inborn motherly love. She nurses her child, and takes no heed of her seducer's marriage, till they tear her child away from her. An obscure idea of revenge then rises in her mind. She escapes from the madhouse in which she has been confined, and on the seducer's wedding-day murders the bride. In a lengthy preface the author says he has endeavoured to trace the development of infant humanity in the instance of an idiot. The book does not need philosophy to give it value. The simple, powerful way in which the tragedy is unfolded is enough to recommend it.

There is a singular contrast between M. Barracand's story, "Pour les Jeunes Filles," and Jean des Ferrière's tragedy of love, yet they are both interesting, and the former contains a bon mot worth recording—"Le mariage, c'est le baccalauréat des jeunes filles."

The French novel has kept up with the movement of colonial expansion, M. J. H. Rosny going at one bound as far as South Africa and the Transvaal. The boulevardier's sole idea of that distant land is that evoked by gold mining companies which come to grief in the vicinity of the Rue Vivienne. To M. Rosny the same word means wild mountains, vast tracts of sand, and adventures. His hero is a young chemist who, having discovered in some family papers the proof that one of his ancestors emigrated to South Africa at the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes, carrying along with him enormous wealth, sets out with the intent of recovering it and baffling a certain "Mister Skill," a wicked Englishman who is also in pursuit of the treasure. The treasure has been buried in the mountains, but the chemist has found out the way of giving magnetic power to a gold needle. The needle will point out the spot where the treasure lies. After some delightful and varied adventures, and a glimpse at Oom Paul and General Joubert, the treasure is recovered and restored to the rightful heirs.

M. Bertrand writes on North Africa, and a very curious study he publishes about the Spanish element in Algiers. The novel, which appeared at first in the Revue de Paris, is the life of a waggoner on the road between Constantine and the interior. Rafael is a singular type of M. Drumont's constituents. His splendid violence, his brutality, his lack of elementary moral sense are in sharp contrast with the polished, almost effeminate, manners of the French settler. Rafael's love adventures are innumerable, and all of an equally unsavoury character. He could never bring himself to understand the Frenchwoman who kept the inn on the road; she had too nice a sense of a certain primitive honour quite foreign to his mind. Then he had the habit of knifing his rivals or hurling sharp flints at them. Finally, he married a Spanish girl. His astonishment at the contrast between the misery of Spain when he visited his native land and the opulence of the French colony is quite amusing. It is significant that he declined to be called a Frenchman. There is another unlooked-for scene when Rafael's fiancée's father invites together the Spanish priest and the Spanish exiled Protestant pastor. They discuss theology in the most courteous and most satisfactory way. But the pastor makes few proselytes. His countrymen are not of an Evangelical turn.

With M. des Ombiaux we are carried away to Flanders. Saint Dodon is a popular saint in M. des Ombiaux's country, although not acknowledged officially by the Church. He was a wealthy merchant's son, diligently studied the art of writing and illuminating manuscripts, but had a strange way of qualifying himself for beatification. His favourite resorts were the marketplace and the tavern. He would sing, discuss questions of art, and eat and drink copiously. In his own town he sat on the Bench as a judge, and always acquitted the malefactors that were brought before him. One day he received an invitation to a banquet prepared in his honour, and he accepted. Dodon's conversion was charming; like the Abbé Prévost (whose adventures, by the way, M. Schroeder has just recounted afresh in an attractive little volume published by Hachette, which, even after M. Harrisse's work, throws much fresh light on the obscure career of the author of Manon Lescaut), he passed quite naturally from the tavern to the monastery, his jovial temper never forsaking him. Flanders is evidently not the proper soil for Puritan growth. M. des Ombiaux must be congratulated for sounding, amidst the general pessimism of the novel, a note of irony and gentle humour.

M. Ernest Daudet's work we have left for the end, because it takes us out of contemporary life and carries us as far back as the French Revolution. La Mongautier was an actress who married a Royalist officer, escaped from General Hauriot the Montagnard, and was beloved by the Girondin Dolissalde.

The whole period of the Terror centres, as it were, around her. M. Ernest Daudet turns to good account his considerable acquaintance with the period. Truth and fiction are continually interwoven. None but a well-informed student of the Revolution could have given so graphic a description of the debates in the Convention, the threatening aspect of the mob and soldiers, and the dramatic but futile sortie of Hérault de Séchelles, the President, with all the Deputies, trying to rouse the people against the factious soldiers. In the Pyrenees we have a glimpse of Deputy Cavaignac, an ancestor of M. Cavaignac, and his revolutionary fanaticism.

Such are the chief novels published recently in Paris. What seems to predominate in fiction is an anxious search for new subjects. The colonies will not yield many, and authors have no liking for the past. In spite of their efforts their horizon is generally narrowed down to dissolute and idle Parisian society. They appear, most of them, to ignore the existence of thousands of hard-working human beings, whose humanity is as intense as that of the tired Boulevardier, the cocotte, or the vain, affected littérateur. Over a hundred years ago, in the preface to the first interesting novel ever written in French, Marivaux said that "the most fastidious would not be displeased to see what man was in a coachman, and woman in an obscure haberdasher." Modern authors might follow this sound advice. Daudet has shown how the most homely subject can be made to yield pathos, and Maupassant proved that art is not incompatible with the study of bourgeois psychology. The story of Désirée Delobelle, and that of Pierre and Jean are worth the whole output, with very few exceptions, of contemporary fiction. Later, M. Bourget will be charged with having brought about a serious decadence of the novel. It may be laid down as a rule that the further a novelist departs from the observation of everyday life, the more he detracts from the artistic value of his work.

NOTES ON THE DICKENS SALE.

[By F. G. KITTON.]

Mr. Wright's famous Dickens collection, of which some account has already been given in Literature, numbered 222 lots, these comprising no less than 582 separate items, the whole of which realized the aggregate sum of £3,515. Certain copies of first editions were by no means immaculate, which seems strange in face of the asseveration (so emphatically stated in the catalogue) that Mr. Wright generally had the first offer of anything that was to be sold privately, and that no price ever frightened him—which is tantamount to saying that he had the pick of the market. A passing allusion must also be made to the sad want of taste displayed in some of the special bindings, and of the vulgarizing effect of crude attempts at paginal decoration, such superfluity being particularly noticeable in the case of Forster's enlarged "Life of Dickens." Among the unpublished autograph letters I detected one by George Cruikshank possessing a peculiar interest, inasmuch as he there favourably alludes to his distinguished contemporary, "(H)ablot K. Brown(e)," the artistic "exponent-in-chief" of Dickens' writings. Replying to a query from a correspondent (July 9th, 1864), he says:—"The 'Pickwick Papers' are not illustrated by me—they are only clever imitations of my style of illustration; the first plates are by an artist of the name of Seymour, who committed suicide whilst the work was in progress, and the remaining plates were by that very clever artist, Abbot Brown ('Phiz')." There is also an unpublished letter from Dickens to Edward Chapman (1847) respecting the frontispiece to the first cheap edition of "Pickwick," where he states that the artist, C. R. Leslie, R.A., was unable to draw it himself upon the wood block, so that it would have to be "timbered" under his (Leslie's) direction. By a coincidence Mr. Wright succeeded in acquiring the identical painting by Leslie to which the foregoing letter refers—a small picture in monochrome, representing that memorable scene, the discovery of Mr. Pickwick holding in his embrace the half-fainting form of Mrs. Bardell; at the Dickens sale in 1870 this painting realized the sum of 131 guineas—more than eight times the amount at which it was knocked down last week. Another interesting item among the pictures is the sketch-portrait of Dickens by W. P. Frith, R.A., a study for the finished portrait executed by this artist in 1859 for John Forster, who bequeathed it to the South Kensington Museum. When preparing for publication my volume, "Charles Dickens by Pen and Pencil," I desired Mr. Frith to favour me with some particulars concerning the production of this sketch, and, odd to relate, he declared that he never made any study for the completed portrait, but expressed himself willing to examine it and to sign it if he recognized his handiwork. The sketch was accordingly submitted and immediately identified by the artist, who, according to promise, appended his signature, thus authenticating the picture and enhancing its value.

John Leech was well represented, and of the characteristic examples of his skill here gathered together the most valuable were bound up in a copy of the first edition of "The Chimes." These consisted of four original designs for that work and an unpublished drawing; one of the four is the artist's first sketch for the illustration entitled "Richard and Margaret," where, in the lower portion of the design, he wrongly depicted Richard as a kind of dissipated Trotty Veck—an error happily detected in time for correction, although not until the block had been engraved; the unused drawing was intended to illustrate page 77 of the little book, where is described the meeting of Trotty Veck with Will Fern and Lillian.

The original MS. of "The Battle of Life" (which changed hands at £400) discloses the fact that the composition of the story caused the author much trouble, as indicated by the numerous alterations and interpolations; and no wonder, when it is remembered that he was simultaneously occupied with "Dombey and Son," amidst uncongenial surroundings. We are told in the catalogue that the MS. of "The Battle of Life" is one of three MSS. not at South Kensington, the other two being the "Christmas Carol" and "Our Mutual Friend." This, however, is not quite accurate, for there exists a fourth MS., that of "Great Expectations," which the author presented to the Rev. Chauncy Hare Townshend, who bequeathed it to the Museum at Wiesbaden. I have elsewhere recorded the mysterious disappearance of the original MS. of Dickens' last Christmas Book—"The Haunted Man; or, The Ghost's Bargain," which is believed to have been destroyed. It was my privilege to unearth the Petty Cash Book kept by the future novelist during the time he acted as an office lad in a lawyer's office—Messrs Ellis and Blackmore's—in 1827-8. Many of the names of clients and others recorded in the book afterwards appeared slightly altered in Dickens' stories. I also claim the discovery (in the same sense) of another interesting MS.—viz., that described as Dickens' Only Contribution to Punch, entitled "Dreadful Hardships endured by the Shipwrecked Crew of The London, chiefly for want of Water." This, I am enabled to say, was never published in Punch, but at about the date of its production (1849) there appeared in its pages several pictorial allusions dealing with the subject of Dickens'

MS.—viz. the deplorable condition of the water supply in various parts of the Metropolis.

The miscellaneous items included two copies of "The Loving Ballad of Lord Bateman," with Cruikshank's illustrations. The authorship of this version of an ancient ballad and of the accompanying Notes has given rise to much controversy, and whether Dickens or Thackeray was responsible for them is still a matter of conjecture, although what little evidence there is seems to favour Thackeray. Respecting another little production entered in the catalogue under "Dickens," viz., "More Hints on Etiquette," 1838, I have already pointed out elsewhere that there is not sufficient justification for attributing the authorship to him. A few years ago Mr. Wright picked up an original manuscript in the autograph of George Cruikshank, containing the outlines of this very production, and with it were bound up several autograph letters and a page of MS. by Dickens, the latter purporting to be a portion of the work in question, but, after careful examination, I found that it formed no part of it, while the style of the letter-press in no way resembled that of Dickens. The authorship of a pamphlet entitled "A Curious Dance Round a Curious Tree," 1860, has also been attributed to Dickens, and, being scarce, has fetched a high price; the copy in the Wright collection realized but a few shillings, and rightly so, for the actual author of the little essay was W. H. Wills, notwithstanding the fact that the title-page bears the name of Charles Dickens, who doubtless had something to do with it in his editorial capacity when the paper first appeared in Household Words.

A curious document, which may be classed with the personal mementoes of Dickens, is a probably unique impression, on a broad sheet with gold borders, of the Articles of Agreement relating to "The Great International Walking Match," which took place in America on February 20, 1868, between George Dolby and J. R. Osgood. The description of the event, printed as above, was written by Dickens in a sporting style, and the document bears his signature as well as those of Dolby, Osgood, and J. T. Fields. This literary curiosity originally belonged (I believe) to Mr. Dolby.

Correspondence.

MME. BERNHARDT'S HAMLET.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—After thanking you for your interesting article on a great literary event of this month, Madame Bernhardt's performance of Hamlet, may I use a little of your space to clear up some doubts that seem to have arisen about the correctness of the traditional rendering of that character.

"H. H. F." accounts for much in the sentence, "It is highly probable that if we in England had only the French translation to go by, we should read it very much in the same way as Madame Bernhardt," but not only has the interpretation to be accounted for, but also its ready acceptance by some of our critics, and notably by one whom readers of the Morning Post have recognized before as a sincere and usually discerning admirer of Madame Bernhardt. I would go further than "H. H. F." to account for this, and say that, if a public puts its whole interest in acting versions, whether French or English (and we have lately been shown how much they differ from the real Hamlet), it might in time become acquainted with a Hamlet not differing much from Madame Bernhardt's. Few people read their Hamlet from first to last frequently; they read special scenes; but the whole is perhaps less read than many of the other popular plays on this very account, that acting versions of it are more frequently represented. And we know how acting versions are manufactured, how a manager loves to see the action roll on to the climax, how episodes disappear, how a play to be considered presentable must be made "brisk." And, if so, it seems likely that an acquaintance with these versions to the neglect of the long ramble of the book is the basis of an enthusiastic sympathy with what upsets a tradition undoubtedly tested by time and much critical acumen.

To strengthen our old and cherished ideas it is only necessary to read through the play, not omitting the additions of the "First Quarto." What action could be more rambling? What play less successfully fitted at the technical joints? How many fallings off from incepta, how many clearly and decisively expressed purposes forgotten even as the words die! Some critics, indeed, seem to think that if Hamlet expresses in words a firm purpose, e.g.,

Yea! from the tablet of my memory
I'll wipe away, &c. Act I., Sc. v., on that account he loses his character as "thinker" and becomes the "man of action." But the test lies in the action. And as he invariably fails to suit the action to the word, I would refuse him the "mind of perfect balance" one critic allows him. As my object has been rather to account for the acceptance of such a rendering than to prove its falsity, though I am unable to open my Hamlet without finding proof upon proof of the correctness of the old reading, I will only quote from an excellent letter of the Ghost of Hamlet's father, dated from Elysium, and published in the Morning Post of the 17th:—"Does Master Wilkinson mind him of this? 'This visitation,' I said, 'is but to whet thy almost blunted purpose.' And my tardy son knew it well. 'Lapsed in time and passion' he described himself."

Yours sincerely,

Croydon.

JNO. J. McADAM.

ENGLISH HEXAMETERS.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—I am glad to find this subject still excites correspondence. Mr. Tarelli may rest assured that I spoke after study of his Persephone volume, referring perhaps mainly to the Song of Arrival and Departure. I cannot suppose him equally familiar with my two pamphlets, but we seem to differ little in conception of metrical law, and I subscribe to nearly every word of his concluding paragraph. His ear tells him that quantity plays a part in English verse—a subordinate but still valuable part. He knows, therefore, that "taciturn" is rather a doubtful dactyl, though another critic is ready to defend it. This does not imply that there was anything wrong in using it where he did; the point is merely whether our scansion is adequate. My own view is that terms like dactyl and trochee may still be used for convenience' sake, but that they must be understood in a looser and wider sense in English, referring to time rather than to syllables or even accents.

This partly answers Mr. Stillman's question. Certainly the two cases should not be "confounded." But neither should they be artificially separated, as if accent were everything in English and quantity nothing. The boundary between reading and chanting verse varies with each person; Tennyson, for instance, more than half sang his lines. How is it possible to read Homer aloud, "always holding to the accents," and yet maintain the hexametrical rhythm at all? Did the "educated Greek" of Mr. Stillman's most apposite example not read Homer, as so many people do our blank verse, precisely as if it were prose? Such reading may be convenient for giving the sense of a passage, but, strictly considered, it is surely not reading poetry at all. The sound of the lines, as well as the sense of the words, must be represented in any adequate rendering of a poem.

As for spondees in English, is it not the truth that we have hardly any perfect accentual spondees at all? Words like black-beaked, fair-haired, &c., may have a spondaic sound when pronounced singly, but in a sentence they tend to become trochees. Southey pointed this out long ago, and it seems undeniable. The use to be made of this fact is a matter for poets rather than grammarians to settle. It does, however, seem to accentuate the hopelessness of really reproducing classical metres on an accentual basis.

All this discussion fails to throw light on the question with which we began. Is Mr. Stone justified in saying that Latin metre (leaving Greek aside as more difficult) was essentially based on a contrast of accent and quantity, a playing-off of one against the other; and that this opposition can be detected in our own verse? This seems to me the foundation of his pamphlet, on its aggressive side at least. I should much like to know if scholars are prepared to admit these premises. For, if the premises be taken as true, it will apparently require no little ingenuity to escape the conclusions drawn.

I am, Sir, &c.,

T. S. OMOND.

P.S.—In your last issue Mr. Lancaster follows the more excellent way of practice, with verse which shows true natural regard for quantity as opposed to artificial exaltation of it into a dominant principle. But I agree with Mr. Tarelli that the plastic work of a great poet is required before this metre can be to us more than a scholarly exercise.

May I suggest to Mr. Rose that the later poems of both Tennyson and Mr. Swinburne might lead him to modify his unfavourable opinion of long lines; and to Mr. Bateson that "admits" is scarcely the word to describe my attack on the whole theory of strict feet (whether accentual or quantitative) in our elastic English verse? But I must not trespass further on your space.

"AND SHALL TRELAWNY DIE?"

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Here are Mr. Hawker's own statements about the ballad, anent which there is a somewhat misleading note in a recent issue of Literature :—

With the exception of the choral lines—

"And shall Trelawny die?"

Here's twenty thousand Cornish men
Will know the reason why!"

and which have been, ever since the imprisonment by James the Second of the seven Bishops—one of them Sir Jonathan Trelawny—a popular proverb throughout Cornwall; the whole of the song was composed by me in the year 1825. I wrote it under a stag-horned oak in Sir Beville's Walk, in Stowe Wood. It was sent by me anonymously to a Plymouth paper, and there it attracted the notice of Mr. Davies Gilbert, who reprinted it at his private press at Eastbourne under the avowed impression that it was the original ballad. It had the good fortune to win the eulogy of Sir Walter Scott, who also deemed it to be the ancient song. It was praised under the same persuasion by Lord Macaulay, and by Mr. Dickens, who inserted it at first as of genuine antiquity in his Household Words, but who afterwards acknowledged its actual paternity in the same publication.

The lines Macaulay quotes in his History are those which Mr. Hawker himself says have been popular in Cornwall since the imprisonment of the Bishops. "All over the country," Macaulay says, "the peasants chanted a ballad of which the burden is still remembered: the miners from their caverns re-echoed the song with a variation :—

Then twenty thousand under ground will know the reason why."

And Macaulay adds a note :—

This fact was communicated to me in the most obliging manner by the Reverend R. S. Hawker, of Morwinstow in Cornwall.

In Mr. Baring Goult's memoir of Mr. Hawker he states :—

One of these, his "Song of the Western Men," was adapted to the really ancient burden—

And shall they scorn Tre, Pol and Pen?
And shall Trelawny die?
Here's twenty thousand Cornishmen
Will know the reason why!"

These verses have so much of the antique flavour that Sir Walter Scott, in one of his prefaces to a later edition of the "Border Minstrelay," refers to them as a remarkable example of the lingering of the true ballad spirit in a remote district; and Mr. Hawker possessed a letter from Lord Macaulay in which he admitted that, until undeceived by the writer, he had always supposed the whole song to be of the time of the Bishops' trial.

It is so often stated that Macaulay was hoaxed into believing that "Shall Trelawny Die?" was an old ballad, and so often positively asserted that Mr. Hawker wrote "Shall Trelawny Die?" that it seems worth while to state anew the actual facts.

I am, &c., I. STEPHEN.

DAVID, EARL OF HUNTINGDON.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Re David, Earl of Huntingdon, the correction by "The Writer of the Note" in your issue of June 3rd calls my attention, albeit at a somewhat late date to his original letter to you in Literature of May 13th. As the publication of his last communication argues a desire for something approaching accuracy in this matter, I venture to suggest that he remodel his contribution so as to embody the following facts.

(I.) H.M. Queen Victoria is directly descended from this David, Earl of Huntingdon, through his second daughter Isabella, who married Robert Bruce, Earl of Carrick. The great-grandson by this marriage was that Robert Bruce who became King of Scotland. This Robert married a second wife, Isabella of Mar, and the offspring of this union, a daughter, Marjory, married Walter Fitzalan, the Steward, and so became the ancestress of the royal line of Stuart and our present Sovereign.

(II.) William the Lion was succeeded by Alexander II., his son by Emma of Denmark, and not a younger brother of David as stated in the paragraph. David was uncle to Alexander II.

(III.) Alexander II. was succeeded by his son, Alexander III. This king married Margaret, daughter of Henry III. of England, and this alliance did not lead to the union of the two crowns. More than two centuries later, another Margaret, daughter of Henry VII. married James IV. of Scotland, and after his death, Archibald Douglas. James I. of England was the descendant of both these marriages, and heir, by right of his descent from Margaret, to the English Throne.

In conclusion, may I ask you to forward to your correspondent the accompanying genealogical chart, in which, as compiler, I may be pardoned for thinking, the whole matter is shown with some clearness?

With many apologies for the length of this letter,

I am, Sir, yours obediently,

JNO. KELLY BATHURST.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—It has been suggested that I might amplify the statements in my Note "from a correspondent" which appeared in Literature of May 13th, and my letter published in your issue of June 3rd, with reference to the position in history of the David, Earl of Huntingdon, who founded the Grammar School of Huntingdon. This David, it may be pointed out, must not be confounded with David I., King of Scotland. Sometimes they are confused; indeed, the error of the Grammar School Committee probably originated in such confusion. David I. was the grandfather of the founder of the Huntingdon School. He died in 1153, predeceased by his son Henry, who, however, had left three sons—Malcolm, William, and David. Malcolm (the Maiden) succeeded his grandfather, and on his death, in 1165, was succeeded in his turn by his brother William (the Lion). William, on his death in 1214, was succeeded by his son Alexander II. The latter married Joan of England, but the marriage was unfruitful. He subsequently married Mary, daughter of Enguerrand de Coucy, and on his death in 1249 was succeeded by his son Alexander III., who was born of this second marriage. Alexander III. married Margaret, daughter of Henry III. of England; but on the death of their granddaughter, the Maid of Norway, what has been called the Scotch-Norman House came to an end. Then came the famous contest by about a dozen competitors for the Scottish crown.

But to return to the founder of the Huntingdon School, who, it may be mentioned in passing, had a most romantic career. As I pointed out in previous communications Prince David never was King. Several of the competitors for the crown, however, and notably Baliol and Bruce, based their claims on their descent from him. David had married Matilda, daughter of Ranulph, Earl of Chester. Margaret, his eldest daughter, married Allen of Galloway, and John de Baliol was a descendant of this union. David's second daughter, Isobel, was married to Robert de Brus or Bruce, and their descendant, Robert the Bruce, became King of Scotland. By the marriage of Marjory, daughter of King Robert, with Walter Fitzalan, the Steward, came the House of Stewart (the spelling Stuart was not adopted till the time of Mary, Queen of Scots).

The union of the crowns was due to the marriage in 1502 of James IV. of Scotland and the Princess Margaret of England, eldest daughter of Henry VII. A century after this marriage the great-grandson of James IV. became King of England.

I am, &c., THE WRITER OF THE NOTE.

THACKERAY'S ESMOND.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—"B.'s" pedigree of the Esmond family is not quite correct. Eugene, 2nd Earl of Castlewood, was the son of Frank's first wife (The Virginians, c. xvi.), and Harry Warrington never married Hester Lambert. He did marry Fanny Mountain, and when she died he was persuaded to propose for Hester, who refused him (Virginians, c. xlii.).

Your obedient servant, LEWIS BEARD.
7, Spencer-road, Coventry, June 18.

Authors and Publishers.

The catalogue of the library of the late Mr. Gleeson White is now ready, and will be forwarded on application to Mr. A. Lionel Isaacs, 16, Shaftesbury-avenue, W., where the books are now on sale in aid of the widow. A special limited edition of the catalogue has also been printed (2s.), containing a portrait, two views, and a memorial tribute by Professor York Powell.

Mr. Ashton, an ex-constable and a Welshman, has just been awarded a pension of £40 per annum from the Treasury on account of his services to literature. These have taken the shape of gaining several prizes at different Eisteddfod competitions, and of the authorship of a biography of Bishop Morgan. At the present moment he is engaged upon a bibliography of his native country.

The Studio's extra summer number will contain the text of the Masque entitled "Beauty's Awakening," to be given before the Lord Mayor at the Guildhall, and illustrations of many of the designs for the costumes, stage accessories, &c., which have been specially made for it by members of the Art Workers' Guild.

Mr. Richard Marsh writes from Hotel Quisisana, Wiesbaden, June 19:—

My story, "Philip Bennion's Death," now being announced by Messrs. Ward, Lock and Co. as a "new novel at 3s. 6d.," was issued by that firm some three years ago at 1s. Why they are reissuing it as a new novel in its present form I cannot say. The copyright not being mine, I have no voice in the matter.

I shall be obliged if you will let me add that no volume containing new work of mine has appeared since "The Beetle" in September, 1897, and that the first story I have written since then will be published by Messrs. H. V. White and Co. in September of this year.

A life of the Empress Josephine will appear this Autumn, written by Frédéric Masson and translated into English by Mrs. Cashel Hoey. The illustrations will contain many portraits of great interest. The book will be issued by Goupil and Simpson, Marshall, uniform with "Marie Antoinette," &c., as part of Messrs. Goupil's well-known English Historical Series.

In their series of Modern English Writers, of which we review the first volume—on Matthew Arnold—in another column, Messrs. Blackwood will shortly publish the second, on Stevenson, by Mr. L. Cope Cornford. The remaining volumes in the series will be issued as nearly as possible in the following order:—"Ruskin," by Mrs. Meynell; "George Eliot," by Mr. Sidney Lee; "Tennyson," by Mr. Andrew Lang; "Froude," by "John Oliver Hobbes"; "Huxley," by Mr. Edward Clodd; "Thackeray," by Mr. Charles Whibley; "Browning," by Mr. Augustine Birrell; and "Dickens," by Mr. W. E. Henley.

"Sea Dogs" is to be the title of a series of books edited by Mr. L. W. Lyde; and mainly composed of original documents dealing with the Age of Drake, of Blake, of Hawke, and Nelson. The Drake volume, which goes to press this week, contains extracts by John Fox, Richard Clarke (Sir Humphrey Gilbert's Captain on the Delight), Philip Jones, John Evesham, Raleigh, Thomas White, &c. The Blake will also shortly be in the press.

Mr. W. Lyde is also editing "Man and his Work"—an introduction to Human Geography—by Dr. Herberton the new Reader in Geography to the University of Oxford.

A book dealing with the history of the Scottish capital, its places, and its people, from the pen of an Edinburgh lady, Katharine F. Lockie, is to be published shortly under the title "Picturesque Edinburgh." It is to contain over five hundred illustrations.

The proprietor of Byron's birthplace at 24, Holles-street, Mr. John Lewis, is, we believe, about to affix to the exterior a memorial tablet, in the form of a bas-relief, in memory of the poet.

An edition de luxe of his letter "J'accuse," specially printed at the celebrated house of Christophe Plantin, and specially bound by M. Jacques Moisey, is to be presented to M. Zola by the journalists of Antwerp.

Among the manuscripts left by Theodor Fontane is a complete translation of Hamlet. It was probably made about 1850.

Mr. Adnah David Jones writes from Oxford:—

In the review of "The History of South America from its Discovery to the Present Time" in Literature of June 17 the translation is attributed to Miss Adnah D. Jones. It should be Mr. Will you kindly rectify this error? He is also the translator of Félix Cadet's "Port Royal Education" and of M. Gaston Boissier's "Cicero and his Friends," which he signed.

The publication by Mr. Grant Richards of Miss E. M. Clerke's "Fable and Song in Italy," announced for May, has been postponed until June 27th.

Mr. Horace Wyndham, whose book "The Queen's Service" we recently reviewed, is preparing a further volume of sketches of military life, to be called "Soldiers of the Queen."

Messrs. Methuen announce for September the biography of Sir John Millais.

The ninth volume of Miss Hetherington's useful "Annual Index to Periodicals," covering the year 1898, is now in the press.

In connexion with the Universal Exhibition of 1900 arrangements are being made for an international congress dealing with the history of religions. It will consist of eight sections, and almost all the religious beliefs of the known races of men past and present will be brought under review. Among the most interesting subjects are totemism, the function of sacrifice in the religion of savages, the historical evolution of Buddhism in China, funeral rites in ancient Egypt, the deities of the early Semites, the myths contained in the Homeric poems, and the origin of the principal Germanic deities. The eighth section deals with the history of Christianity, but discussions on dogma and the confessional are excluded. Circulars have been sent out early so as to secure the thorough preparation of papers by scholars and religious thinkers. Besides French the following languages may be used, Latin, German, English, and Italian.

Mr. Heinemann has nearly ready "The Market Place," the last novel written by the late Mr. Harold Frederic. "The Market Place," deals with the position of the Stock Exchange in the social life of the day, and is an elaborate study of the world of finance. Harold Frederic finished the story some months before his death when staying on the south-west coast of Ireland.

Messrs. Sampson Low, Marston are publishing in book form a selection from the "Interviews with Mr. Migs," which have appeared in the Pall Mall Gazette. The author is Mr. Alexander Stuart.

"The Craze of Christina" is the title of Mrs. Lovett Cameron's new novel, which Mr. John Long will publish at once. Mrs. Lovett Cameron has been writing steadily now for twenty years, and is engaged on another new novel for the same publisher. She is the wife of Mr. H. Lovett Cameron, elder brother of the late Commander Verney Lovett Cameron, R.N., C.B., who some twenty years ago traversed alone the whole continent of Africa from east to west. Her recent novel, "A Fair Fraud," published by Mr. John Long, is now in its fifth edition.

LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

ART.
Portraiture in Recumbent Effigies and Ancient Schools of Monumental Sculpture in England. By Albert Hartshorne. 94 pp. 6s. 36 pp. Exeter, 1899. Pollard. 2s. 6d.

BIOGRAPHY.
Oliver Cromwell. By Samuel Rawson Gardiner. D.C.L., LL.D. 13x10in., 216 pp. London, 1899. Goupil. 48 p. and 25 3s. n.

Wordsworth and the Cole-ridges, and other Memoirs, Literary and Political. By Ellis Yarnall. 9x6in., 331 pp. London, 1899. Macmillan. 10s. n.

Reminiscences of the King of Roumania. Ed. from the Original Manuscript, With Introduction by Sidney Whitman. 9x6in., xxxi.+367 pp. London, 1899. Harper. 10s. 6d.

The Brave Sons of Skye. By Lieut.-Col. J. MacInnes, V.D. 10x8in., xxv.+230 pp. London, 1899. Eyre & Spottiswoode.

The Life of William Ewart Gladstone. 2 vols. Ed. by Sir Wemyss Reid. 9x6in., xv.+752 pp. London, 1899. Cassell. 9s.
Extracts from the Diary and Autobiography of the Rev. James Clegg. Ed. by Henry Kirke, M.A., B.C.L. 9x6in., 103 pp. London, 1899. Sampson Low. 6s.

EDUCATIONAL.
Social Phases of Education in the School and the Home. By Samuel T. Dutton. 7x5in., 237 pp. London, 1899. Macmillan. 5s.

FICTION.
Silence Farm. By William Sharp. 8x5in., 233 pp. London, 1899. Grant Richards. 3s. 6d.
Thibaw's Queen. By H. Fielding. 7x5in., 294 pp. London, 1899. Harper. 6s.

Richard Carvel. By Winston Churchill. 8x5in., xlii.+538 pp. London, 1899. Macmillan. 6s.

Jason, and other Stories. By R. M. Coker. 7x5in., 256 pp. London, 1899. Chatto. 3s. 6d.

Jennie Baxter, Journalist. By Robert Barr. (The Novelist, No. 2) 8x5in., 128 pp. London, 1899. Methuen. 6d.

The Greater Inclination. By Edith Wharton. 7x5in., 254 pp. London, 1899. Lane. 6s.

Willow the King. The Story of a Cricket Match. By J. C. Sraith. 8x5in., 313 pp. London, 1899. Ward Lock. 6s.

The Wings of Silence. An Australian Tale. By George Cosans. 7x5in., 233 pp. London, 1899. Gay & Bird. 6s.

War to the Knife; or, Tangata Maori. By Rolf Boldrewood. 7x5in., 420 pp. London, 1899. Macmillan. 6s.

A Faulty Courtship. By Edith G. Hoare. 7x5in., 318 pp. London, 1899. Warner. 3s. 6d.

An Obstinate Parish. By L. Lord ("Sydney Christian"). 8x5in., 284 pp. London, 1899. Unwin. 6s.

Darab's Wine-Cup, and other Tales. By Bart Kennedy. 7x5in., 290 pp. London, 1899. Greening. 2s. 6d.

Shadows; or, Glimpses of Society. By Ernest Martin. 7x5in., 133 pp. London, 1899. Greening. 2s.

Where the Ways Part. By Bertha M. M. Maiken. 7x5in., 560 pp. London, 1899. Digby Long. 6s.

The Fortress of Yaddasara. By Christian Lys. 7x5in., 432 pp. London, 1899. Warner. 6s.

GEOGRAPHY.
The Heart of Asia. By Francis H. Skrine and Edward D. Ross, Ph.D. 8x5in., 444 pp. London, 1899. Methuen. 10s. 6d. n.

Enchanted India. By Prince Bajadar Karageorgievitch. 7x5in., 305 pp. London, 1899. Harper. 5s.

LITERARY.
Henrik Ibsen, Bjørnstjerne Bjørnson. Critical Studies. By Georg Brandes. 9x6in., xvi.+171 pp. London, 1899. Heinemann. 10s. n.

The History of Yiddish Literature in the 19th Century. By Leo Wiener. 8x5in., xv.+402 pp. London, 1899. Nimmo. 8s. n.

Studies in Dante. Second Series. Miscellaneous. By Edward Moore, D.D. 9x5in., xvi.+386 pp. Oxford, 1899. Clarendon Press. 10s. 6d. n.

MISCELLANEOUS.
The Merchant's Handbook of Money, Weights, and Measures. By W. A. Broune, LL.D. 7x4in., xvii.+663 pp. London, 1899. Stanford. 5s.

Pons Asinorum. A Bridge for Beginners. By A. G. Hulme-Beaman. 6x4in., 103 pp. London, 1899. Methuen. 2s.

The Bye-Ways of Crime, &c. By R. J. Power-Berrey. 7x5in., 232 pp. London, 1899. Greening. 2s. 6d.

PHILOSOPHY.
The Six Systems of Indian Philosophy. By the Rt. Hon. F. Max Müller, K.M. 9x5in., xxxi.+618 pp. London, 1899. Longmans. 18s.

Free-Will and Determinism in Relation to Progress. By C. J. Metrose. 7x5in., 53 pp. London, 1899. New Century Press. 1s. 6d.

Naturalism and Agnosticism. The Gifford Lectures, 1896-1898. By James Ward, Sc.D. 2 vols. 9x5in., xviii.+302+291 pp. London, 1899. Black. 18s. n.

POETRY.
The Poetical Works of Robert Stephen Hawker, M.A. Ed. by Alfred Wallis. 7x5in., xl.+283 pp. London, 1899. Lane. 7s. 6d. n.

Poems by Clifford King. 7x5in., 262 pp. London, 1899. Digby Long. 5s. n.

Imperia, and other Prologues in Verse. By Hugh Farrie. 7x5in., 88 pp. Liverpool, 1899. Young.

POLITICAL.
Reminiscences of a Professional Politician. By J. C. H. 7x5in., 102 pp. London, 1899. The New Century Press. 2s.

The Political Struwwelpeter. By Harold Begbie. Illustrated by F. C. Gould. 10x8in., 24 pp. London, 1899. Grant Richards. 3s. 6d.

REPRINTS.
Dante: The Divina Commedia and Canzoniere. Vols. III., IV., and V. Translated by E. H. Plumptre, D.D. 6x4in., 256+237+248 pp. London, 1899. Isbister. 2s. each vol.

Anne of Geierstein. (Border Ed.) By Sir Walter Scott. Bt. 7x5in., xxx.+713 pp. London, 1899. Nimmo. 3s. 6d.

The Highland Widow, and other Tales. (Temple Ed.) By Sir Walter Scott. Bt. 6x4in., lx.+343 pp. London, 1899. Dent. 1s. 6d. n.

Rosine and Sister Louise. By G. W. H. Melville. 8x5in., 436 pp. London, 1899. Ward, Lock. 3s. 6d.

St. Valentine's Day; or, The Fair Maid of Perth. (Temple Ed.) By Sir Walter Scott. Bt. 2 vols. 6x4in., xiv.+344+361 pp. London, 1899. Dent. 3s. n.

Ballads. By Dante Gabriel Rossetti. (The Siddal Ed.) 6x4in., 167 pp. London, 1899. Ellis & Elvey. 2s. 6d. n.

Mrs. Romney and But Men Must Work. By Rosa N. Carey. 7x5in., 368 pp. London, 1899. Macmillan. 3s. 6d.

SCIENCE.
Year-Book of the Scientific and Learned Societies of Great Britain and Ireland. 16th Annual Issue. 8x5in., 287 pp. London, 1899. Griffin. 7s. 6d.

Living Pictures: Their History, Photo-Production, and Practical Working. By Henry V. Hopwood. 8x5in., xii.+237 pp. London, 1899. Optician and Photographic Trades Review. 2s. 6d. n.

THEOLOGY.
Library of St. Francis de Sales. (The Catholic Controversy III.) Translated by the Vener. Rev. H. B. Canon Mackey, O.S.B. 7x5in., xl.+333 pp. London, 1899. Burns & Oates. 6s.

The Reverence Due to the Altar. By J. Taylor, D.D. Rendered into Modern English by the Rev. V. Staley. 6x4in., 98 pp. London, 1899. Mowbray. 1s. n.

TOPOGRAPHY.
Guide to Scarborough and Whitby. Ed. by A. R. H. Moncrieff. 6x4in., 88 pp. London, 1899. Black. 1s.

Guide to Hastings and St. Leonards. Ed. by A. R. H. Moncrieff. 6x4in., 88 pp. London, 1899. Black. 1s.

King's College, Cambridge. (College Histories.) By the Rev. A. A. Leigh, M.A. 8x5in., xii.+302 pp. London, 1899. Robinson. 5s. n.

Kent's Capital. A Handbook to the Maidstone District. 7x5in., 152 pp. London, 1899. Beechings. 6d.

TRAVEL.
The Early Mountaineers. By Francis Gribble. 9x6in., xiv.+338 pp. London, 1899. Unwin. 2s.

Literature

Edited by J. D. Traill.

Published by The Times.

No. 89. SATURDAY, JULY 1, 1899.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
Leading Article —The State and History	673
"Among my Books," by Sir William Rattigan, Q.C.	685
Poem —"The Pastoral Pilgrim," by Miss Katharine Tynan	685
Parodies —II.	687
Reviews —
Oliver Cromwell	675
Wordsworth and the Coleridges	675
Napoleon's Invasion of Russia	677
The Early Mountaineers	678
College Histories—
King's—Queens'—Sidney Sussex—Downing—All Souls	679, 680
Inscriptions Mandaites des Coupes de Khouabir	680
Other New Books —
Memories of Eton and Old Etonians—Wild Life in Hampshire Highlands—Toledo—Modern Spain—Enchanted India—The King's Mother—Le Crime—The Bye-ways of Crime—Pons Asinorum (Bridge for Beginners)—Nietzsche's Works—Psychology and Life—The Psychology of Reasoning—The Heart of Man—Heresies—Sextus Empiricus and Greek Scepticism—Weiner Theater—Memoirs of the Baroness Cecile de Courtot—Chapters on Art—The Oxyrhynchus Logia and the Apocryphal Gospels—Zur Kritik der Polifischen Oekonomie—Le Départ D'Achille—Mr. Wray Hunt's Essays—Living Pictures—Handbook to Somersetshire—Holidays in the Old Flemish Cities	681, 682, 683, 684
Fiction —
The Greater Inclination	683
The House of Rimmon—A Dash for a Throne—Transgression—At a Winter's Fire—Fivolities—In Guiana Wilds—A County Scandal—The Vibart Affair—Faith: A Story of Saint Porth—The Morals of John Ireland—Bearers of the Burden—The Romance of Elisavet—The Sword of Allah—Mr. Passingham—Tom-all-alone—The Diary of a Condemned Man—The Queen of Night—Out from the Night—German Novels	686, 691, 695
American Letter, by Mr. W. D. Howells	691
From the Magazines	692
Correspondence —"The Two Protectors" (Sir Richard Tangye)—English Hexameters (Mr. W. J. Stillman)	695
Notes	674, 689, 690
Authors and Publishers	695, 696
List of New Books and Reprints	697

THE STATE AND HISTORY.

It has often been said, with truth, that the Government of the country does little for literature, and takes no official cognisance of men of letters. The existence of the art of poetry is indeed recognized by the appointment of a Poet Laureate, with the salary of a junior City clerk, and now and then a successful writer receives a title. But, on the whole, the State leaves literature severely alone; and literature, although it be not shone upon, does not greatly suffer from this neglect. As long as work like the "Dictionary of National Biography" is produced by private enterprise, the Government need not go out of its way to patronize literature, or to attempt anything more ambitious than the publication of reports and Blue-books. One undertaking, however, of the first magnitude has for many years been in process of accomplishment by the State, and cannot now be far from completion; we mean the work of the Historical Manuscripts Commission, which has just issued its fifteenth report, containing new matter of great interest, and which has now published about seventy volumes of what may be called the raw materials of history. The work, of course, is similar to that done by various societies, and to some extent overlaps their field of operations, but its scope is such that no private body could have attempted it. The Houses of Parliament, colleges, cathedral bodies, corporations, and private owners have willingly lent their MSS. for examination; and the Government, through the Commissioners, has found expert examiners, most of whom have written excellent summaries of the contents of each collection. The first report is dated 1870, so that for thirty years the Government has been performing at a very small annual cost a most desirable service to literature.

Any one who browses among these published MSS. will find plenty of entertainment, even from the grimmest periods. The explanation is simple; human nature has always been essentially human. The quandary of the Elizabethan gentleman who proposed to run away and give up his house because he was threatened with a Royal visit is, more or less, like that of an impecunious modern squire who is pricked for the office of High Sheriff. The quarrels of the Eatanswill politicians over the erection of an additional pump in the High Street had been paralleled many years before Dickens' time, in the annals of ancient boroughs. Thus the continuity of history is preserved, sometimes by ludicrous incidents, and sometimes by graver events. Our ancestors differed from us only in accidents, and not in essentials, and nothing brings out that fact more clearly than the details which abound in these volumes. Local history is much indebted to the Commission, which has rendered accessible the archives of many ancient corporations, and has illustrated the gradual growth of our towns, their trade, their customs, their franchises, and their freedom. In some instances it is as hard to say whether the castle preceded the town, or the town the castle, as it is to determine whether the egg is naturally prior to the hen; but in either case the result was much the same. The castle first protected and then oppressed the town, till local patriotism could bear it no longer. Liberty was seldom won without a struggle. Even within the last twenty years or so "Dod's Parliamentary Companion" used to record of a good many constituencies that "Lord Blank has considerable influence in this borough." Nominal offices and complimentary dinners are now the only vestiges of these ancient feudal and political relations.

But we knew all this before? That is true; but it has never hitherto been known so completely. Every one of these seventy volumes adds something to our knowledge, and helps to fill up some gap or other, no matter how small. The great events of our history are choses jugées; we know

But we knew all this before? That is true; but it has never hitherto been known so completely. Every one of these seventy volumes adds something to our knowledge, and helps to fill up some gap or other, no matter how small. The great events of our history are choses jugées; we know why the Armada failed, why Charles I. was executed, and why James II. left the country. It is not probable that any records will leap to light which will oblige us to change our views of these events, or to revise our estimates of our greatest men. When all is said and done, there remain certain historical truths which, even in a critical age, partake of the nature of stubborn facts. But a great many important points, such as will occur to every reader, are still matters of controversy, and cannot receive too much additional light. Nor can any drier light be found than that of these documents, written, as they often were, by the actors in the events themselves, and without any design of publication. And, not to speak of what is disputed, many valuable new facts have been gathered in the last few years alone, seeing that they include endless details of the Elizabethan period from Lord Salisbury's papers; of the Armada, from Mr. Savile Foljambe's collection; of De Foe's political work, from the Portland MSS.; and scores of unpublished letters from George Selwyn in the possession of Lord Carlisle. Besides these, there are volumes, almost the whole of which, like Selwyn's letters, may be read for pure enjoyment by any one who interests himself in the gossip and social life of the old world. In short, never was a Royal Commission better justified by its fruits.

We suppose that, as we have said, the work must be nearing its end, but on this point we cannot speak positively. Great houses, like Hatfield or Castle Howard, the former not yet exhausted, have yielded abundant treasure, and the same may be said of many colleges and corporations. But the country is full of smaller houses and smaller corporations whose collections cannot have been completely explored, to say nothing of the fact that old papers, often neglected and overlooked, have a way of turning up in all manner of odd places. Certainly, we shall not welcome the conclusion of so interesting a work as that of the Commission. It is some comfort to reflect that, at whatever date the Commission may make its final report, our history will continue in ever increasing volume. As things are, the collections now published very rarely encroach upon the nineteenth century. In a few years more, some of the pages that are now doubled back must be opened. Our children and grandchildren will demand to know much that cannot now be told. It will no longer be necessary to respect the susceptibilities of the living, and a great deal will then be published which—for example—Mr. Morley cannot just now include in his coming Life of Mr. Gladstone. The Historical Manuscripts Commission of the future will find ample occupation in the prodigious mass of materials by the help of which the history of the Victorian age will have to be rewritten. It is possible that it may have at its disposal part at least of what we may call the Buckingham Palace MSS. Undoubtedly, no better authority could be found for the political history of this century than the letters to her Majesty, and to her predecessors, which it has been the duty of successive Leaders of the House to write daily during the sitting of Parliament. These, we believe, are at Buckingham Palace, and date from the time of George Grenville. As far as we know, not a line of them has ever been published, with the exception of three extracts written respectively by Althorp, Palmerston, and Disraeli. The rest, with many other confidential papers, will provide the coming historian with more than enough raw material.

Every one who has ever had occasion to use the British Museum Reading Room will wish to associate himself with the sentiments expressed in the graceful speech in which Mr. Leslie Stephen, on behalf of many men of letters, requested Dr. Garnett's acceptance of a testimonial on his retirement from the Keepership of Printed Books. Dr. Garnett's labours in connexion with the printing of the general catalogue would alone have entitled him to the gratitude of the community. During his tenure of the office of Superintendent of the Reading Room he had won further golden opinions by his uniform courtesy in answering questions—often, we have no doubt, very foolish ones—and placing his own boundless learning at the disposition of the most ignorant. Those students who have sought his help on any difficult point will perhaps find it hard to believe that he can have any use for the "47 books of reference" included in the oblation; for Dr. Garnett has always given one the impression of already knowing everything contained in every book of reference. But those who most doubt his need for any aids to memory will be the most enthusiastic in wishing him full enjoyment of his well-earned leisure to make use of them.

The statue to Tom Hughes, unveiled last Saturday by the Archbishop of Canterbury, was, of course, a tribute to the memory of the moral teacher—or perhaps, one should say, to the typical Englishman—rather than to the man of letters. That Tom Hughes' gifts were not essentially literary would be sufficiently proved, if there were no other evidence, by his comparative failure whenever he wrote of anything else than the adventures of Tom Brown. Even "Tom Brown's" inclusion in the latest list of the one hundred best novels is probably to be attributed less to its merits as a work of art than to its portrayal of certain sound and sturdy types of character which we, as a nation, like to consider peculiarly our own. Tom Hughes was as essentially English as Mr. Kipling himself; and he proved that it is not absolutely necessary to be a great writer in order to produce a great book.

Lamentations over the state of the book trade have been appearing in the Daily Chronicle, the Outlook, and various other papers. What with books of travel and reminiscence which are so dear that hardly any one can afford them, and sixpenny novels that hardly yield any profit, the booksellers complain that it is difficult for them to make a living. Fortunately, as the Science of Political Economy teaches us, this is a state of things which has a tendency to right itself. Since the novel reading capacity of the community is limited, the sixpenny novels will cease to pay as soon as a sufficient number of them to test that reading capacity are on the market; and when they cease to pay they will cease to appear. On the other hand, when the public proves that it is eager to buy travel, history, and biography, provided that it can get them at a reasonable price, its wants will be provided for; and, in fact, publishers have already begun to experiment in this direction with satisfactory results. More than 50,000 copies of "With Kitchener to Khartoum" were sold at six shillings; and other instances could be quoted.

Reviews.

Oliver Cromwell. By Samuel Rawson Gardiner,
D.C.L., LL.D., Litt.D. London, 1899. Goupil. 23 3/-

In a previous volume of the same series the late Sir John Skelton gave us an Apologia for Charles I., and we have now to record the complete success, artistic, literary, and historical, of Mr. Gardiner's companion study of the great Protector. From an artistic point of view, the volume leaves nothing to be desired: it is on a level with, if not in advance of, any of its predecessors: it makes accessible to the public a number of most interesting portraits, the majority of which are rarely seen. The portraits are genuine as well as little known, and special importance may be attached to the fact that they have a certificate of authenticity from Mr. Gardiner himself. To this there are a few exceptions, and what the reasons of these exceptions are is told by Mr. Gardiner. The likeness of Cromwell as a child from Chequers Court—several of the most interesting pictures in the book, it may be noted, belong to Mrs. Frankland-Russell-Astley—can hardly, in the nature of things, be quite certain. There is another very like it belonging to the Rev. A. W. Headlam, but both may quite probably be authentic. The Bernini bust, now in the House of Commons, is more doubtful, and Mr. Gardiner's investigation of the point is interesting. Other portraits receive an equally careful consideration. Mr. Gardiner expresses an opinion, in which we concur, that no authentic portrait of Blake is in existence. Medals, seals, and miniatures help to make the artistic side of the work exceptionally valuable. It is unquestionable that the Puritans cannot bear comparison for picturesqueness with the Cavaliers, and, with the one great exception, the Cromwells themselves look no better than a family of clodhoppers. But none the less the portraits are striking, and the illustrations, as a whole, would secure success for a less admirable book.

From a literary point of view, Mr. Gardiner has never done anything so good. As an artistic whole, the arrangement, the subordination of details to the general effect, the breadth and skill of the treatment, are worthy of a great historian. In details, there is still the old difficulty of dealing with that difficult instrument, English prose—still the same slightly ponderous collocation of phrases here and there, and the same occasional hastiness of construction. Historically, there is little new to be said of Cromwell as Mr. Gardiner draws him. He has already told the story at least six times, yet we are disposed to say that he has never told it better than now. Of his complete mastery of the facts no serious investigator can have the slightest doubt. No man is ever likely to equal him in his minute accuracy and his absolute candour, unless it be Mr. Charles Firth, whose long-expected book we have still to see. And chief of all his merits, to our mind, is the fact that, where we differ most completely with his conclusions, it is to his absolute sincerity and extraordinary accuracy that we owe our own conclusions, so different from his own.

There is, indeed, no complete explanation of Cromwell's amazing series of inconsistencies and tergiversations possible, save the old one of hypocrisy, and this we unhesitatingly reject. He is, as the greatest men will often be, inexplicable. Mr. Gardiner's explanation is no more plausible than the others. He must remain an enigma. And so some will delight to contrast his exaggerated humility to Parliament at one stage ("Honest men served you faithfully. Sir, they are trusty; I beseech you in the name of God not to discourage them," to Speaker Lenthall) with the abrupt despotism of dismissal of his later years ("I will put an end to your prating. You are no Parliament") and the hectoring speeches to the nominated bodies of his Protectorate. Some will smile at the prayer-meeting to discover which of their iniquities had put the army in so tight a place, and its discovery that the iniquities were Charles Stewart's, not theirs, and that his head must come off. Some will welcome with bitterness Mr. Gardiner's proof that it was Cromwell who was supremely responsible for the execution of the King, forcing it through when others were reluctant or timid. Others will look rather to the real greatness and sincerity of the man, and forget the barbarity of his massacres; for remembering the inadequate proof Mr. Gardiner offered in his "History of the Commonwealth and Protectorate" we cannot accept his statement that "there is no doubt" that the laws of war justified the butchery of Drogheda; and we must point out, too, that he ignores the murders in cold blood, as that of Edmund Verney. They will overlook the cruelty of his deportations (of which Mr. Gardiner here more than ever convinces us), the shocking duplicity of his foreign policy (which Mr. Gardiner has been the first completely to lay bare), his reliance on unconcealed military power, or "the list of ancient allies driven by the Protector from public life, and in some cases actually deprived of liberty" because they retained the independence of their political and moral judgment.

We repeat that those who recognize the greatness of Cromwell must be prepared to sacrifice his consistency. They must see that he did not object to bring in the Scots against the King and to win the war by their means, but, when they came in as a Presbyterian force to support the King, he called the action "a more prodigious treason than any that had been perfected before." They must be prepared to dismiss the figment of his affection for religious liberty, except in so far as that means a liberty given only within limits chosen by a single party or a single individual. Cromwell would have no "Mass," he would kill Roman clergy, and to him, as Mr. Gardiner rightly says, the fact "that the Royalists had religious ideals of their own was a provocation which made it easy to deny them toleration." One pathetic sentence, indeed, of the book before us illustrates what those who worked with Cromwell had perpetually to suffer.

Milton [says Mr. Gardiner], now incapacitated by blindness from active employment in the service of the State, must have winced at hearing that his chosen hero, who had long turned his back on the voluntary system of Church government, had now turned his back on the central doctrine of the Areopagitica.

Like those of not a few other great rulers, Cromwell's life was a perpetual turning away from principles to which he had been warmly attached. "When most inconsistent he loved to persuade himself that he had always been consistent," and so he, not once only, "committed himself to a doctrine so manifestly absurd that it could only be received with a smile of contemptuous disbelief." It was not because of this, but in spite of it, that Cromwell was great, and it is the highest merit of Mr. Gardiner's enthusiastic eulogy that it has enabled us to recognize this more clearly than ever.

Wordsworth and the Coleridges. With other Memoirs, Literary and Political. By Ellis Yarnall. 9x 6 1/2 in., vii. + 331 pp. London, 1899. Macmillan. 10/-

First among the impressions produced by this most interesting volume is one of surprise, not so much at the remoteness of the period to which the writer's recollections date back—though that is in itself remarkable—as at the length of the time during which they have been withheld from the world. This feeling, however, is no doubt due in part to a change in modern literary manners which is not entirely for the better. The death of any notable personage is followed nowadays by so brisk a competition among ready writers for the first appearance in the familiar part of "One who knew him" that one looks with almost incredulous astonishment at such a chapter as that on a "Visit to Wordsworth," wherein the author records his introduction to, and conversation with, the poet exactly half a century ago, and only a few months before his death. Imagine a "One who knew him" allowing his recollections of a recently deceased celebrity of the present day to remain unpublished till 1949. Mr. Ellis Yarnall, however, contented himself with placing his at the disposal of D. Christopher Wordsworth, who included a part of them in his life of the poet, while omitting other passages because of their reference to persons then living. These reasons having ceased to exist, the record has now been published as a whole, and forms, primarily, of course, in right of its subject, but thanks also to the writer's not inconsiderable faculty of graphic portraiture, the most valuable chapter in a really fascinating volume.

His account of the whole day spent by him in Wordsworth's company is full of interest, as that of an ardent devotee whose enthusiasm has yet in nowise impaired his keen faculty of observation. Nothing, for instance, could give us a more characteristic picture of Wordsworth than we get in the following little incident:—

I happened to have in my pocket a small volume of selections from his poems made some years before by Professor Reed. I produced it and asked him if he had ever seen it. He replied that he had not. He took it with evident interest, turned to the title-page, which he read with its motto. He began the preface then in the same way. But here I must record a trifling incident which may yet be worth noting. We were standing together in the road, when a man accosted us, asking charity—a beggar of the better class. Wordsworth, scarcely looking off the book, thrust his hand into his pocket, as if instinctively acknowledging the man's right to beg by this prompt action. He seemed to find nothing, however, and he said, in a sort of soliloquy, "I have given to four or five to-day," as if to account for his being then unprovided. Wordsworth, as he turned over one leaf after another, said, "But I shall weary you." "By no means," said I, for I could have been content to stand there for hours.

Apparently he must have stood there for some considerable time listening to the poet reading, "with telling emphasis, the choice passages which Professor Reed had quoted in the preface, and the biographical sketch which followed." He made, however, but little comment on the Professor's notice of him.

Occasionally he would say as he came to a particular fact, "That's quite correct," or after reading a quotation from his own works he would add, "That's from my writings." These quotations he read in a way that much impressed me; it seemed almost as if he was awed by the greatness of his own power, the gifts with which he had been endowed.

The chapter is, unfortunately but necessarily, a short one, being the record of but one day passed in the poet's company: but "Walks and Visits in Wordsworth's Country," "Sara Coleridge and her Brothers," and "John Taylor Coleridge and Lord Coleridge" compose together considerably more than a third of the volume, and abound in interesting details of the gifted family with various members of which Mr. Yarnall has kept himself continuously in touch for nearly half a century. "S. T. C.," who died in 1834, when Mr. Yarnall had but lately emerged from boyhood, he naturally never saw, though by the way it was space rather than time that prevented their meeting, since the author records with pride his presence at the reception of Lafayette in America ten years before. His first visit to England, however, was not paid till 1849, when he brought a letter of introduction to Sara Coleridge, through whom he formed an acquaintance, ultimately ripening into a thirty years' friendship, with her accomplished brother Derwent, and a little later on became intimate with Sir John Duke Coleridge and his son, the late Lord Chief Justice. Of all these four persons, notable every one of them in their various ways, he has much to tell; and he tells it not only in an interesting fashion, but with admirable discretion and good taste. He has a keen eye for character in every one and a retentive memory for everything that illustrates it. We owe him much, for instance, for preserving this little trait of S. T. Coleridge, gathered from the memories of his daughter-in-law:—

I remember Mrs. Derwent Coleridge telling me of her recollections of her father-in-law in her early married life. She listened with wonder, she said, to the flow of his discourse; there was no hesitation or pause—on and on it went. The bed-room candle would be brought in and placed on a table near the door of the drawing room. Coleridge would move slowly across the room, continuing his discourse the while, continuing it as he went through the hall to the staircase, continuing it as he slowly mounted the stairs, until his voice was lost in the distance.

Mr. Yarnall quotes the often cited saying of Wordsworth's, "I have known many remarkable men, but the most wonderful man I ever knew was Coleridge."

I feel compelled, however [he continues], to add the following as a deliverance of Wordsworth's, in a moment, let us presume, of impatience, at a late period of Coleridge's life. Wordsworth with Rogers had spent an evening with Coleridge at Highgate. As the two poets walked away together—"I did not altogether understand the latter part of what Coleridge said," was the cautious remark of Rogers. "I did not understand any of it," was Wordsworth's hasty reply. "No more did I," exclaimed Rogers, doubtless much relieved.

Evidently none of those "glorious islets" described with such richness of humour in Carlyle's famous sketch—those "balmy, sunny islets, islets of the blest and the intelligible"—had arisen on this occasion out of the Coleridgean haze.

At the house of Mr. Henry Nelson (husband and cousin of Sara Coleridge) Mr. Yarnall met Macaulay, then, as he thought, beginning at fifty-seven to give certain premature signs of old age, though he adds that "the flash of his eye, the rapid changes of expression, the vivacity, the quick movement of the head, all showed a keenness of the mental faculties as yet unimpaired." Nor evidently was there any slackening of the extraordinary torrent of his discourse, though it appears to have become more possible to stem it than had been the case in earlier days; or, so at least we infer from Mr. Yarnall's dry remark that the full flow of the great man's talk was "sometimes" checked "by the wish of others at the table to be heard." One wonders whether Macaulay and S. T. Coleridge ever met, and if so what happened. Perhaps both were reduced to absolute silence. Less has been preserved by hearers of the former's talk than even of the latter's; but Mr. Yarnall was lucky enough to carry away at least one capital story:—

He told of Francis Grant, an eminent portrait painter to whom Sir George Cornewall Lewis had lately been sitting. The artist, knowing Lewis was an author, thought he ought to make acquaintance with his books that he might talk with him about them. Accordingly he read "The Monk." Lewis, in order to show him it was quite impossible he could have written the novel in question, said it appeared two years before he was born. All who know the author of the "Credibility of Early Roman History" would appreciate his appealing to dates to show he was not also the author of "The Monk."

Charles Kingsley, John Keble, Matthew Arnold, John Stuart Mill, and the late Mr. W. E. Forster are among other notable persons with whom Mr. Yarnall came into contact in the course of his frequent visits—annual or almost annual apparently for many years together—to the country; and the figures even of those whom he has sketched the most lightly stand out in sharper outline in the imagination or the recollection of the reader after a study of his pages. Everywhere, as we have said, he is on the alert for the illuminating touch of character. His account of his visit to Mr. and Mrs. Mill is of much interest, though too long to quote; but we must not omit the anecdote, illustrative of a popularly unsuspected quality of the philosopher, which he had from the late Lord Coleridge:

John Stuart Mill my friend spoke of with warmth of admiration. . . . Mill's shy ways attracted him; his quiet humour he dwelt on. Once Mill had to take notice of the frequent quotations members on the opposite side made from his writings in order to badger him. Of course they were passages which these men had committed [to memory]. Mill said: "I feel greatly the compliment paid me by these frequent quotations. It is perhaps not good for me to be thus referred to, yet my vanity is kept down by what becomes more and more obvious to me, that honourable gentlemen who thus quote me have really read no other portions of my writings."

Here we must close our notice of a book which we can cordially recommend to every reader who is interested in what alone is worthy to interest him in famous men of the past. It is a model of what a volume of reminiscences should be—a model but too often and too widely departed from by the reminiscents of the present day. And truly refreshing is it to meet with a book which, though full of additions to our knowledge not only of the genius and character, but of the "ways," the habits, the personalia of the various worthies it discourses of, yet contains from beginning to end no single offence against delicacy and good taste. With a comic wail of Conservatism Mr. Yarnall writes of Sir John Taylor Coleridge:—

He wore a ruffled shirt—the last I have known of the old time badge of a gentleman. Alas! that it is no more seen.

Let us hope that that other "old time badge of a gentleman"—the nicety of perception for what should be said and what left unsaid—has not "gone out" with the ruffled shirt.

"1812."

Napoleon's Invasion of Russia. By Hereford B. George, Fellow of New College, Oxford. 9×6in., xv.+451 pp. London, 1899. Unwin. 12/6

This very clear and interesting narrative of the great campaign of 1812 should be useful to all students of history, and not merely to the military specialist. In spite of the enormous quantity of new Napoleonic literature which has been poured upon the world during the last ten years, there is still plenty of room for good monographs on the various spheres of the Emperor's activity. The majority of the recently-issued works are memoirs and autobiographies of more or less merit and credibility. Some are dull but reasonably accurate, some—as, for example, Marbot, Thiébauld, and, in a still higher degree, Sergeant Bourgogne—are eminently untrustworthy unless their statements can be verified by good external authority. Competent historians, therefore, can find an admirable occupation in working into the received narrative of the Napoleonic era all the really valuable information which can be derived from this mass of newly-printed books. Scarcely less useful is the task of ear-marking as worthless all the impossible anecdotes and incidents which these works contain. There is urgent need for such activity, for we have already noticed wholly unauthenticated tales from Marbot and his fellows creeping into serious historical compilations, where they have no proper place.

The success in France of M. Houssaye's two volumes so laconically named "1814" and "1815" is sufficient to show that there is plenty of room for narratives on a modest scale, embodying the latest research on individual campaigns of our great enemy. Mr. George has been signally happy in finding in Napoleon's invasion of Russia a subject on which no critical monograph has been written in English for many years. He has used his opportunity to the best effect, and turned out a book of reasonable size (it contains 450 pages) which admirably fills the gap in our military literature. It must not, however, be supposed that his book is technical, or merely military in the narrow sense of the word. The reader will find the moral and political causes of Napoleon's failure worked out as admirably as the purely strategical ones. The author has gone carefully through the diplomatic archives of the continent for side-lights on the campaign, and has found much important matter, some of it absolutely fresh and unprinted. Perhaps the most curious and interesting of all are the letters, now at Vienna, which Metternich exchanged with the Russian envoy, Count Stackelberg, all through the period in 1812 when their respective Sovereigns were theoretically at war with each other. The Russian Government was regularly informed of all Austria's dealings with Bonaparte, and assured that nothing really decisive should occur on the Volhynian frontier. Such an incident is but typical of the hollowness of the French domination in Europe, even when the Emperor seemed to have all the old Governments at his feet.

Many causes have been alleged for the completeness of Napoleon's disaster in the winter of 1812. His own mendacious statement in the "Twenty-ninth Bulletin" threw all the blame upon the weather; and he has so far prevailed with posterity that the popular version of the Moscow retreat still lays stress upon the frost and cold alone. As a matter of fact, his army was hopelessly ruined before a flake of snow had fallen. To give a typical example of its condition—The 4th Corps, that of Eugène Beauharnais, which had crossed the Niemen 44,000 strong, had only 6,000 men in the ranks the day that the snow began. Some of the other great units had suffered in an even more terrible proportion. Another very common view is that the burning of Moscow was the true source of Napoleon's ruin, by depriving him of his only possible winter quarters. But this theory is just as unsound as the other. If Moscow had remained intact, it is probable that the Emperor would have been tempted to linger there even longer than he actually did. Want of food must ultimately have driven him forth in any case, and it is reasonably certain that if he had started a fortnight later on his retreat not a man of the Grand Army would have reached the German frontier. They would have met the bad weather while just starting on their march, and the Russian flanking armies from Livonia and Moldavia would have been right across their path if ever the survivors had struggled far beyond Smolensk.

Mr. George offers as his explanation of Bonaparte's failure quite another set of circumstances—facts that are not always made prominent in accounts of the disaster, though Jomini seems to have taken note of them. He points out that before the days of railways and field telegraphs the moving of 600,000 men through a barren, thinly-peopled country, very badly provided with roads, was too great a task even for the brain of the Emperor himself. He had been preparing for the war for more than a year, and had got together for it the greatest stores and magazines that Europe had ever seen. But the moment that he began to leave his base far behind him, all the arrangements which he had made for the supply of his host completely broke down. They could not live on the country, after their custom in Germany or Italy, and every mile that they advanced their supply trains lagged further and further to the rear. Actual privation began before the army left Wilna, and nearly a third of it was missing when Smolensk was reached. If Chambray's elaborate figures are to be trusted, the corps which had crossed the Niemen 301,000 strong only put 194,000 in the field in front of Smolensk. Of the hundred thousand men missing, not more than 5,000 or 6,000 had fallen in battle, and no detachments of very great strength had been left behind to guard the road. We are thus driven to conclude that some 60,000 or 80,000 men had deserted their colours or been left behind as sick before a pitched battle had been fought. The same rate of melting was going on all through the advance; only 120,000 saw Borodino out of the 194,000 who passed Smolensk. Napoleon's system of "making war maintain itself" failed hopelessly in Russia; this he had foreseen, and had made gigantic preparations for carrying adequate supplies with him. But Russian roads simply could not bear the food, stores, and reserve ammunition of an army of half a million men. The task of bringing them on was physically impossible; nothing short of a good railway system would have made it practicable in a country like Western Russia. The army was consigned to starvation from the moment that it crossed the frontier. The only thing that could have saved Bonaparte would have been weakness on the part of the Tsar; if the latter held firm and allowed the invader to cut deep enough into the heart of his realm, the moment was bound to come when the French would be brought to a stop from mere exhaustion. This would have happened even without the carnage of Smolensk and Borodino; but the Russians were, nevertheless, quite justified in fighting the latter battle. On the day when it took place Bonaparte had only 15,000 men more than his adversaries to put in line; his army had been already so thinned down that it was worth while to try the chances of war in order to save Moscow. The awful massacre which resulted was so equally distributed between the two hosts that it had practically no influence on the remainder of the campaign. Even a victory of the most crushing sort could, at that stage of the campaign, have done no more for Bonaparte than save his military credit and gain him a secure retreat. To drive back the Russian host a few miles, and allow it to retire intact in organization and morale, was such a poor success that the Emperor was not justified in any further advance. But the glamour of a state entry into Moscow tempted him on, and he went forward to his inevitable fate.

If anything more is needed to explain the thinning down of the Emperor's ranks during the advance, the character of the army itself was a sufficient cause. Seven-thirteenths of the men were auxiliaries drawn from outside the empire. Not to speak of the unfortunate Spaniards, Croats, and Portuguese whom Napoleon dragged with him, the Germans who formed the main bulk of the allied contingents were both unwilling and untrained. The princes of the Rheinbund had done just as little as they safely could in equipping the troops which were extorted from them. An English prisoner of war at Dusseldorf watched the formation of a Berg cavalry regiment in the spring of 1812. Five hundred recruits were shot into the ranks of a skeleton cadre brought home from Spain, and after precisely three weeks drill the whole was sent forward to Russia, "the men incapable of sitting their horses, and the horses unbroken to obey the bridle, far less the sound of the trumpet." Of course such raw troops deserted on every possible opportunity, and starved from sheer ignorance of war when they did not desert. Who can wonder that Junot's Westphalian Corps came down from 18,000 men to 1,500 in less than five months?

All this and much more is duly set forth in Mr. George's most interesting book, which we thoroughly recommend to every reader interested in the great wars of the early nineteenth century. Those who have once embarked on its first chapter will not easily lay it down, till they have brought back the poor wrecks of the Grand Army to the banks of the Niemen.

THE ALPS FROM FIRST TO LAST.

The Early Mountaineers. By Francis Gribble. 9 x 5½ in., 338 pp. London, 1899. Unwin. 21/-

Mr. Gribble, who is known as a successful writer of fiction, has, to use his own phrase, endeavoured in this volume to narrate "all that is most interesting and important about the beginnings of exploration in the Alps, the Pyrenees, and the Apennines." He has executed his task in a scholarly fashion, letting the early mountaineers speak for themselves in the text by extracts carefully translated into English, while in an appendix he has set out the whole of the most important originals.

No one can accuse Mr. Gribble of having unreasonably restricted the time-area of his survey, for he begins, in effect, with the date of the Deluge, and carries us on to about 1834. He passes over the gîte selected for Prometheus on the Caucasus, who, however, was not fortunate in his guides, and had as little to do with their selection as if he had been at Chamonix in the old days. We are reminded that Noah's ascent of Mount Ararat was made "in a combination of circumstances exceedingly unlikely to be repeated," and the ascents of Mount Moriah and Sinai are mentioned as indicating that the Hebrew race "had a true feeling for the solemn associations of the mountain top." The author complains of the barrenness of Greek and Roman records of mountaineering, though Philip of Macedon ascended Hæmus and Hadrian saw a sunrise from Etna. But the indifference with which the Greeks and Romans regarded the mountains was replaced in the Middle Ages by fear and disgust. This is accurately reflected in the words of Master John de Bremble, a monk of Christchurch, Canterbury, who when he found himself on the St. Bernard in 1188 thus delivered himself:—"Lord! restore me to my brethren, that I may tell them that they come not to this place of torment." Indeed, we may suppose that it was the horror of the mountains that formed the attraction which long before this date made so many saints and hermits, particularly Irishmen and Italians, select them as a place of residence. Something of the same feeling probably actuated the architect of the chapel on the Roche Melon, the lineal ancestor of the intolerable observatory on the top of Mont Blanc. The first piece of mountaineering in the Middle Ages, unconnected with religion, seems to have been the ascent of Canigon in the Pyrenees by Peter III. of Aragon, in the thirteenth century. According to Fra Salimbene, of the Order of the Lesser Friars at Parma, the King had bad weather on the mountain, but pluckily reached the top. Moreover, on a stone being thrown into the tarn on the summit, a dragon flew up, and the King went down. It is a funny story, no doubt, but Mr. Gribble is unquestionably right in concluding that it does not follow that it is untrue, seeing that "for many centuries after Peter's death men of enlightenment believed in dragons as firmly as they believed in God," while men of equal integrity swore affidavits before magistrates that they had personally encountered them. This was the first Government expedition up a peak, and we have to wait a couple of centuries for the next, which was the ascent of Mont Aiguille, near Grenoble. It was effected in 1492 by the Seigneur de Dompjullien et de Beaupré. This French notable did not go up, however, for his own amusement, but Charles VIII. despatched him on the errand much, apparently, as Mark Twain sent his secretary. It was not again ascended until 1834. Petrarch can hardly be called a climber, but Mr. Gribble gives a chapter to the ascent of the grassy hill of Mont Ventoux by the first of the sentimental mountaineers. He gives corresponding space to "the painter mountaineer," Leonardo da Vinci, who ascended "Monboso, a peak of the Alps which divide France from Italy." The controversy as to whether "Monboso" was a corruption of Monte Viso or a local name for Monte Rosa is an old story. The weight of the evidence favours Monte Rosa and is against Monte Viso. What is quite clear is that the painter did not ascend either.

It is not until we get to the early Swiss climbers that we find the first intimation that mountaineering, even in the mild form practised once (and once only) by Petrarch, could possibly be a pleasant pastime. Gesner, who professed philosophy at Zurich for twenty-four years, emphatically declares in a letter dated 1543 that he climbed "partly for the delight of the mind and the proper exercise of the body." Simler, his successor in the chair of philosophy, also holds forth on the difficulties of Alpine travel and talks learnedly and inaccurately of the means of circumventing them. He writes that the flight of a bird will cause an avalanche to fall, and apparently the same sort of thing was believed in Chamonix three centuries later, for Albert Smith describes how on the Petit Plateau he was forbidden to speak except in a whisper for fear of starting an avalanche from the Dôme du Goûter. Mr. Gribble has a very good chapter on Scheuchzer and the dragons on which Scheuchzer is an authority. He advocated the scientific opinions of Isaac Newton, speculated plausibly on glacier motion, but did more than any other savant before or since to propagate the belief in dragons. His collection of depositions of eye witnesses who had encountered these animals is one of the curiosities of literature, and, as Mr. Gribble points out, the resemblance of these depositions "to those circumstantial narratives by which the existence of ghosts has been demonstrated by the Society of Psychical Research" is exceedingly striking, and, we may add, suggestive. Scheuchzer wrote in the beginning of the last century, which saw the advent of Placidus à Spescha, of Balmat, and of the real beginnings of modern mountaineering.

Mr. Gribble's chapter on Chamonix has been to some extent forestalled by Mr. Mathews' book, but one turns at once to see what view he takes of the Balmat v. Paccard controversy. The main question is whether Dr. Paccard went up "as luggage," or whether he planned the ascent, took his fair share of the work, and pointed out the practicability of the ancien passage. His conclusion is "that the rights of it can never be certainly determined." This strikes us as odd, seeing that he points out that the date of Balmat's first deposition, which admits Paccard's claims, was of a date which is conclusive of its bona fides, and "can only be shaken by the suggestion that the doctor, defying the risk of detection, took the liberty of tampering with the date." As such an act would have been a piece of unmitigated rascality and have involved the suborning of the two attesting witnesses, we should have thought this suggestion might have been summarily dismissed. The book is profusely illustrated, mostly with reproductions from old woodcuts. The series of Scheuchzer's dragons is delightful, but, perhaps, the most comical picture of all is that of the early mountaineers on the Jungfrau, taken from Hugi's "Naturhistorische Alpenreise," published in 1830. The philosopher who evolved a camel out of his inner consciousness was hardly "in it" with the artist who evolved these rocks, and the frock-coated Alpinists with their chamois horn headed alpenstocks are to match. Mr. Gribble's book is, from its nature, to some extent addressed mainly to specialists, but he has managed to flavour his medieval stories with a sufficient spice of modern epigram to make it palatable to a wider public.

COLLEGE HISTORIES.

We have received from Mr. F. E. Robinson (in his Cambridge Series) the histories of KING'S COLLEGE, by the Rev. A. Austen-Leigh, QUEENS' COLLEGE, by the Rev. J. H. Gray, SIDNEY SUSSEX, by G. M. Edwards, and DOWNING COLLEGE, by the Rev. W. H. Pettit Stevens (5s. n. each vol.), and, so far at any rate as these volumes are concerned, we can congratulate the publisher without reserve on the success of his venture in bringing out a series of college histories. Both in appearance and contents these little books are thoroughly satisfactory, and the photographs are judiciously selected and well executed. King's is dealt with by its Provost, Queens' by its Dean, Sidney Sussex by its tutor, while the story of Downing is told by a former scholar who now holds two college livings in Cambridgeshire. There is throughout a laudable absence of exaggeration where the good points of a college are made prominent, and little or no attempt at suppressing what is less creditable in its history. Although chronicles of this kind must appeal primarily to members of the particular colleges, or at least of the University, yet the connexion between the Universities and the outside world has been so close that few who care about the history of England will fail to find something to attract them in these Academic records.

Of the four foundations dealt with each has a distinctive interest of its own. King's is an example of a noble endowment of learning which for centuries did not produce a tithe of the good results it might have produced; but in the last few decades has entered on a new career, has freed itself from the restrictions and from the still more injurious liberties of the past, and, while retaining what is best in the traditions that have come down to it, has set itself seriously to the task of carrying out the true intentions of its founder. Founded by Henry VI., and closely connected by him with his other great foundation, King's College was until lately little more than an appendage of Eton. It is true, as the Provost says, that at all periods it produced a certain number of distinguished men, and it was fortunate in attracting other perhaps even more distinguished men from elsewhere. It is the college of Robert and Horace Walpole; it produced, though it failed to appreciate, Simeon; it produced Waller, the poet and political trimmer, and Phineas Fletcher, the author of the "Purple Island"; but Whicheote, its greatest Provost, came from Emmanuel and Sir John Cheke, who "taught England and King Edward Greek," was attracted from St. John's; had it not been for its own stupidity it might have had even Isaac Newton himself at its head; while in later times its two most distinguished men, Sir George Humphry and the Bishop of Durham, were both educated at other colleges. But, although throughout its history, it can make a fair show of distinguished sons, real or adopted, the impression produced by reading the Provost's book is not favourable to its past; the general level of learning and morality appears decidedly low; the society seems to have been perpetually quarrelling; it was a family party full of hatred and uncharitableness, and only united by a narrow-minded contempt for the world outside. This, at least, seems to have been its normal condition; those of its members who did become great and good did so in spite of their surroundings, and no doubt were the stronger for the struggle; but this is really no apology for the college, unless we accept the paradox that the worst school and college is the best because those who survive must be exceptionally strong. It was not until King's waived the unfortunate privilege in virtue of which King's men proceeded to their degrees without examination that any respectable standard of industry could be established, and it was not until others than Etonians were admitted that any sort of breadth and freshness could be introduced into the narrow and stagnant life of the close circle to whom Eton and King's, Eton slang and King's scandal, represented the chief facts of existence. Now, however, all this is changed, and that too without any loss of what was good in the past. To the "family" tradition is no doubt due the peculiarly friendly attitude of dons to undergraduates which is characteristic of King's; the old exclusiveness has taken the form of confining the college to men who are reading for honours; the old ridiculous affectation of superiority to the rest of the University survives in a certain spirit of healthy independence with regard to Academic conventions. The Provost has written a conscientious account of the history of his college, and he was, we believe, one of the leaders in the movement for reform; but partly because he was so much involved in the details, and partly because of his almost morbid fear of appearing to be a partisan, he, to some extent, seems not to realize the immense superiority of the new to the old King's.

Queens' is interesting as the college of Erasmus. Its greatest time was in the age of Fisher; latterly, though it had a period of considerable effectiveness in mathematics when Dr. Campion was tutor, it has been somewhat on the decline; but it, too, like the rest of the University, has been caught by the spirit of the age, and there are signs of increasing activity in all its departments. Mr. Gray tells us that his work has been a labour of love, and we can well believe it. There is little independent work in his book—he acknowledges fully his debts to previous historians—but it is eminently readable, and has perhaps more personal flavour than any of the others. The main defect, from the point of view of the general reader, is that the author's extreme interest in his subject sometimes leads him into giving us superfluous details—e.g., the account of the extinction of an abortive fire in 1857 is not of world-wide interest.

Sidney Sussex, till the beginning of this century the last of the Cambridge foundations, the Benjamin of colleges, is a fine example of how much can be done with even a small endowment. The great pride of the college is that it was Oliver Cromwell's home during his undergraduate days at Cambridge, and its most notable work of art is his portrait by Cooper, presented to the college by an anonymous "Assertor of Liberty" in 1766. Mr. Edwards gives a deal of information, not hitherto published, from the college records, and his work is thoroughly scholarly, but his habit of quoting intricate documents in the original spelling is rather confusing to the lay mind (he actually apologizes because the spelling in one document has been modernized !), and his account of the college in "modern times" is hardly satisfactory. Not enough is said about the new order introduced by the Victorian Statutes. For instance, in 1818, Sir E. J. Smith, president of the Linnæan Society, was asked by Martyn, the Professor of Botany, to lecture as his deputy, but was prevented by eighteen tutors of colleges, who protested against their pupils attending lectures given by one who was not a member of the Church of England. This would hardly occur now, but there is nothing in Mr. Edwards' book to indicate that it would not.

Downing is the youngest Cambridge college. It is small in numbers and poor financially, but of great interest because it started free from many of the mediæval traditions which clung, and indeed, still continue to cling, to the older foundations. As Mr. Pettit Stevens says, "Through the foresight of the younger Pitt, who inspired the charter, Downing led the way both by releasing the great mass of fellowships from all restrictions that imposed celibacy or residence or entrance into ecclesiastical orders, and also by appropriating part of its revenues to the support of exceptionally eminent teachers with professorial duties and dignities." The results of this freedom from old restrictions have been remarkable, if the percentage of distinguished men who come from a college is any criterion. Perhaps the most interesting thing in Mr. Stevens' book is the long account of the Prince Consort's conversation with Professor Birkbeck respecting the education of the Prince of Wales.

THE HISTORY OF ALL SOULS COLLEGE, by C. Grant Robertson (College Histories Series, Robinson, 5s.). All Souls was founded in the middle of the fifteenth century by Henry Chichele, Archbishop of Canterbury, partly as a chantry, to pray for the souls of those who had fallen in the French wars, partly as a college, to harbour Fellows for the service of Church and State. Mr. Robertson, in his first chapter, dwells on this side of the founder's intention, and finds in it the explanation of the characteristics which have always been peculiar to this college—viz., the absence of non-graduate members and the relaxation of the ordinary requirement to reside in Oxford. The architect of the college was Roger Keyes, who became afterwards its second warden—the association of learning and practical art in the same person is quite mediæval. Another curious mixture appears in the provision of the original statutes that the porter shall "duly and diligently shave the warden and fellows." All Souls, like many other foundations, led a troubled and precarious life through the 150 years of civil, religious, and social disturbance which followed its birth. Then, in the seventeenth century, came what Mr. Robertson calls the "golden age" of the college, when it prospered in estate, and contained many men eminent in divinity, the arts, science, and public affairs. The names may be mentioned of Gilbert Sheldon, Jeremy Taylor Sydenham, Sir Christopher Wren, Codrington (of Barbados), Henry Coventry and Trumbull, both Secretaries of State. Mr. Robertson mentions that Archbishop Tillotson, as visitor, ruled in 1694, with respect to the obligation of residence, that "those in attendance on his Majesty ought to be esteemed as present in the said college." Like the rest of Oxford, All Souls was royalist, and suffered accordingly under the Commonwealth. It was disturbed also after the Restoration by quarrels about elections, into which the general corruption of the age had crept. As the century closed great additions were made to the buildings, of which the famous Codrington Library was chief. In the eighteenth century, by a development of the practice of favouring founder's kin, admission to the fellowships became limited by degrees, with few exceptions, to a small number of families allied in blood. This restriction lasted till the first University Commission in 1852. During this time All Souls was strongest in divinity and law. It claimed the great name of Blackstone; two Lord Chancellors, Talbot and Northington; a Chief Justice, Willes; and a number of prelates, of whom Archbishop Vernon Harcourt and Bishop Heber are the best known. Mr. Robertson passes lightly over this period, and still more so over the recent history of All Souls. He has abstained purposely, he says in his preface, from mentioning any members of the college still living. This principle has debarred him from pointing out the remarkable diversity of success which has fallen to All Souls men in the present generation. It is probably a "record" for a college to number at the same time among its quondam fellows, as All Souls does in this year, the Prime Minister, the Home Secretary, the Viceroy of India, the Ambassador at Paris, two judges, the headmaster of Eton, and the editor of The Times. Mr. Robertson's work is full of unaffected learning, and would interest all who care for the "origines" of University history. He uses a good running narrative style, which falls into awkwardness, however, now and then, when he tries to use an anecdote to point a moral. There are nine plates illustrating the book, of which that of the library, facing page 170, is the best.

THE DEVILS OF THE DIPPERS.

Inscriptions Mandaïtes des Coupes de Khouabir : texte, traduction, et commentaire philologique, avec quatre appendices et un glossaire. Par H. Pognon, Consul de France à Alep. 1ère partie. 10 x 6 1/2 in., 103 pp. and 31 plates. 2ème partie, 128 pp. Imprimerie Nationale. Paris, 1898, 1899.

Walter.

For a long time the sect whose incantations form the subject of this curious volume was a mystery to Orientalists. It was their Junius, their Man in the Iron Mask. Every scholar must have his say "De Zabiis," and what he said was invariably wrong. One after the other, Scaliger, Salmasius, Pococke, Bochart, Golius, aired ingenious theories on the nature of this elusive religion, and most of them confounded the old confusion between the Sabians and the Sabæans. The actual people were at last discovered, dwelling in the fens of Lower Mesopotamia, and practising peculiar rites—especially severe and frequent immersions, which, coupled with their reverence for the Baptist, procured them the misleading name of "Christians of St. John." Other complications, however, ensued. Sabians were discovered to have existed at Harran, and efforts were made to consolidate the Sabæans of Job, who fell upon his oxen and asses, the Sabæans of Philostorgius, the Sabians of Babylonia, and those of Harran. Hopeless confusion was the result, and one of the finest muddles ever concocted in learned controversy occupied the energies of scholars. When at last Norberg got hold of the text of the Babylonian Sabians' Sacred Book, the "Book of Adam," matters began to clear up; Chwolson "differentiated" the Harran sect; and Petermann and Euting at length established the true position of the strange people whom the Arabs call Sabians or "washers, baptists," but who call themselves Mandaean or "Gnostics," and who worship Hayya Kadmaya, or "Original Life," among the swamps of the Euphrates. Their language was investigated by the erudite Straassburg professor, Theodor Nöldeke, and found to be an Aramaic dialect allied to Chaldee. Their modern practices and superstitions were reported by a French Consul at Mosul, M. Siouffi, and now we have a strange collection of their amulets or prophylacteries edited by another French Consul, M. Pognon, of Aleppo.

The Mandæan religion is one of the oddest jumbles that ever was known :—

It is one of those bizarre creeds which rose up on the ruins of the great pagan religions. Those who have tried to follow the history of Gnosticism, who have wandered through the mazes of the systems which sprang from the dying throes of Hellenism, and have dived into the writings of the Alexandrian and Syrian schools, have read the Hermetic books, and endeavoured to trace the workings of Gnostic and Cabalistic doctrines among the Judæo-Christian sects, will understand what a tangle of dogma is found in the Mandæan creed.

To disentangle the Jewish, Parsee, Christian, possibly even Buddhist elements, passes the wit of man, but that the general basis is a corrupt and perverted gnosticism is now admitted. How St. John Baptist came to be mixed up in the religious beliefs of the Mandæans, and why they subject themselves to such rigorous immersions on all unreasonable occasions and in the coldest state of the river, are difficult questions. A certain young convert of the name of Adam told M. Sionfi all about it, but Adam's word was perhaps not worth very much. He related, among other things, that St. John, being very well liked, was so afraid of the blandishments of women that he induced all the Sabians to renounce marriage, until a voice from Heaven remonstrated with him for annihilating the whole race ; so he married, and they all married, and baptised each other indefatigably. One suspects that some relic of ancient river-worship lurks in these semi-Christian lustrations in the Euphrates.

The Mandæan religion is full of terrors. It abounds in monsters, demons, fiends of horrible shape and portentous appetites for souls. To exorcise the devils that possess their congregations, and to ward off the influences of evil spirits, are leading parts of the priest's duty, and often the process is complicated and exhausting. Only one species of devil, however, was ever known to resist the spells of the priests when they joined in a general attack. So careful are the Mandæans to give no advantage to the devils, that they eat their meals in dead silence ; because it was noticed that, if the convives talked, the fiends used to snatch up the meat. How terribly afraid the people were of these evil spirits may be seen in the inscriptions which M. Pognon has copied from a number of earthen bowls dug up at Khuwabir on the bank of the Euphrates in 1894, and dating, according to their editor's judgment, from a period not far distant from the Arab conquest in the seventh century. The inscriptions are written in ink, and besides those in Mandæan there are a few in Hebrew and some which may possibly be Pahlavi. The superstitious folk seem to have fancied that they could shut up a devil between a pair of properly inscribed bowls, one inverted on the other, or nail him, so to speak, by clapping a talismanic bowl over him, and covering it up with earth. The formulas inscribed on the bowls name the person to be protected against the devils, and name the devils too, and one is sorry to find that so many fiends were female. St. John Baptist's misogyny evidently survives on these bowls. We read, for example :—

The curses and incantations are averted, turned back, and driven away from the body of the son of Htima. Voice of the earth that quakes ! Voice of the heaven that revolves ! Voice of the din, the uproar, and the war that is waged among the angels of the firmament ! There is confusion among the Istarits and the Lilits ! Voices of angry mighty women, who curse and crawl on their backs ! The spittle has been spat, and bitter are the curses that we have invoked in the name of the seven and the three angels. . . . I, who have seen them, even I, have turned over on them the great vault which is upon their witchcraft. I have twisted them together and fettered all the mysteries.

Most of the formulas begin with a sweeping denunciation, which seems to indicate a not very Christian state of Mandæan society. "They are averted, all the curses and incantations of the men, women, little boys, and little girls of my wicked enemies, my adversaries, and all those who curse and bewitch by night and by day. . . . They are bound, they are bound, they are all bound." There is something weird and uncanny about these monotonous spells ; they often begin with a "voice" :—"The voice, the voice, hearken to the voice of the weak who are crushed, the voice of men who strive in war, the voice of angry, cursing, fighting women, who afflict this body of the daughter of Anush." Fortunately there is a spell which masters them all, the great name of Tabak, which naturally brought consolation :—

Thou wilt go and not return, thou shalt be cast down and rise no more, thou shalt wither like a germ in an egg, at the name of Tabak, the angel who seizes and grips all the curses which have been laid on Pa-chapta the daughter of Mahlapta. Drive them from her by the power of Adonai Yurba, lord of all evil spirits and driver of the chariots of darkness, drive them away, that they touch her not, those curses and incantations by night and day !

M. Pognon does not attempt to explain the uncomfortable demonology of his bowls ; he is more occupied with the difficulties of translation. But the subject is really very interesting. The Mandæan evidently passed his time in a state of "creepy" excitement ; life by the banks of the Euphrates could never be dull so long as the voices of angry, crawling women and potted spirits were constantly ringing in one's ears.

In an interesting appendix (2ème partie) M. Pognon prints the Syriac text, with translation, of parts of the eleventh Book of a treatise on religious sects, by Theodore bar Khuni, written apparently at the close of the eighth century. It is largely copied from Epiphanius, through the medium of a bad Syrian translation, for Theodore evidently had no Greek : but there are some quaint stories about the Manichæans, Mandæans, and other sects, which were worth extracting, though they are not of a character that lends itself to indiscriminate quotation. The crude profanity of some of the legends is too coarse for the modern mind. The Oriental Christian was less nice in his taste.

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

Considerable tact is required by a writer who proposes to present reminiscences, over which he himself lingers with affection, to a dispassionate public. In MEMORIES OF ETON AND OLD ETONIANS (Murray, 9s.) Mr. Alfred Lubbock has not always exercised this tact. He talks as he might to his old school-fellows. They, no doubt, will pardon his want of discrimination between what is worth preserving and what is not. As a general picture of Eton life the book cannot be pronounced a success, but it is a clear record of a very important period in the development of Eton sports. During Mr. Lubbock's career the arrival of Dr. Warre as an assistant master in 1860 gave the great impetus to Eton rowing, not the least among his many services to the school. In 1858 Eton had met Radley at Henley for the first time. The engagement of Bell, the first cricket professional at Eton, and the prowess of R. A. H. Mitchell, C. G. Lytton, John Bradley Dyne, E. W. Tritton, and Mr. Lubbock himself put the cricket of the school upon an entirely new footing. Upon the initiation of the author the Eton Ramblers' Cricket Club was established, while during his time the Rifle Corps and the Eton College Hunt were inaugurated, and the first challenge cup for the school fives competition presented by the present second master, "Jimmy Joynes." In these developments the author played an important part, not only as a cricketer, but as an exponent of the wall game and of Eton fives. The chapter on "Boys' Chances at Eton," by the late Mr. Robin Lubbock, carries us forward to the present day. Besides the pathetic interest attaching to the words of the writer on account of his sudden death from a hunting accident last year, the chapter has an attraction of its own. It is a manly answer to the parent who attributes the failure of a son at Eton to some deficiency in the school. But the chief interest of the book lies in the light thrown by one of the best amateur cricketers of his day upon the cricket world of the past generation. Cricket was much more of a pastime than now, and the cricketer a more light-hearted, independent individual, seeking amusement rather than fame in the joyous struggle between the bat and the ball. His success was not blazoned on the posters of the Strand ; his failure did not meet with the execration of a seething crowd, nor the derision of the sporting papers. County cricket was only in its infancy. In those golden days of cricket it was possible during an Eton Ramblers' match for one of the batsmen to retire to a tent for a drink while the game went on without the fielders observing that there was only one batsman at the wickets. Probably they had themselves previously retired to the tent for the same purpose. The only thing that seems to strike Mr. Lubbock as odd about the incident was that it occurred before lunch. Umpires, too, were more human in those days. On one occasion during the Canterbury week, after making an hundred odd, Mr. Lubbock, being out to a very doubtful decision on the part of the great Fuller Pilch, expostulated, "Fuller, you old duffer, I wasn't out." "Perhaps not, but you had been in quite long enough," was the reply. Another time Fuller Pilch gave W.G. not out when he was palpably out. On being remonstrated with, he merely replied that he wanted to see him play. Such stories will serve to amuse all those who are fond of reflecting upon the "old order" in things, and for this reason Mr. Lubbock's book, in spite of the faults we have mentioned, is deserving of a place in the library of sport.

The "Haddon Hall Library" is a series which seems to carry out no very definite plan, but to embrace any side of nature or sport which may occur to the fancy of its editor. Thus Mr. G. A. B. Dewar, who is on the most intimate terms with the birds and beasts of Hampshire, gives us WILD LIFE IN HAMPSHIRE HIGHLANDS (Dent, 7s. 6d. net.). It gives no very special information to entitle it to rank outside the very numerous class of books which record jottings and impressions from nature, and which are, as a rule, written now with much wider sympathies and more artistic perceptions than they were by Richard Jefferies; but it is a very good specimen of its class, as Mr. Dewar is not only a sportsman but loves nature for its own sake, and is a scholar to boot. We have much worth reading about all kinds of living creatures—beasts, birds, their songs and their nests—we note that Mr. Dewar does not believe the stories of the young cuckoo ejecting the eggs of its host—butterflies, and fishes. This is a curious story of Hampshire trout told the author by a Mr. Moss:—

I was fishing one day some twelve seasons ago at Testcombe, where the Anton joins the Test, when I saw swimming slowly along the side of the stream just below me a large black trout of about 2lb. It was a year when there were many fish suffering from fungoid disease, and this trout had the fungus all over its head, and was evidently quite blind. Behind this sick trout was a fine healthy trout of about 1½lb. Both swam slowly along close to the side so that I was able to watch them for about ten minutes. The healthy trout was watching over the sick one. Whenever the sick fish got too near the edge of the stream, the healthy one would swim inside and gently push the former in the side with its nose, and so get it cut into deeper water. This was done repeatedly until I put my landing-net under the diseased fish and took it out of the water, when the healthy one left the spot. I have not the slightest doubt that the healthy fish had taken charge of the sick one. Up to that time I had always been accustomed to look on fish as very cold-blooded creatures. The incident presented matters in a somewhat new light, and for a while it rather took the edge off my pleasure in fishing.

The books in this series are pleasantly got up, and the head and tail pieces to the chapters in this volume are delightful.

MEDIEVAL TOWNS: TOLEDO, by Hannah Lynch (Dent, 3s. 6d. n.), and MODERN SPAIN, by Reginald St. Barbe (Elliot Stock, 3s. 6d.), present an interesting contrast of the different impressions Spain can produce upon her visitors. The authoress of "Toledo" leaves the Spanish capital "abustle with modern movement, glaring, gesticulating, chattering, animated in its empty and insignificant fashion," with only a passing glance at this misplaced specimen of modern civilization. She hastens to the old-world Spain embodied in its ancient City, Toledo, where at a bound "memory is at the core of troubled Spanish history, a sad spectral ghost in the thrall of wonderment and admiration." "Surely," says she, "never was town, with all our modern needs of bread-winning and competition, of commerce and politics, of cheap ambition and every-day social intercourse, so curiously, magnificently, faithful to its past." The authoress is no mere tourist. She settles down to the task of evoking the life of Spain as seen in its architecture and in its people, beneath their spurious varnish of "modernity." The book is a thoughtful and appreciative account of a bit of the old Spain which has jogged along at the heels of an exotic civilization for which the Spaniards have shown no particular aptitude. The visitor to Toledo cannot have a better guide than the book of Mrs. Hannah Lynch.

Mr. St. Barbe, on the other hand, hurries through some of the cities, seeing nothing but their wretched present, and of their glorious past only what the guide-book forces on his notice. His book is of modern Spain, of which he has little good to tell. But can we judge a country like Spain, awaking slowly from an economic lethargy, by contemporary standards? To quarrel with the Spaniard about his mañana and with his institution of beggars is to be blind to the quaint and picturesque in old-world things. The illustrations of both books are good, especially those by Mr. A. J. Wall in Mr. St. Barbe's volume.

The original of ENCHANTED INDIA, by Prince Bojidar Karageorgevitch (Harpers, 5s.), written in French, has not yet been published; but the translation made by Clara Bell appears first. It seems to be thoroughly well done; we have noticed no trace of the process of translation, and Miss Bell writes in easy and lucid style. The book is a series of impressions, without connexion, and depending for their effect on colour, light, and shade. Prince Karageorgevitch, who is a Servian, has evidently read his Loti, and though he is not so effeminate and mawkish as the Frenchman, he has caught an echo of his style and something of his sentimentality. At Palitana, we read:—

Evening fell, purple and orange tinging the Prince's muslins to delicate hues; then very quickly all was dark. Deep melancholy came over us; we all sat without speaking a word, while from afar came the clatter of tom-toms from the temple, sometimes drowning the music, which droned on in a minor key, a mauling strain without a close but constantly repeating itself. The Rajah, a prisoner in his little state . . . cast a glance of deep melancholy towards a last golden beam that quivered on the sacred hill, and seemed to awake from a dream.

He was probably thinking of the night's coming carouse. Orientals always look melancholy, but it is the ryot who has good cause rather than the rajah, unless he be one of the old fighting breeds: even he hopes for a brush with Russia. Prince Karageorgevitch had no reason at all for his deep melancholy. Most of the book, however, is bright enough, and contains a pretty series of pictures sketched while the feeling was fresh. If it does not quite bear out the title, it gives, at least, very pleasant reading, especially for those who know India. The magic is not here, but here are the atmosphere, the colour, the sensuousness of that romantic land.

THE KING'S MOTHER, by Lady Margaret Domville (Burns and Oates). There have been so many Kings, and so many of them have had mothers, that the title of this book seems a little ambiguous, unless we add that it is a popular and sympathetic memoir of Margaret Beaufort, Countess of Richmond and Derby, mother of Henry VII., foundress of two Cambridge colleges, and to this day the eponymous patron of a professor and a boat club at that University. Lady Margaret has based her memoir on the biography published by Miss Halsted many years ago, and on the researches of Charles Henry Cooper, which were edited by the scholar curiously referred to in the preface as Professor "Jeb" Mayor. There should be a ready sale for this popular account of a pious and accomplished lady, who, apart from other claims to our gratitude and respect, has the distinction of being the promoter and, in part, the translator of the first printed English edition of the "Imitatio Christi." The book suffers from the grave defect of having no index.

Any one who wishes to obtain information about the habits and customs of the criminal classes, the distinguishing marks.

by which the "born criminal" may be recognized, the climates, seasons, and conditions most appropriate to the different varieties of crime, cannot do better than turn to Signor Lombroso's LE CRIME: CAUSES ET REMÈDES (Bibliothèque internationale des Sciences Sociologiques. Schleicher Frères, Paris, 10f.). Its author's theories upon his subject are well known, and the results of his long research have been here arranged in compact form for use as an introduction to the larger works of the same author, and of other criminologists. It is illustrated with maps and figures, among the most interesting of which are the maps showing the distribution of crime in France. These have a curiously accidental appearance, when compared with the corresponding crime maps of England (published by the Home Office), which show clearly that on this side of the Channel crime follows the coalfields. Signor Lombroso says much that is suggestive upon the prison system "un des plus grands facteurs du crime," recidivism, the drink evil, and the influence of the Press, of religion, of Governments, and of economic conditions, upon crime.

A little book on criminals of a different kind is Mr. K. Y. Power-Berrey's THE BYE-WAYS OF CRIME (Greening, 2s. 6d.). The virtuous and the respectable are always interested in the ways of life followed by their erring brothers, and Mr. Berrey does not treat of his criminals in even a pseudo-scientific spirit, but merely gives modern instances of the habits of thieves, and "tips" for frustrating their knavish tricks. As the result of long experience in police and assize Courts, he is of opinion that the real criminal is born a criminal. But his business is not to reform society, only to point out some of the dodges, often very amusing ones, which the tramp and the pickpocket, the begging letter-writer, and the welsher employ for their own ends. His book contains many interesting stories and new observations, illustrated by pictures, on the modus operandi of swindlers.

As an inevitable result of the increasing popularity of Bridge, the latest rival of orthodox Whist, several little treatises on the game have made their appearance. The most recent of these is PONS ASINORUM, OR BRIDGE FOR BEGINNERS, by A. H. Beaman (Methuen, 2s.). Like most Bridge-players, the author is an enthusiast, and believes that the new game will live. That it possesses many attractive features is generally admitted, but Mr. Beaman's prophecy that Whist "must soon be relegated to the limbo of the past" is perhaps premature. A clear account of the rules and leading characteristics of Bridge is given, the somewhat elaborate system of scoring is explained, and twenty specimen games are added by way of illustrating its possibilities. It is to be regretted that Mr. Beaman has not followed the example of earlier treatises and given a table of Honours for the purpose of ready reference. In his hints and suggestions the author has, to a large extent, disarmed criticism by frankly avowing that he is not writing as an expert. Beginners are advised not to accept Mr. Beaman's dictum that a "singleton" lead is to be recommended. When sans atout or no trumps, has been declared, a lead from weakness is always dangerous, and in other cases needs justification. Another opinion expressed is opposed to the view generally held by good players. The author advises the dealer with very weak cards to refrain from passing to his partner, and to guard against risks by a "spade" declaration. Unless, however, the dealer can actually control and save the game by such a declaration, it is rightly considered better to pass, and at any rate give the partner a chance. If the latter also should be weak, he will naturally fall back on a black suit. The illustrative games at the end of the book are full of interest and variety, and have been selected and commented on with care and judgment.

PHILOSOPHY.

Nietzsche's THUS SPAKE ZARATHUSTRA, translated by A. Tille, and THE CASE OF WAGNER, NIETZSCHE CONTRA WAGNER, THE TWILIGHT OF THE IDOLS, THE ANTICHRIST, translated by T. Common, form vols. 2 and 3 of the complete English edition of Nietzsche's works, published by Fisher Unwin, the first volume of which we noticed in a recent number. The "Zarathustra," in Mr. Tille's version, has already been before the public some considerable time without making any impression corresponding to that which it produced in its native land. The English reader prefers that a book of wit and wisdom should be clear and reasonably short. "Zarathustra" is a wild, confused medley of incident, speech, and conversation, without apparent plan, immensely long and full of odd thoughts purposely thrown into an obscure form which is not made more intelligible by the methods of the translator. And in those places where the writer's meaning is obvious it is more often shocking than instructive. The case is different with the other volume, which contains the shorter pieces. Those who are interested in Wagner and in the present position of music should take note of the grounds of Nietzsche's disagreement with him. They are important and interesting, even to one who is not an expert. The "Antichrist" is an example of Nietzsche's latest and most violent manner, when his mind had evidently lost its balance. Yet even in his furious denunciations of Christianity there is food for thought. They suggest that even in our most accepted religious ideals there is some ground for dissatisfaction which may some day find a saner and more discriminating expression.

PSYCHOLOGY AND LIFE, by Professor Hugo Münsterberg (Constable, 6s. n.), is a series of six essays on the nature and scope of psychology and its bearing on various subjects of thoughtful interest. Professor Münsterberg made his reputation a dozen years ago in Germany as an exponent and discoverer in the "new" psychology, the psychology of experiment and quantitative measurement. He has since crossed the Atlantic and found a home at Harvard, and puts forth this book in the language of his adopted country. The essays have all been delivered as lectures before popular audiences. They are vigorous, positive, and make a genuine effort after intelligibility. But they will hardly fulfil the expectations which Professor Münsterberg's name is sure to awaken. The chief aim of the book "is the separation of the conceptions of psychology from the conceptions of our real life." The result is that the conclusions reached are mainly negative. Three of the essays are concerned with the questions, "What has psychology to do with education, with art, and with history?" and the answer in each case is simply "Nothing whatever." "Psychology is a special abstract construction which has a right to consider everything from its own important standpoint, but which has nothing to assert in regard to the interpretation and appreciation of our real freedom and duty, our real values and ideals." Now this is a conclusion which is of a nature to discredit psychology, if it were true, which we venture to think it is not. Psychology, it seems to us, has a good deal to say about all those interesting questions of practice. But that is because it is not really subject to the vicious abstractness to which it is condemned by Professor Münsterberg.

THE PSYCHOLOGY OF REASONING, by Alfred Binet, translated by A. G. Whyte (Kegan Paul, 3s. 6d.), is an attempt to carry into the domain of logic the principles of ideal association which the author has applied to the explanation of mental pathology and hypnotism. For this purpose he takes as proven the results of the English school of psychology as set forth more especially by Mr. Herbert Spencer and Professors Bain and Sully. He does not show any recognition of the fact that grave doubts are being thrown upon this psychological system in the country of its origin, and that Mr. Spencer's explanations of reasoning as an association of images, on which Dr. Binet largely relies, has been treated with general neglect by logicians. The conclusion of the book is that Reasoning is the establishment of an association between two states of consciousness, by means of an intermediate state of consciousness which resembles the first state, which is associated with the second, and which, by fusing itself with the first, associates it with the second.

The essay is clearly expressed and admirably translated, and it is stimulating to read these much-debated logical problems handled by an expert in another science.

Mr. G. E. Woodberry's HEART OF MAN (Macmillan, 6s.) is a series of graceful studies intended "to illustrate how poetry, politics, and religion are the flowering of the same human spirit, and have their feeding roots in a common soil, deep in the general heart of men." The most interesting, perhaps, from a philosophical point of view, is that on Democracy, showing as it does how American institutions are judged by a cultured and sympathetic American professor, who has not been carried away by the anti-democratic re-action so common among men of his class. "Democracy," he says, "is a mode of dealing with souls," and it is on the spiritual significance of its principles that the author enlarges, rather than on its efficacy as a form of government.

Mr. H. Croft Hiller's HERESIES; OR, AGNOSTIC THEISM, ETHICS, SOCIOLOGY, AND METAPHYSICS, vol. 1 (Grant Richards, 5s.), contains many fierce denunciations of widely divergent opinions with which the author does not happen to agree. Among the objects of his wrath are archdeacons, monists, broad churchmen, Christian altruists, materialistic philosophers, positivist philosophers, the authors of "The Bible and the Child," Mr. Gladstone, and the English newspapers. Except that he is some kind of Socialist, it is not easy to discover the writer's own standpoint; presumably it is reserved for a later volume. Those who like strong invective and plenty of it, without any superfluous literary ornament, will find enough here to satisfy the largest appetite.

SEXTUS EMPIRICUS AND GREEK SCEPTICISM, by Mary Mills Patrick (Deighton, Bell, 5s. n.), is a short, scholarly monograph on that interesting though subordinate phase of ancient thought for which Sextus is our chief authority. It deals with the subject critically and historically, and includes a clearly-written account of Ænesidemus and of Pyrrho, the patriarch of the sceptic school. Pyrrhonism, as the author explains, has an interest which is not entirely historical; there is much in its insistence on the relativity of knowledge which recalls similar tendencies in modern speculation. The treatise ends with a translation of the first book of the "Pyrrhonic Sketches," in which are found the most important points of Sextus' doctrine.

GERMAN BOOKS.

WIENER THEATER (1892-1898) is the title given to Hermann Bahr's collection of dramatic criticisms reprinted from Die Zeit, and published by Fischer of Berlin. Herr Bahr is one of the most versatile of modern Continental writers; a novelist and playwright, an editor, a feuilletonist, and a critic (both of art and the drama). The "Wiener Theater" is an important contribution to modern criticism. It bears testimony to the fact that the standard of plays and players is infinitely higher in Austria than it is with us. One cannot fail to be struck by the variety of the performances at the leading Viennese theatres during the nineties. Euripides and Shakespeare figure among the older dramatists. Among the later, Hebbel, Grillparzer, Ibsen, Suderman (whom Herr Bahr ranks very high) Hauptmann, Fulda, Hirschfeld, von Wolzogen, and Schnitzler. While adaptations of Sardou, Rostand, and Donnay figure in the repertory, it is worthy of note that the only modern English plays mentioned are Niobe and Little Lord Fauntleroy. The former, says Herr Bahr, hardly merits the name of play, and is only made possible by the stupidity of the crowd.

A second edition has just appeared of the interesting MEMOIRS OF THE BARONESS CECILE DE COURTOT (Leipzig, Schmidt and Günther). The volume is based on a diary and on letters to Frau von Alvensleben. Cecile de Courtot lived as an émigrée for eight years with the Alvenslebens; she was an eye-witness of the French Revolution, a sufferer from the Terror, and was brought into close contact with Napoleon and many celebrated persons of the period.

A selection from Ruskin, entitled CHAPTERS ON ART, edited, with notes, for the use of schools, by Dr. S. Saenger, has just been published at Berlin.

Dr. Taylor's valuable essay on THE OXYRHYNCHUS LOGIA AND THE APOCRYPHAL GOSPELS (Clarendon Press, 2s. 6d.) contains in an expanded form the substance of a lecture delivered last year in Oxford. It consists of a series of suggestive notes on the Logia, tending, on the whole, to show that the Logia were "extracted or evolved from the canonical and other writings."

A French translation of the ZUR KRITIK DER POLITISCHEN ÖKONOMIE of Karl Marx has been published in the same series as Signor Lombroso's book mentioned above. This work, which was the first result of Marx's economic studies, appeared in 1869, but was never finished, for its author finally embodied his views in his famous book "Das Kapital." The "Kritik" may, nevertheless, be regarded as an introduction to the better known work, which has already been translated into French. The "Kritik" has been carefully translated and edited by M. Léon Remy (Paris, Schleicher Frères, 1899: 3f. 50c.).

LE DÉPART D'ACHILLE, the poem, in one act and seven scenes, by Count Albert du Bois, the author of "Athénienne" and many other works popular in Paris, has recently been translated into English by the Rev. Charles R. S. Elvin, and published by Messrs. Chapman and Hall. The business of transplanting such a work into English soil is almost as beset with difficulties as the translation of Hamlet into French, but Mr. Elvin has approached his subject with enthusiasm and knowledge, and the result, if uninspired, is as sound as one might expect from the combination of such qualities.

We have received from Messrs. Hatchards the privately printed ESSAYS of the late Mr. Wray Hunt, vicar of Trowell. These papers were contributed to the Spectator, St. James's Gazette, and other periodicals, and treat of "The Stripling Thames," "A Cotswold Idyll," "Shakspeare and Modern 'Iams,'" and similar subjects. They are written in an agreeable style and display culture, and the volume is beautifully produced.

Although scarcely to be recommended as a light popular account of the latest application of modern science to the amusement of the people, Mr. H. V. Hopwood's LIVING PICTURES, containing their History, Photo-Production, and Practical Working, with a Digest of British Patents and Annotated Bibliography (Optician and Photographic Trades Review, 2s. 6d. n.), should prove useful to that numerous class of readers, such as patent agents, patent barristers, opticians, and the like, who take a commercial interest in living pictures. On the other hand, the more scientifically-minded will not find much to interest them. The author quite rightly emphasizes the fact that the perfect living picture is not yet in sight; the vibration, blur, and rattle of the majority of these mechanisms will not remain long with us, and it may be safely predicted that, with so many keen brains and clever hands at work on the subject, beautifully coloured, well-defined, thoroughly natural-looking pictures will soon be familiar objects. Throughout the greater part of the volume the style is extremely matter-of-fact, but in the last chapters we are led by easy stages up to a truly tremendous peroration:—

The whole history, not of this world alone, but of every sphere that is or has been, is still in vibrating existence, and one universal perception extending through the infinity would embrace within the tremblings of the boundless ether a consciousness of all that was or is, an eternal and universal picture of all past events. Having started from persistence of vision due to the sluggish action of our mundane eyes as nerves, having lost ourselves in fancied possibilities of the illimitable, what remains for human thought and pen but the simple word "Finis?"

What, indeed!

In the fifth edition of Murray's HANDBOOK TO SOMERSETSHIRE (6s.) the county for the first time stands alone. In previous editions it was associated with Wilts and Dorset. The usual high standard of merit is maintained, and there is an abundance of historical information from the times of Vespasian and Hadrian downwards. Cycling routes are prescribed; but there is nothing about roads suitable for motor cars, though parts of Somerset afford every facility for the destruction of these conveyances.

The Great Eastern Railway Company issues a booklet containing directions for HOLIDAYS IN THE OLD FLEMISH CITIES. It is artistically illustrated, and written by Mr. Percy Lindley, whose guide book work always affords entertaining reading.

THE PASTORAL PILGRIM.

For me the town sets forth in vain
Her painted pleasures in a train.
For I arise and go
To a delicious world I know.

There the gold-fretted fields are set
Like pearls within a carcanet
With daisies fine and fresh,
And kingcups tangled in a mesh.

The pastoral lands I seek where stray
The strawberry cattle and the gray,
Knee deep in dew and scent,
Placid, and breathing forth content.

Brave copses line each hill and there
The pleasant habitations are,
With roses to the eaves,
And nightingales amid the leaves.

When I shall wake there to the sun
And the birds' early antiphon,
And lusty bee his chant,
How shall I grieve, how shall I want?

Sweet peas and dappled mignonette
Below my crystal window set,
Clear air and lucent skies,
And the dove's whispers and replies.

A garden and an orchard white
And pink—an orchard's my delight,
Whose very name doth bring
Airs of the summer, joy of spring.

And having these shall I repine
For houses, houses in a line,
With other men to dwell?
Give me my staff and cockle-shell.

KATHARINE TYNAN.

Among my Books.

What hours of true intellectual recreation do these friends from various climes, illustrating many diverse tastes, and illuminating many a bygone page of history, afford to one who is living in the twilight which intervenes between the vigorous prime and the decadent evening of human life! Collected as my books have been in different parts of the globe, each has its own individual story of acquisition, each recalls some interesting association of the past, and each has often satisfied the particular craving of the passing hour. Here the bibliophile however would find no rare or out-of-print editions, no first folios, for these have a special market of their own far beyond the reach of modest incomes, and they generally find their way nowadays to American collectors. But as the suitability of means to certain ends is the idea which mankind most commonly conceive of proportion, so it happens that despite the dilapidated condition of some of my books, the antiquated appearance of one set and the freshness and newness of another, or the absence of costly bindings and of éditions de luxe, I feel as I look around the motley pile in the midst of which I am now sitting that my labour in collecting them has not been in vain, and many have been the happy hours I have passed "among my books."

Naturally, of course, in this, as in every large circle of friends, some are greater favourites than others, are more frequently consulted, and are treated as more intimate companions. There is, for instance, that book of wisdom of the sage of "Shiraz," whose delightful saws, be they ever so trite, appeal always to one's innermost nature, and whose converse amuses while it chastens our mind; there is pious old John Bunyan; Boswell's "Johnson," revealing to us the Colossus of Learning in his very flesh and blood; Carlyle's "French Revolution"; "Modern Painters"; Tennyson's "Sir Galahad," and lastly, to say nothing of a great many others to enumerate which would be to make the list too long, there are the works of Edmund Burke, which naturally have a special interest for one living as I am on the very site on which once stood his Beaconsfield house, surrounded by the very trees and amidst the meadows where he was wont to ramble, and where his friends learnt to recognize the simplicity and lovable nature of the man.

One of the most curious books in my collection is perhaps "Wanley's Wonders," published in 1788. and containing upwards of seven hundred pages of information on almost every conceivable topic. It is a veritable storehouse of inexhaustible wealth, embodying in six books several thousand most interesting relations of persons, together with accounts of the invention of arts, the advancement of science, surprising escapes from death and dangers, strange discoveries of long-concealed murders, and a vast variety of other matters equally curious. The author or compiler was a former Vicar of Trinity Parish, Coventry, named Nathaniel Wanley, who appears to have been an omnivorous reader, and to have had a special bent for collecting what Lord Bacon called "the ultimities of human nature." His industry must have been phenomenal, and his learning immense, for he evidently ransacked the literature of all times and nations. His opening chapter treats Of the strange constitution and properties of some human bodies, and herein we read of one who could put himself into a palsy when he pleased, and whose body was so poisonous that the most venomous creatures when provoked to bite him died immediately from the poison they imbibed from his system; of another, Martinus Ceccho, a townsman of Montilupo, that he used to take hot coals in his hand, put them in his mouth and bite them in pieces with his teeth, and suffer a burning candle to be held under his tongue as he put it out of his mouth—a story vouched for by divers Capuchins and worthy Nicholas Accursius of the Order of St. Francis, which might supply Mr. Andrew Lang with additional data for a future edition of his "Making of Religion." Most of us who are lovers of roses and enjoy their fragrance, believing with Goethe that

They in Flora's realm control Swiftly eyes and sense and soul, will be astonished to hear of persons, most of them Bishops and Cardinals, from whom a greater tolerance of innocent Beauty might have been expected, who would fall into a swoon upon the smell of a rose, and used to shut themselves up in their rooms during the season when that Queen of the Garden was in bloom. An innate hatred of apples appears to be a peculiarity of other people, and it is recorded of Johannes Querceto, Secretary to Francis the First of France, that so offensive was the smell of this fruit to him that if an apple were held near his nose he would fall a bleeding.

The Psychical Research Society would find many facts of a highly interesting character collected in the chapters On Dreams, and what had been revealed to some persons therein; Of Presages of good and evil Fortune, and Of famous predictions and their events. A toxicologist might add to his repertoire of observations by reading the chapter entitled Of such persons as have taken poison and quantities of other dangerous things without damage thereby. The physician and surgeon would spend a pleasant half-hour's study in reading the chapter devoted to Such as have been cured of dangerous diseases and wounds, and the respect of the former for the skill of Paracelsus would perhaps be enhanced by a perusal of a wonderful cure he effected in the case of a citizen of Vitus who was sick unto death. If a copy of Wanley's work exists in the imperial library at St. Petersburg, it is just possible that the Tsar's conception of a coming era of universal peace may have been largely inflamed by a perusal of the chapter on Such as have been great lovers and promoters of Peace; while Lord Wolseley would doubtless be himself amused by the Stratagems in war for the amusing and defeating of the enemy, and the taking of cities, which are collected in one of the concluding chapters. The last chapter of this extraordinary book is devoted to an account Of such people and nations as have been scourged and afflicted by small and contemptible things, or by Beasts, Birds, Insects, and the like; and reading it one cannot but feel a lurking suspicion in one's mind that the versatile author of an amusing tale, once affirmed to be a record of truth but now admitted to be tinged at least by fiction, must have had this chapter before him when describing his army of rats, his rainfall of fishes, and his flight of locusts. On the whole, "Wanley's Wonders" is a book abounding with curious information, laboriously collected, and vouched for in every case by a reference to the original authority from which the facts are taken, which will well repay a closer acquaintance.

Amongst my foreign books there is one in particular I would wish to mention with the tribute of a humble admirer, because the author is one who deserves to be better known in this country. I allude to the poetical works of Theodor Körner. Born in Dresden on the 25th September, 1791, Theodor Körner was brought up under the influence of Schiller, his father's greatest friend, and he not unnaturally imbibed the lofty spirit of the older poet, who was the literary idol of the Körner family. Artistic in his tastes, which he inherited from his mother, the youthful Körner very early displayed those poetical talents which were destined to place him in the front rank of the sweetest singers of his beloved Fatherland. While yet only fifteen he composed a dramatic poem entitled "Amor und seine Heerscharen," and four years later he published his first collection of poems under the appropriate title "Knospen," or "Blossoms." Blossoms they truly were, of an ardent and impetuous genius, fired by patriotic enthusiasm for the great cause of German freedom, in defence of which, against the threatened yoke of Napoleonic supremacy, he was soon to lay down his life as Adjutant of Lützow's Volunteer Corps. He was killed by a gunshot wound in an attack on a French convoy on the 26th of August, 1813, near Gadebusch, ere he had completed his twenty-second year, and he was buried in the small village of Wöbbelin, in Mecklenburg. With him, as it has been said, "poetry buried a rich possession, and still brighter hopes." Looking at what this youthful "singer and hero," as Uhland calls him, had already accomplished at an age when most men of genius are only just beginning to become known, one is struck with admiration, not only at the prolific character of his muse, but at the versatility, the depth, and the pathos of his poetry. Had he lived for even another ten or twenty years, and fulfilled the promise which his existing works justified his friends in hoping for, it is difficult to say whether Goethe himself would have maintained his literary supremacy, or what revolution in the literary world of his own country his matured reputation may not have effected. As it is, he can claim to be a dramatist, and a writer of lyrics and comedies of no mean order. In his Zriny, the stirring episode from Hungarian history of the heroic defence of the fortress of Sziget by Graf von Zriny against the veteran army of the Great Suliman is skilfully worked up into one of the most affecting tragedies which has ever been produced on the German stage. It roused the national spirit to intense enthusiasm, and was received with rapturous applause when produced on the Vienna stage. The devotion and self-sacrifice of the small band of survivors, after a long and harassing siege, in blowing up the citadel when they found they were no longer able to defend it, and thus perishing in the terrible explosion, forcibly recalls to one's mind a similar act of heroism in the first days of the Indian Mutiny, when Willoughby and his three subordinates cheerfully resolved to blow up the arsenal at Delhi to prevent that great military storehouse from falling into the hands of the mutineers. In either case the thunder of the crash announcing the accomplishment of the fatal resolution was the final triumph of duty, proclaiming to generations yet unborn the patriot's last resource, to sacrifice himself für Gott und Vaterland! Who, again, can read "Toni" or "Hedwig," without feeling that Körner sublimely realized the nobility of true womanhood, the persuasive gentleness, the unselfish resignation, the steady determination not to swerve from the path which love and duty dictated, and the lofty spirit of courage and promptitude of action when the supreme moment for the exercise of these qualities arrives?

But it is in his lyrics, collected under the title "Leier und Schwert," that he has bequeathed an imperishable legacy to his country. It is in these short poems that he sings forth with all the passionate melody of his wild heart, and appeals to his country's manhood to strike and be free. In one of them, entitled "Mein Vaterland," he asks in the first line, Wo ist des Sängers Vaterland? And he answers in impassioned verse :—

Wo edler Geister Funken sprühten
Wo Kränze für das Schöne blühten,
Wo starke Herzen freudig glühten,
Für alles Heilige entbrannt :
Da war mein Vaterland !

In the next four verses he begins each with a similar question, and asks, What is the name of the Singer's Fatherland? To which, of course, the answer is, The free land, the land of Germany. Why weeps the Singer's Fatherland? And the reply points to the tempest of the bloodthirsty tyrant then ravaging the country, causing the princes of the people to tremble and to forget their solemn pledges. To whom calls the Singer's Fatherland? It calls upon the voiceless gods to lift the revengeful hand of retribution, invoking Freedom and her champions. What does the Singer's Fatherland desire? To strike down the slaves, the bloodhounds, and chasing them over the borders to free her free-born sons; and lastly, What does the Singer's Fatherland hope for? She hopes for the triumph of a just cause, hopes to see her people awakened, hopes for vengeance.

No wonder that a highly sensitive and deeply emotional people should have been roused to patriotic fervour by such noble verses appealing to their sense of patriotism and freedom, and that the memory of the youthful author should be cherished as that of a genuine German singer, whose songs will strike a responsive chord in every German heart so long as there is a German heart which beats.

W. H. RATTIGAN.

Butler's Court, Beaconsfield.

PARODIES.—II.

Does parody require an apology? Browning said in 1888 that he "disapproved of every kind of parody"; but that was after the publication of Calverley's "The Cock and the Bull." Matthew Arnold called it "a vile art"; but Matthew Arnold, despite his chaff of "Professors," was, in his prose criticisms, seldom quite free from the professorial manner, and parody must, of course, not be recognized in the class room. Did he forget, too, that the great names of English literature, from Chaucer to Shakespeare and so onwards, are all associated with parody? Good parody never harmed a soul that did not deserve it, and I do not believe in the reader who suffers in his enjoyment of good literature because he cannot keep the burlesque of it out of his head. A fine work outweighs and outlives its parody, and is in no way impaired by such an attention being paid to it; a bad one may gain its chief value, and perhaps attain an unexpected immortality, by similar treatment. A parody may have the highest literary merit; it may show more power, and be more worth the attention even of a professor than its original.

Parodies divide themselves into two classes—travesties of the style and manner of an author and imitations of some particular composition. The first is, from a literary point of view, far the most difficult, and it is also almost always the most humorous. Its object is generally to criticize; but it may be only to amuse. Calverley, of course, was not criticizing the balladist when he wrote :—

It was a railway passenger,
And he leapt out jauntily.
"Now up and bear, thou stout porter,
My two chattels to me.

Bring hither, bring hither, my bag so red,
And my portmanteau so brown;
(They lie in the van, for a trusty man
He labelled them London town)."

The second class gives us two sub-divisions, the first consisting of those which alter the entire meaning of the lines parodied by the change of a single word or phrase—a type due to a rare and happy inspiration, offering, therefore, but few examples. Its virtue lies in its mischievous roguery; it is like a child putting a straw hat on the head of a grave and reverend statue in a Roman toga. There is no effort; a mere touch, and the whole is flooded with the ridiculous. Calverley approaches it in his

'Twas ever thus from childhood's hour
My fondest hopes would not decay;
I never loved a tree or flower,
That was the first to fade away.

I never loved a dear gazelle;
But I was given a parrot, &c.

The last line but one is a stroke of genius. "Dear gazelles? Ah, well, there the poet, I am afraid, has the better of me, for I know nothing about them. But I was given a parrot, years ago, and that 'is imbecile and lingers yet.'" Another of a still more méchant character is the well-known

Wives of great men all remind us,
We can make our own sublime.

And, still worse, the second stanza, which contemplates the possibility of our leaving them widows :—

Widows which perhaps another,
Sailing o'er life's solemn main,
Some forlorn and shipwrecked brother,
Seeing, may take heart again.

The second sub-division contains those which follow the original, altering it as the subject requires. This, which is the commonest form, requires, save in exceptional cases, no great skill. It may have a definite purpose—political, religious, or other; it may serve to make a mock of a writer or his style; or it may be innocent of any design but to amuse. This kind, too, is often happiest where some word or phrase is retained, but wrested from its proper use, as in "Fifty miles an hour through Europe on a cycle to Cathay."

Into the world of French parody, in the early history of which the ingenious productions commemorating the appearance of a flea on the fair neck of Madame Catherine Desroches (to which Scaliger contributed) and Scarron's "Travesty of Virgil" are well known, space forbids me to enter. With regard to English parodies, M. Delepierre roundly asserts that before the present century they all had a political object and chose their originals from the Liturgy, prayers, and holy books. This phenomenon strikes him with amazement when he recollects the religious and Puritanic character of the English. But there is no foundation for the erudite Frenchman's remark. There is certainly quite enough religious parody to astonish him, though it might be questioned whether, if the purpose of the parody was a good one, this use of the Bible was always so inconsistent with Puritan feeling as he imagined—Luther, one might remind him, parodied the Psalms. Ben Jonson parodied the Litany, which has been often so treated, in "Cynthia's Revels." Dean Boys, of Canterbury, preaching against the Pope at St. Paul's Cross, under James I., parodied the Lord's Prayer. Lord Somers, in the reign of James II., wrote a political parody of part of St. Matthew, and Sir Charles Hanbury Williams, at a later date, parodied the Te Deum. Hone was tried in 1817 for publishing John Wilkes' Catechism and other politico-religious skits, and on his acquittal published an account of his trial, with much information on parodies. His contemporary, Richard Carlile, published compositions of the same kind.

But the history of English parody gives no ground for M. Delepierre's sweeping assertion. It has never been fully written, and it begins, I think, with Chaucer's "Rhyme of Sir Thopas," which goes interminably on in the tedious style of the Trouvère narrative poems until mine host interrupts it with "No mor of this, for Goddes dignite!" Shakespeare chaffs Marlowe's "Tamburlaine" through the mouth of Ancient Pistol, and the Euphuists through the mouth of Armado, and in one place of Falstaff; while Touchstone takes off Orlando with his love verses. The rage for sonneteering among the Elizabethans did not escape its censors; and scholars such as Gabriel Harvey and Sir John Davies wrote "gulling sonnets," in which Shakespeare himself is not spared. At the same time Beaumont and Fletcher, in "The Knight of the Burning Pestle," began the fashion of chaffing other dramatists—a fashion which in these days, when we take our playwrights so very seriously, is unfortunately no longer in vogue. The second Duke of Buckingham and his fellow-wits, who wrote "The Rehearsal" in 1671, on a plan afterwards improved upon by Sheridan in "The Critic," bitterly, but not quite undeservedly, mimicked the heroic plays of the day; and Dryden, who was principally attacked, revenged himself on the principal offender in "Absalom and Achitophel." Fielding carried on the tradition in "Tom Thumb." Another work of Dryden's, "The Hind and the Panther," was caricatured in the same year that it appeared by Prior and Montague, the one afterwards an Ambassador and the other an earl, in "The Town Mouse and the Country Mouse." Pope was more successful as an imitator than a parodist, and he himself set a pattern in the "Dunciad" which was followed in countless compositions with similar titles. Gay cleverly travestied the pastoral poetry of Ambrose Philips. The eighteenth century imitations of Horace, Virgil, and Juvenal are well known. "The Oxford Sausage," published in 1764, contained Philips' "Splendid Shilling" and some excellent reminiscences of Thompson and Pope. The two latter poets, with others, had already been cleverly taken off by Isaac Hawkins Browne in "A Pipe of Tobacco."

The dawn of the century brings us to the classical age of parody—that of the "Antijacobin" and the "Rejected Addresses"; also of Horace Twiss' "Posthumous Parodies." The "Rejected Addresses" are too familiar to quote from; one of the best of them, that in the manner of Crabbe, achieved the distinction of praise from Crabbe himself. Thence onward we have a continuous stream of parody. There are collections, such as the "Bon Gaultier Ballads"; "Leading Cases done into English," by Sir Frederick Pollock; Mr. Bayard Taylor's "Echo Club"; and another American collection by Phoebe Carey, containing perhaps the best "Echo" of "The Burial of Sir John Moore" in "The Marriage of Sir John Smith," with its

We silently gazed on the man that was wed,
And bitterly thought on the morrow.

Some parodies on the American poets at the period of the war between the North and the South appeared in the Orpheus C. Kerr (office-seeker) Papers, 1861. And countless specimens have appeared and are appearing in magazines and newspapers. The Universities have always been much addicted to the "vile art." The "Uniomachia" was, I think, written by Lord Sherbrooke when he was an Oxford don. I have mentioned "The Oxford Sausage"; and in the "Oxford Spectator" (to which the Bishop of Colombo and Mr. Humphry Ward were contributors), the Shotover Papers of a quarter of a century ago, recalling the names of writers now no more, but familiar enough to their contemporaries—Mr. F. S. Pulling, Mr. Gordon Campbell, and Mr. G. W. E. Morrison—and the "Oxford Magazine," with the happy effusions of "A. G." and of "Q." the art was brought well-nigh to perfection. And yet Oxford must surely yield the palm to Cambridge; Cambridge produced Thackeray's prize poem, "Timbuctoo"; and not to mention the famous "Light Green" and the "Granta," from whose pages came Mr. Owen Seaman's

"Horace at Cambridge," did not Calverley, the prince of parodists, the creator of "The Cock and the Bull," of "Wanderers," and of "Lovers and a Reflection," belong, at any rate for the best part of his career, to "the other shop"? And "J. K. S.," too, the author of a Wordsworthian sonnet unique for its aptness and the soundness of its criticism—

Two voices are there; one is of the deep;
It learns the storm clouds thunderous melody,
Now roars, now murmurs with the changing sea,
Now bird-like pipes, now closes soft in sleep;
And one is of an old half-witted sheep,
Which bleats articulate monotony,
And indicates that two and one are three,
That grass is green, lakes damp, and mountains steep;
And Wordsworth, both are thine. At certain times
Forth from the heart of thy melodious rhymes
The form and pressure of high thoughts will burst;
At other times—Good Lord! I'd rather be Quite unacquainted with the A B C
Than write such hopeless rubbish as thy worst.

Few of our poets have wholly escaped the parodist, who even sometimes makes a raid across the channel, as in the amusing imitation of Victor Hugo quoted by Mr. George Russell in "Collections and Recollections," called "À L'Irlande," which begins thus:—

O Irlande, grand pays du shillelagh et du bog,
Où les patriots vont toujours ce qu'on appelle le whole hog,
Aujourd'hui je prends la plume, moi qui suis vieux,
Pour dire au grand patriot Parnell, "How d'ye do?"

Some poets have, of course, enjoyed a greater immunity than others. What seems to be necessary is that a poem should either be very familiar or have some peculiarity of form or style. It must be the latter characteristic which first drew attention to Miss Ann Taylor's one famous poem, "My Mother," of which Mr. Hamilton has collected 108 parodies. No other poem has, I think, reached any such figure. High records are achieved by Gray's Elegy (over 80), and by "To be or not to be," Poe's "Raven," and Kingsley's "Three Fishers"—all well over 50. "The Song of the Shirt," "Break, Break, Break," "The Charge of the Light Brigade," "The May Queen," "Hiawatha," and "Excelsior" have all been over-parodied. The pidgin English version of the latter, "Topsid galow," beginning

That nightee time begin, chop chop
One young man walkee, no can stop, is rather a translation than a parody. Southey has been often and admirably imitated, in the "Antijacobin," the "Rejected Addresses," and since; and it is difficult now to believe that familiarity rather than any pronounced individuality was the cause of it. He has been far more parodied than Shelley. It is easier to understand the case of Thomas Haynes Bayly, the author of "Oh, no, we never mention her" and "We met, 'twas in a crowd," whom Mr. Andrew Lang has skillfully dealt with in "Essays in Little." He gained universal recognition, not by his transcendent merits, but simply because he wrote "words for music," and early Victorian young ladies warbled him in every drawing room.

Prose parody, of which I mentioned one or two specimens in my last article, is a late development, and one of the highest forms of the art. Fielding attempted something like it in "Joseph Andrews," and the "Rejected Addresses" has some excellent Johnsonese. Fielding's idea was carried to much greater perfection in the burlesque novels of Thackeray and Bret Harte, which are almost all of them masterpieces. One reason, some might perhaps say the best reason, for reading "Lothair" was that it enabled you to enjoy "Lothaw." There has been some good work of a similar kind from time to time in Punch by Mr. Burnand, Mr. R. C. Lehmann, and others. The styles of Bacon, Sir Thomas Browne, and other classics have all had their turn, and so has that of Carlyle and Ruskin; but the famous prose writers of the past are hardly familiar enough for parodies of them to appeal to any but students. Isaac Walton has far too much charm and too much idiosyncrasy to escape; but one of the pleasantest imitations of him is now forgotten—an Oxford skit of Lewis Carroll's, with its delightful ending, Venator.—See, Master, there is a fish.

Piscator.—Then let us hook it.

[They hook it.]

Scraps of prose parody appear from time to time in periodicals; but there is here much work "for a hot brain." Prose writing is not at its highest, and it might be refreshed by a little wholesome chaff. There is Mr. Meredith; do we not long for some relief—I think Mr. Max Beerbohm has essayed it with success—from the laboured reproductions of his too reverent disciples? For parody, common as it is, has a part to play, even a duty to perform. It must not be turned to too vulgar uses, or let its finer qualities be forgotten.

F. T. D.

Notes.

The energetic Art workers who prepared the masque of Beauty's Awakening have succeeded quite deservedly in attracting a great deal of public attention. This was not because the performance which has taken place in the Guildhall this week was a new thing, for masques have been revived before within our memory, nor because it was an exact reproduction of the old masque, though it came pretty near it. But it was something out of the common, something away from the stage conventions and the familiar creations of popular stage-managers. Moreover, it presented a stage spectacle in which a real feeling for beauty and colour took the place of the elaborate realism which has been increasing so greatly of late years; and in days when so much is said of literary drama, it is an attempt, and a very successful one, to bring back a disused literary dramatic form. The novelty of the thing was its delightfully harmonious colouring, its symbolical action, and its graceful dances, with the addition of the topical interest awakened by the plea for a restored London—a subject which gave occasion for an admirably costumed procession of historic cities. The success of the performance was proved by the fact that an audience blasé with the highly-wrought technique of the London stage, and trained to expect a brisk succession of sensations, showed no signs of being bored.

The masque was essentially a thing of song and dance, but Jonson and his followers claimed it for literature; and Mr. Walter Crane, with his coadjutors, Mr. Ashbee, Mr. Selwyn Image, Mr. Harrison Townshend, Mr. C. W. Whall, and Mr. H. Wilson, have, as any one who studies the very beautiful illustrated book of the play will see, not fallen short of their traditions. The letterpress, for different parts of which these gentlemen are responsible, is good, if not brilliant. We may quote a song of Mr. Wilson's:—

SONG OF THE AWAKENING.

Wake, lovely maid, thy foes no more withhold me!
Loosed is the spell that long enchained thine eyes,
Now may the healing from thy glance enfold me,
Wake, sweet one, wake, and make me wise!

Dim shews the golden earth while thou art sleeping,
Faint in our hearts thy Beauty's image lies,
Weary the watch the waiting lamps are keeping,
Wake, sweet one, wake, our hope else dies.

No more Aschemon's coil may bar or bound thee,
No more Mal'bodea's might compel thy sighs,
Fayremonde thy Trueheart's arms at last are round thee,
Wake, sweet one, wake, I kiss thine eyes!

Criticism from the professional point of view is rather disarmed in the presence of these enthusiastic amateurs. Compared with the masque of the Stuarts there was an absence of abandon, of the spirit of revelry, which was an essential feature of these performances before they were swept away by the Puritans. But there were touches of humour, too, and we congratulate the stage manager on the top hat which adorned the head of Philistinus, one of the demons attendant on London. We confess we should have liked a little more dialogue such as Jonson and Campion used to provide, and such as our modern masque writers could certainly have written with point and success. It was difficult to make much of the action without the book before one. Even Mr. Selwyn Image, who acted as prolocutor, was not always quite clear, especially when he had to speak against music, while the words of the songs were scarcely audible. Clio's elocution, however, was all that could be desired. The music, it should be added, was pleasing and appropriate. The whole performance was in fact harmonious—a feast of graceful movement and rich colour, conceived in perfect taste, and presented to the modern public in the heart of the city which has always loved shows and pageants, and always encouraged such crafts and arts as the Art Workers' Guild pursue. Is it too much to hope that it will prove a precedent which the same willing artists or their successors will follow regularly in the years to come?

The authorities of the Royal Botanic Society are to be congratulated on their hospitality to lovers of the drama. The performance in the gardens last Saturday evening of A Midsummer Night's Dream by Mr. Ben Greet's company, including Miss Dorothea Baird, added another success to the open-air representations of Shakespeare's plays, which the public have come to associate with the names of Mr. Greet, Mr. Benson, and Mr. Roper Spyers. While on Saturday one of the chief productions of the Elizabethan stage was performed in the gardens, on Monday the Elizabethan Stage Society oddly enough utilized the conservatory of the same gardens for the performance of an ancient Indian drama called Sakoontala. This play, so thoroughly impregnated with the spirit of Oriental romance, was certainly worthy of being presented to an English audience. But the enterprise was surely a little out of the sphere of the society, which has still a host of English plays of much literary interest to add to its repertoire.

Mr. John Murray gave his evidence on Canadian Copyright last week, before the Select Committee of the House of Lords. His proposal is to protect the Canadian (or other Colonial) publisher, who has acquired a licence to print, by forbidding the importation of copies printed elsewhere. The person whose opinion of this would be most interesting is the Canadian collector. His feelings, when he finds that he cannot, without rendering himself liable to prosecution, possess anything better than a twenty-five cent paper copy of a book like Nansen's "Farthest North," will perhaps be easier to imagine than to describe. But, of course, he must be left to defend his own interest, as the English copyright owners have quite enough to do to look after theirs.

In Longman's Magazine Mr. Frank Ritchie protests against the liberties taken by composers in setting words to music, and quotes the following among other instances of the way in which musicians have tampered with the text of the greatest poets;

Tell me, tell me, tell me, where is Fancy bred?
Tell me, tell me, where is Fancy bred?

Reply, reply, reply, reply, reply,
It is engendered in the eye.

This, though it is not among the most successful of Bishop's settings of Shakespeare, does not, of course, sound so absurd when sung as it looks upon the printed page. Moreover the repetition of phrases, though exaggerated in the above instance, often enables the composer to intensify the meaning of the words. The musical effect of repetition has sometimes recommended itself to the poet himself, not only in the ballad but in more elaborate poetry. Not to mention Edgar Allan Poe's experiments in this direction, some of the finest lines in all literature owe their effect to the device. Take for example—

More safe I sing with mortal voice unchanged
To hoarse or mute, though fallen on evil days,
On evil days though fallen, and evil tongues.

Here, where the repetition is made by the poet, the metre is of course unimpaired, whereas the objection to the composer is that in repeating words he spoils their metrical effect. But can he be expected to retain the metre?

Music has a metre of its own, a balance of phrases, which, though analogous to the metres of poetry, is not exactly similar. It is only very rarely that the musician can give the same value to the syllables of the poet as the reciter does, without losing the special opportunities which his art alone affords of expressing the poet's meaning. A song cannot be regarded simply as a musical accompaniment to a poem. A poem as recited and the same poem as sung are two separate works of art, each working on their own lines. The thought is the same, but the means of expressing it are vastly more complicated in a song. If all the subtle means in the possession of the musician are to be employed to give effect to the poet's meaning, the rhythm of the poem must, so to speak, give way to the rhythm of the song. In return the composer has not only his melody and rhythm wherewith to intensify the poet's meaning, but also the more marked gradation in the pace and volume of sound in music than in speaking, and the modulations which give an extra significance to every shade of emotion expressed in the words.

One is apt to think of Tom Hughes, of whose newly inaugurated statue we speak on another page, as a man of one book—or of two or three books at the most. As a matter of fact he wrote eighteen books, besides a considerable number of pamphlets. His "Tom Brown's Schooldays," has been translated into French, and German, and Shorthand.

Half a century or so ago "The Course of Time" was one of the best known books in Scottish households. Edition after edition appeared, and in 1869—forty-two years after the death of the author, Robert Pollok—it had reached the seventy-eighth thousand. Since then it has gradually dropped out of notice. The inscription on the granite obelisk which marks Pollok's grave in the churchyard of Millbrook, near Southampton, bears that—

"His Immortal Poem is his Monument."

Alas! for prophecy. Poor Pollok, it is to be feared, is remembered now only by the few. Yet he has not been entirely forgotten. At the time of the celebration of the centenary of his birth a proposal was made to erect a memorial to him in the vicinity of the place where he was born—North Moorhouse, in the parish of Eaglesham, Renfrewshire. The scheme has received a fair measure of support in the West of Scotland, and it has now been definitely resolved to place a memorial of the poet on the Kilmarnock-road, near Loganswell. Several Edinburgh and Glasgow sculptors have been invited to submit designs.

An exhibition of Greek papyri and antiquities found by Messrs. Grenfell and Hunt at Oxyrhynchus and in the Fayûm will be held at the Society of Antiquaries, Burlington House, from July 5th to 11th. A selection of antiquities from Naucratis, discovered last winter by Mr. Hogarth, Director of the British School at Athens, will also be exhibited.

In these days of rapid process reproduction the work of the older engravers is in danger of becoming forgotten. And yet, in their way, there are no finer books to be found for a library than some of the sumptuous folio collections of engravings published at the end of the last or the beginning of the present century. An excellent specimen of this class is Boydell's "Views," a copy of which Mr. Spencer, of New Oxford-street, includes in his catalogue just issued. This book was published in 1790, the year in which Boydell became Lord Mayor of London. Thirty-six years previously Boydell had begun life in London as an engraver, but so little demand was there for such work that he was glad to sell, through small shopkeepers and hawkers, little books of his own engraving, six views for sixpence.

Another item in Mr. Spencer's catalogue is an autograph letter signed "B.," having reference to "The Curse of Minerva," one of the scarcest and most valuable pamphlets in the English language. Lord Byron first published this poem through T. Davison in 1812, and on October 4, 1813, writes to John Murray with reference to the new edition then being prepared. He says:—"Your Aston-hall letter has never arrived, to my sore discomfiture. However, there is no saying what time may do. In the proof from the 'Curse' alter the line 'Where arts and arms but live in poets' lore' to 'Whose arts revive, whose arms avenge no more.' Remember this." This alteration, it seems, was never made, which is curious, seeing how particular Byron was, and how studious Murray, who had just become his publisher, would be to follow his directions. In the standard seventeen volume edition of 1832, edited by Tom Moore, the line reads precisely as printed in the first edition of 1812. In April, 1898, a copy of the original edition sold by auction for £97. Only three have appeared in the auction rooms during the last eleven years.

A book which recalls vividly the troublous times of the last days of the Stuart dynasty is included in the last catalogue issued by Mr. Thorp, of Reading. This is "An Account of the Growth of Popery and Arbitrary Government in England," published anonymously by Andrew Marvell, and printed for him in Amsterdam in 1677. So offended were the Government at the violent onslaught contained in this pamphlet that they offered, without success, a reward of £100 for the disclosure of the author's name, and much greater sums are said to have been offered privately. Of all Marvell's political satires this appears to have given the greatest offence. He begins by saying that "There has now for diverse years a design been carried on to change the lawful Government of England into an absolute tyranny and to convert the established Protestant religion into downright Popery," and in support of his argument he draws up, in a pamphlet of 155 pages, a tremendous indictment against the Government.

During the whole of next week Messrs. Sotheby will be dispersing various collections of books, many of them from the Syston-park Library, recalling the memorable sale of the year 1884. Among these is a copy of the "Cronica van der Hilliger Stat van Coellen," of 1499, which contains the earliest complete record of the discovery by Gutenberg of the use of movable metal types; a copy of Gafori's "Theoricum opus armonicæ disciplinæ," 1480, the first printed book on music; and a copy of the "Erotomata" of Lascaris, the first book Aldus issued with a date. There is also a fine copy of the first edition of the "Essais de Michel Seigneur de Montaigne," with the printed title-page.

As representing the work of the early English printers there is an excellent copy of Linacre's "De emendata structura Latini sermonis," printed by Pynson in 1524, and, rarer still, a copy of the "Indulgence" granted by the Bishop of Salisbury, and printed by Wynkyn de Worde about 1525. Of books famous in English literature there are a copy of the fourth Shakespeare folio, a large fragment of the first folio, and a fine sound copy of the third quarto, Henry V. There are also among modern books an uncut Kilmarnock Burns, a copy of the exceedingly scarce "Siena," a poem published by Mr. Swinburne in 1868, a copy of the equally scarce first edition of "The Strayed Reveller," by "A.," a complete set of the Kelmescott Press publications, and a copy of the first (1747) edition of Mrs. Glasse's "The Art of Cookery." The late Mr. Sala once found a copy of this scarce little book on a stall in the New Kent-road. He purchased it for sixpence, had it handsomely bound, wrote it into fame, and then assessed its value as £100, but at the sale of his library it fetched only one-tenth of that sum.

American Letter.

THE NEW SORT OF STORIES.

It is now some three or four years since I first heard the word story used as the name of a thing which partakes both of fiction and of fact, of literature and of journalism, and is a blend of these qualities and methods, according to their proportions in the author's nature and practice. It was used with an offhand familiarity by a young friend of mine who was just then dedicating his gifts to the service of one of our most lurid Sunday editions, and sacrificing on that hideous altar the culture acquired in our chief university. I found the spectacle much more melancholy than he seemed to feel it: he was, in fact, rather happy in his work; and when I caught at the word as a relief from my distress, he joyously explained that a "story" was not the story of my belated associations, but was a reporter's account of any incident that came to his knowledge. It might be largely, it might be almost wholly, invention, but it was supposed to be true. The word story had perhaps better been history; but story it was, and story it was destined to be till the revolution of daily life threw off some meteoric spark a little more vividly illustrative of the idea.

I do not suppose the thing is quite so new as the name. There must always have been stories in this sense. The Rosetta stone has doubtless revealed a good many of them among the Egyptian hieroglyphs; they were probably indented on Assyrian tiles; they must have been swapped among the imaginative liars who met to hear or tell some new thing in Athens; the tepid air of the Roman baths must have been full of them; in medieval market-places they abounded; the cryptographic diaries of later centuries are a tissue of them. Now they are printed every morning and every evening in our irrepressible Press, and wherever it is at all possible, a sister art lends the aid of pictures of persons and places to enhance their effect with readers, and to facilitate the task of such part of the public as has to spell its way to their meaning.

They are true in proportion to the editorial idea and the creed of the counting-room. If it is the joint effect of these that the public wants the news, the stories have little or no truth at all in them; if it is the belief of the management that the public wants the facts, then the reporter's story may be almost implicitly trusted. People know pretty well what they are getting by a given newspaper's repute for good faith or bad faith. But there is a vast middle ground, occupied by the greater part of the journals, where the facts are creatively treated, and the resulting story is something that appeals about equally to the fancy and to the passion for the latest intelligence.

I have conversed with many of the ingenuous youths who produce the stories of the newspapers, and I have found them helplessly obedient to the principles of their respective offices. In some they are permitted and even instructed to rearrange or to invent their materials until the result is almost pure fake; in some they are sternly forbidden to invent or to distort the least incident or feature. An interview, as I know from much experience in both cases, is in one sort of paper incredibly misrepresentative; in another it is miraculously accurate. In both the office reserves the right to correct the colouring and drawing of the reporter's story; and what reaches the public finally is something at least two removes from the truth, or the approximation of a double effort for it.

The supreme desire of both kinds of management is for exclusive possession of the material for a story; within the limits of fiction or of fact the highest achievement of a reporter is to make his story a beat. In the range of his art there is nothing beyond this; a story which is also a beat is a chef d'œuvre; it is a Hamlet, a Divina Commedia, in that limbo of literature which forms its rather hopeless habitat. The writer may bring to it dramatic effect, vivid reality, admirable touch, and he does this far oftener than the careless reader knows; but unless it is a beat his story is not an entire and perfect chrysolite; other hands have profaned it; his jealous journal cannot boast it wholly its own.

The beat was formerly called a scoop, and as such I first learned its unique value. But I understand from a very entertaining book which I have just read that the beat is no longer known in the East as a scoop; that word is still used in the West for the thing desired in both sections; but in New York one could not respect a reporter who called his beat a scoop; that would not render it impure or common, but it would indefinitely vulgarize it. At least, I am so instructed by Mr. Jesse Lynch Williams, whose book, "The Stolen Story and Other Newspaper Stories," is the book which has so much amused me, and has inspired these reflections.

Mr. Williams has had the good fortune—it really seems largely a matter of luck in many cases—to treat his fresh material with a simplicity which imparts the sense of strong reality. The newspaper life has a lasting fascination for any one who has ever known it, and I think the most ignorant must feel something of its charm in these tales of the absent-minded old reporter coming back to his desk in the office from which he has been discharged for drunkenness, and writing out there a precious beat belonging to the paper which has just taken him on; of the young reporter whose story of a society woman's lawsuit with her shoemaker meets with unexpected favour; of the cub reporter whose blundering interview commits an administration to a line of policy never intended; of the other cub reporter who fakes a story of burning the King of Spain in effigy by the students at Princetown, and makes it come true in fact before telegraphing his beat to his paper; of the old reporter who cannot leave whisky alone, and whose slow decline and fall are pathetically followed.

The old reporter is a bit of character painting which is very good literature, though not yet the best. He is of the school which is not college bred; and the new reporters are all University men. The difference is humorously traced, and the advance from the old-fashioned newspaper conditions is very intelligibly noted. Whether it will finally affect the newspaper ideals is still to be seen; as yet the University men take the office stamp as submissively as the old self-trained reporters. They are voracious historians, or shameless fakes, according as they are bidden; and the question is whether the newspapers will be influenced by their quality, or their quality will be lost in the newspapers. It is as a group of agreeable sketches that Mr. Williams' book will attract the reader, but it would be a pity if the reader remained indifferent to implications which somewhat concern civilization.

OLD CAMBRIDGE.

A curious effect of time in the case of the town of which Colonel Thomas Wentworth Higginson has lately written so agreeably is to make it less rather than more "Old Cambridge." Instead of acquiring antiquity with the process of the suns, Old Cambridge has been continually growing modern, until now it has almost ceased to be Old Cambridge at all. In fact, it never was really Old Cambridge; that was always the Cambridge on the Cam; but when it ceased to be Newtowne, Massachusetts, it became a younger Cambridge by the Charles, and was later called Old Cambridge to distinguish it from the settlement near the mouth of the river known as Cambridgeport. Its age was a local convention; now that there is no longer a visible space between the two villages and they have become one city, the city is simply Cambridge; and Old Cambridge exists only in the fond memories of its elderly inhabitants, and in the tender associations of generations of youths who have known it as the seat of Harvard University.

It is in both qualities that Colonel Higginson treats of Old Cambridge in the series of the "National Studies in American Letters" (Macmillan's), which his volume opens. He always writes agreeably, to my thinking, with a certain characteristic liberality and large intelligence, and he has never written more agreeably than in the three essays on Holmes, Longfellow, and Lowell, which make up his book. Literary types of such wide variance might well task the sympathy of the most tolerant critic, but Colonel Higginson's has been equal to the demand upon it, and his appreciations of these very different masters are of a very even faithfulness, insight, and cordiality. They were Old Cambridge authors in by no means the same degree; Holmes studied medicine abroad and came back to live in Boston while still a young man; Longfellow came to live in Cambridge in early middle life; Lowell was the most constant to his birthplace, and all its influences and traditions from childhood to age, and he died in the house where he was born. But even Lowell had his intervals of Philadelphia and New York in the sturm und drang period of his antislavery apostolate; and before his death he was absent half a score of years, in Madrid and London, from the place which he passionately loved, and which he set above all others in civilization. Colonel Higginson, however, writes of all three as an Old Cambridge man, and unites them in the solidarity of his own town pride. He makes his reader observe, more than once, that a larger part of the literary renown which Boston enjoys really belongs to Old Cambridge; but he is never without a humorous sense of what the less privileged and less devoted reader may think, in spite of his veneration, and he permits him the relief of an occasional smile. No place could be so consummately literary as Old Cambridge without amusing the spectator; and I recall the awe with which Mr. Bret Harte, when he first visited Cambridge, heard through my tale of the authors in my own neighbourhood; and then the hardihood with which he attempted to carry it off by saying, "Why, a man couldn't fire a revolver from your front porch anywhere without bringing down a two-volumer." But no one has realized this attitude of the outsider with a keener zest than Old Cambridge men themselves, and Colonel Higginson is only the more finely representative of them in letting his sense of it appear.

His magnanimity frees him to the full recognition of their greatness, which was not conditioned by Old Cambridge, but was absolute in all three of the men he studies, and of world-wide effect in at least one. It is doubtful if any poet of the century was more universally known than Longfellow; Mr. Kipling has reached a larger number of Anglo-Saxon readers, perhaps, but our language was by no means the limit of Longfellow's renown. His name was a household word where his refined art was little felt; and the intimate psychological appeal which Holmes made to those struggling with fear of their doubts carried his literary charm with it to hearts eagerly recognizant wherever English was spoken. Lowell was less known, but not less prized. His influence was narrowed by the prejudice against the cause he espoused when he began to fight the anti-slavery battle; and by a curious irony of fate he came to stand in later years for something torystic to men who were fighting other anti-slavery battles, and who would have been glad to know that he was with them. His erudition, far greater than either Longfellow's or Holmes', could not always keep itself from overweighing his literature, and though this, when he was at his best, was always the direct expression of a singularly simple and companionable soul, he was not always at his best. Yet his future is safe, for it is his best, which will remain.

Of course, I have felt in reading Colonel Higginson's book that not the least of its virtues was its agreement with my own ideas and opinions of the three great authors he portrays. We have hardly any other test of a writer's excellence, and I am not going to pretend that I have judged his very pleasant study apart from my own preferences, or have valued it where it traversed them. It is by no means an exhaustive study; it takes the men on the plane of that general acceptance of them where it can easily make itself generally intelligible. It pretends to no discoveries or divinations concerning them, and it leaves the field so open for any further inquiry that no one need feel himself an intruder there. The service which it renders our literature is to reanimate for a younger generation that literary world of New England which summed up in itself the best of what we have been in literature. It is a contribution toward the renaissance which that graceful learning, that high feeling, that conscientious art must enjoy if our literary future is to be worthy of its past.

W. D. HOWELLS.

(Copyright, 1899, in the United States of America, by Harper and Brothers.)

FROM THE MAGAZINES.—I

In Cornhill Mr. Bret Harte writes of the rise of the short story in America. It grew up, he tells us, out of the American anecdote, and was at first regarded as inconsistent with the dignity of literature because it was racy of the soil; and in this connexion Mr. Bret Harte regales us with a bit of autobiography. He was editing the Overland Monthly, and was discouraged at finding a "notable lack of characteristic fiction" among the contributions submitted to him:—

In this perplexity he determined to attempt to make good the deficiency himself. He wrote "The Luck of Roaring Camp." However far short it fell of his ideal and his purpose, he conscientiously believed that he had painted much that "he saw, and part of which he was," that his subject and characters were distinctly Californian, as was equally his treatment of them. But an unexpected circumstance here intervened. The publication of the story was objected to by both printer and publisher, virtually for not being in the conventional line of subject, treatment, and morals. The introduction of the abandoned outcast mother of the foundling "Luck," and the language used by the characters, received a serious warning and protest. The writer was obliged to use his right as editor to save his unfortunate contribution from oblivion. When it appeared at last, he saw with consternation that the printer and publisher had really voiced the local opinion; that the Press of California was still strongly dominated by the old conservatism and conventionalism of the East, and that when "The Luck of Roaring Camp" was not denounced as "improper" and "corrupting" it was coldly received as being "singular" and "strange." A still more extraordinary instance of the "provincial note" was struck in the criticism of a religious paper that the story was strongly "unfavourable to immigration" and decidedly unprovocative of the "investment of foreign capital." However, its instantaneous and cordial acceptance as a new departure by the critics of the Eastern States and Europe, enabled the writer to follow it with other stories of a like character.

It is a curious example of the truth of the Scriptural saying about the prophet and the fountain of honour.

In Longman's Magazine, Mr. Frank Ritchie has an interesting article on "Music and Words," with which we deal in another column, under the heading of Notes. Among a variety of subjects which Mr. Andrew Lang touches upon under "The Sign of the Ship," he has something on the question, which we have recently discussed, as to multiple reviewing:—

I cannot approve of reviewing in the manner of Briareus (who wrote in a hundred papers, having a hand for each), but there are cases in which the space which the journal can give to one book does not contain all that the critic has to say. A dozen columns could not contain all you may desire to say about Messrs. Spencer and Gillen's "Natives of Central Australia." Why, then, if a journalist has the editorial permission, should he not bubble over into several papers, on a special subject in which there are not many specialists? Again, even a novel may seem to you so good that a single review will not exhaust your opinion of its excellence. But, surely, we ought to confine our blame to a single instance.

Mr. W. E. Henley begins his "Ex Libris" in the Pall Mall Magazine with an entertaining paper on the "Hundred Best Novels," and Mr. Burnand continues his Punch Notes, with many capital reproductions of sketches by Keene and Du Maurier.

To the American Critic Mr. Richard Whiteing contributes a short paper of autobiography, in which he explains that to live in the slums has been one of the unrealized ambitions of his life. He says:—

I meditated a scheme of going to live in the lowest quarter I could find, and saying nothing about it to anybody, but simply disappearing, and passing two or three years, or perhaps my whole life, among the natives, finding out what I could about them, and letting the world know anonymously from time to time. But this proved impracticable. London had caught me up in its own imperious way with a number of interests and claims I could not set aside. So all that was open to me was to see as much of its dumb millions as I could, and I stole away to them whenever the opportunity served, ever coming back at the appointed time to write my leaders in the newspaper office on the importunate and generally uninteresting topic of the day. Then there came a moment when I grew weary of the anonymity of this work and its want of prospect.

That was the moment at which Mr. Whiteing began to write "No. 5, John-street." He commenced it in 1893, put it by for two years, owing to the pressure of other work, resumed it in the autumn of 1895, and from that time never rested till it was in the publisher's hands. There could be no better proof that the hurry of journalism does not necessarily, as has so often been alleged, destroy the genius which consists of the capacity for taking pains.

FICTION.

The Greater Inclination. By Edith Wharton. 7½ x 5 in., 254 pp. London, 1899. Lane. 6/-

These stories are remarkable for many reasons, and among others because they show that between the European and American ideals there is no necessary conflict or incompatibility. Mrs. Wharton's stories are such as any girl may read, yet they concern themselves with problems far beyond the range of the girl—even of the American girl as M. Paul Bourget drew her in "L'Outre Mer." Mrs. Wharton respects proprieties, but deals as she sees fit with mere conventionalities, and her book is in that respect, or ought to be, an illumination to those American women to whom the rigid observance of trivial social rules is a law of social existence. It will be all the more illuminative because Mrs. Wharton is herself of the elect; one to whom every difficult door in New York and Newport is open. She knows, by experience, if anybody knows, the exact value of these conventionalities. Her stories are in no sense sermons; not one of them, happily, has an ethical object; they are all told for the sake of the story, or of the study of character. Yet we imagine few of her friends could read them without revising their present notions of what is essential and what is not essential to the social life which they regard as one chief end of the men and women who are privileged to share in it. Mrs. Wharton has been hitherto best known to the American public as the author of a book on "The Decoration of Houses," with Mr. Ogden Codman, jun., an architect, as collaborator in the technical parts—a book written with such skill and in such a style as are hardly to be expected, and very seldom to be found, in books concerning this subject. Besides this, Mrs. Wharton has written tales and verses in the magazines; and some of the tales now for the first time reappear in book form.

"The Greater Inclination" is not a title which explains itself. It is, in fact, a name for a collection of stories, each one of which has to do with a crisis, a turning point, the entering of a door, or the turning away from it. Some of them are rather studies than stories—"The Pelican," for instance; while some of them have not merely the element of interest which belongs to a novel, but are dramatic in their precision and rapidity of movement. In some of them the character, which is ever the primary purpose of the writer, evolves itself without much help from incident or adventure. In others it appears as the product of unexpected incidents. The man is revealed to himself and to us as something quite different from what he believed himself to be; it is an adventure, a meeting, the sudden occurrence of the unforeseen, a complete change in his environment, which discloses his true nature, and leads him to do a true and honourable act in place of the false or perfidious one which a moment before he had resolved on. Of this method, "A Cup of Cold Water" is the most brilliant example; a story which holds you from the beginning by its power of exciting interest and curiosity, and conducts you by a series of surprises to a catastrophe totally unlike what you foresaw. In degrees of merit these stories vary, as is inevitable. At least one of them, "A Journey," is a study in morbid anatomy, for the absence of which the book would have been none the worse. At times, as in the wonderfully clever "Twilight of the Gods," Mrs. Wharton puts a conundrum before the reader without doing all she might to help him to answer it, as if she were afraid of the superfluous and so omitted a little of what is needful. In "A Coward" the motive is too remote, and in "Souls Belated" it is not quite convincing. But the unity of intention and of intuition makes them a coherent whole.

The book abounds in meditation upon the problems of life; in humour; in dialogue which has the effect of spoken words; in knowledge both of the world and of books; in a knowledge of women which, from a woman, might be expected; and a knowledge of men to which a woman does not always attain. The men say and do the things which a man—the right kind of man—would say and do in the circumstances. As for books, Mrs. Wharton has obviously read much in many languages, yet imitates nobody, suggests nobody, and while free from any flavour of bookishness, yet, in her style, clearly owes much to others. But her debts are not to this or that writer, but to the great company of writers who have long been her intimate friends.

Mrs. Coulson Kernahan's new story is called THE HOUSE OF RIMMON (Ward, Lock, 3s. 6d.). Rimmon is not the god of Naaman's master, but the name of a Black Country family. Mr. Joshua Rimmon is a usurer, a domestic tyrant, and a hypocrite, and his son grows up to be quite as great a villain in other ways; but his younger brother and his daughter are redeeming features, and are much tried before their final triumph. The vicissitudes which the various members of this family and their friends and foes endure are so tremendous and so sudden that the book which records them may be classed, not unfairly, as "sensational"; but it is far better written than most. The plot is complex and of the blood-and-thunder sort; but Mrs. Kernahan drives her intrigues four-in-hand, so to speak, with perfect mastery; she is long without being tedious, and she has contrived several incidents that are both highly exciting in themselves and have all the appearance of being suggested by an intimate experience of South Staffordshire.

The influence of Mr. Anthony Hope is strong upon Mr. Marchmont. His new novel, A DASH FOR A THRONE (Hutchinson, 6s.), is one of those stirring romances of love and action in which the reader is hurried from page to page by an almost bewildering succession of exciting incidents. The story hinges, of course, upon the question of substituted identity. The hero and narrator of the story—a young naval officer—inaugurates his career by striking the German Emperor one evening on the Imperial yacht. As a result of his act Count Rudloff deems it expedient to die, and, reappearing as the Prince von Gramberg, forthwith plunges into a very vortex of political conspiracies in Bavaria. The story is well and vigorously told. Mr. Marchmont would, however, do well to avoid the practice of borrowing American verbs. "To enthuse," and "to motive" may be expressive, but they are not English.

In TRANSGRESSION (Pearson, 6s.) Mr. S. S. Thorburn has turned to good account his experience in the Bengal Civil Service. We are not greatly interested in his two women, the "saintly wife" and her cousin who does not altogether yield to the temptation to supplant her in her husband's affections. But the husband, Colonel Fitzhugh, who is in charge of a district on the North-West frontier of India, is a very different figure, firmly drawn from life, and, in spite of his failings, an admirable character. The author gives a faithful picture of the life of a British Resident in India. He is a determined foe to red-tape, and speaks with no uncertain voice of some of the methods of the Government. Here lies the chief interest of his book, especially for Anglo-Indians. It is well worth reading.

Mr. Bernard Capes, who follows the striking novel "The Adventures of the Comte de la Muetta," which we reviewed some time back, with a collection of stories called AT A WINTER'S FIRE (Pearson, 6s.), is undoubtedly an author to be reckoned with. His imagination is active and vivid, and his work reveals a determination to avoid the commonplace, which is sometimes arried to excess. These stories are, many of them, in the weird and ghostly vein; all have a strong and original central idea vividly realized. Read, for instance, "Jack and Jill," in which a young couple in the Alps fall together five hundred feet through the ice, an intensely realized incident which it is safe to suppose the author never experienced. Here is his account of their gradual stoppage:—

Suddenly, for the first time, pain made itself known; and immediately reason, plunging from above, overtook me, and I could think.

Then it was I became conscious that, instead of falling, we were rising, rising with immense swiftness, but at a pace that momentarily slackened—rising, slipping over ice and in contact with it.

The muscles of my arms, clasped still about Fidèle, involuntarily swelled to her. My God, there was a tiny answering pressure. I could have screamed with joy, but physical anguish overmastered me. My back seemed bursting into flame.

Mr. Capes' danger is a too great striving after originality—not in the plot of his stories but in his treatment of them. We pointed this out in reviewing the "Comte de la Muette," and the reader will be still more conscious of it here. In stories of this sensational kind simplicity and directness are essential to effect. In some of them, as in "An Eddy on the Floor," the story is overlaid with some twenty pages of introduction, much of which adds very little to the impression. The same thing is still more noticeable in the style. One wearies of a continued ingenuity of phrase and metaphor and longs for a lucid, simple easy narrative. Mr. Capes has quite enough fine similes at his command to let himself go freely and without effort—e.g., a waterfall which "shot out over the lip of the fall in a curve like a scimitar," or "the sliding sheet of water looked like a great strap of steel reeled ceaselessly off a whirling drum pivoted between the hills." He need not let metaphor run riot, and still less should he illustrate the greater and the nobler by means of the ignoble and the small. The grandeur of nature calls up culinary reminiscences, such as a glacier "yawns like sliced junket": its fissure stretches "obliquely like the mouth of a sole"; and the waves break upon the beach with the fizz of "bacon frying in the kitchens of the blest," while the exquisite beauty of twilight suggests this—"the day sucked inward to a point secret as a leech's mouth." This seems to us a misuse of originality, the more to be regretted in a writer of real imaginative power.

FRIVOLITIES, by Richard Marsh (James Bowden, 6s.), announces itself as being "specially addressed to those who are tired of being serious." It certainly will not leave them serious long. All the tales are bright and amusing, if slight, and though Mr. Marsh has shown in "The Beetle" that he is specially a master of the "creepy" style, he has an unflinching knack of pleasant writing. More ambitious work may be within his power for all we know. At present he is a very companionable trifler.

The Overseas Library began with sketches and proceeded to short stories. The third volume, IN GUIANA WILDS, by James Rodway (Unwin, 2s.), is a novel. It is about a young man who, being a clerk in a house of business at Demerara, married a negress and ran away from her. He joined some Indians and went to Roraima with them. When he got back he had found some buried treasures and acquired a second wife. A sequel is promised in which the author promises to tell us what happened when the first wife turned up again. The book, though not very exacting, conveys a good deal of curious and interesting information.

A COUNTY SCANDAL, by F. Emily Phillips (Macqueen, 6s.), has a pleasant little story to tell, in which the "scandal" is caused by the extreme innocence of the heroine, who ignores the compromising nature of her situation when she is left in sole charge of a young bachelor with a turn for philandering. The hero's character, all selfish good nature and vacillation, is well drawn. Jasper's theft, we incline to think, is treated too lightly.

Nobody who likes the man seems to take it as more than an almost justifiable peccadillo.

Most men carry their characters written on their faces, and some books reveal theirs unmistakably on their title-pages. When we meet with such a combination of title and author as THE VIBART AFFAIR, by George Manville Fenn (Pearson, 6s.), we know that the fare provided will include villainy, mystery, and murder, with a lovely heroine and a long-suffering hero; and we get, in truth, all these familiar ingredients in large quantities, yet of a quality very good of its kind. Mr. Fenn's many admirers will find amusement in the book.

FAITH: A STORY OF SAINT PORTH, by J. Henry Harris (Service and Paton, 3s. 6d.), is a quiet, homely story of a Wesleyan couple, whose only son, Benjamin, departs from the faith of his fathers. The "love-feasts" of the pious Cornish folk, their curious superstitions, many of them survivals of Paganism, are well and sympathetically described.

THE MORALS OF JOHN IRELAND (Burleigh, 1s. 6d.), by Rex O'Bill, has little claim to rank as a story. It is really an attack on American adventurers who come here in search of British capital; and the author lays about him too indiscriminately to produce much effect. According to him all Americans are tarred with the same brush. "Love him," he says, "with his commercial muzzle on; admire him for his rich humour, and his marvellous enterprise and ability; respect him if you can; but always handle him with gloves on, and keep your pocket-book out of his sight." This is a comprehensive indictment. But it is safer to libel a nation than an individual.

BEARERS OF THE BURDEN, by Major W. P. Drury (Lawrence and Bullen, 3s. 6d.), is a collection of short stories. The author's style is that of the man of action rather than the man of letters; one might almost say, indeed, that he has no style at all. His stories are stirring, however, and not unfrequently amusing, though there are reasons which have nothing to do with literature why it would have been better to leave some of them untold. "Terence of Trinity, War Correspondent," for example, is obviously drawn from O'Donovan of Merv—the references to Bokhara and to Hicks Pasha's expedition make the intention clear beyond the shadow of a doubt—and the story is not the sort of story that should have been told of a real man whose identity could so easily be fixed even by ill-informed readers.

It is a pity that with so much fresh and good material at hand, and with so considerable a gift for vivid description, Mrs. Ramsay has not been more successful with THE ROMANCE OF ELISÁVET (Hodder and Stoughton, 5s.). The scene of the romance is laid near Smyrna, where brigands congregate, and in the background of the story there is more than a suggestion of the warmth and colour of the East. But the characters are unworthy of their setting, and so trivial is Elisávet, so shadowy and uninteresting her lover, that even the final situation, striking as it might otherwise be, fails to stir an emotion either of pity or of horror.

THE SWORD OF ALLAH: A ROMANCE OF THE HAREM, by T. R. Threlfall (Ward, Lock, and Co., 3s. 6d.), introduces us to a Scottish soldier of fortune, in whose company we may pass, if we will, through a succession of thrilling experiences. The story opens in the year 1804, a period of which the author speaks somewhat curiously in his preface as "the beginning of the eighteenth century." Notwithstanding this and similar slips, Mr. Threlfall does not altogether fail in his treatment of a somewhat difficult subject, and many of his scenes are described with spirit. The book, in spite of its sub-title, is in every way suited to the shelf of a school library, and older readers with martial leanings will find in it something to interest them. The illustrations are good.

Slight in construction, but ingeniously devised, MR. PASSINGHAM, by Thomas Cobb (Lane, 3s. 6d.), runs on lines which many writers of modern comedy have made familiar. The author, as the title-page forewarns the reader, deals with a single episode, elaborating its several phases with considerable deftness. Mr. Passingham himself is a character of whose vitality there can be no doubt from the first page to the last; with the other men and women who move round him he is happily realized by the conversational method. It is true that the behaviour of Lady Dewhurst rests upon an absurdity, but such absurdities are common enough in real life. Whilst we are duly thankful for the skill which he exhibits as a miniaturist, we may reasonably expect that in due time success will be associated with Mr. Cobb's name in other and wider fields.

TOM-ALL-ALONE, by Amelia M. Barker (John Macqueen, 6s.), is a conventionally conceived but fairly well-written story of a little boy that "grewed." The hero, an inconvenient child of mysterious parents in high place, is introduced as a waif in the early chapters. With luck and perseverance he rapidly makes his way, and is a Kaffir millionaire before he is middle-aged. But good fortune deserts him in the marriage market, and domestic calamities impress upon him the misery of being born to isolation. The pictures of London slum life with which this novel opens are conscientious, but crude; and, on the whole, the book displays more appreciation of character than experience of life. But it certainly does not lack interest.

THE DIARY OF A CONDEMNED MAN, by Alfred Hermann Fried. Translated from the German by S. Van Straalen (Heinemann, 2s. 6d.). It is only from internal evidence that we conclude that this book is a work of fiction. Many readers will probably accept it as the real record of the real emotions of a real criminal whose name has been suppressed; but the elaborate psychology and the skilful graduation of the effects suggest the hand of an artist rather than of a murderer—though, of course, there are examples in the history of crime of the doubling of these parts. It is a gruesome book, not without a certain weird fascination, a long drawn agony in the vein of certain well-remembered pages towards the end of "Oliver Twist." We cannot recommend it to readers predisposed to hysteria or nightmare. A preface is contributed by Professor Ludwig Buchner, who argues that capital punishment is "a melancholy remnant of the barbarism of earlier ages," and "something totally unworthy of our modern social system, which is supposed to be founded on principles of morality." Perhaps Professor Buchner would have exhibited a more convincing impartiality if he had made it clear that the act of murder might, without impropriety, be denounced in precisely the same language.

Lovers of sensational fiction will find all they want in Mr. Headon Hill's new volume, THE QUEEN OF NIGHT (Ward, Lock, 2s.). The story is an exaggerated piece of invention, but it is skilfully worked out.

OUT FROM THE NIGHT, by Alice Maud Meadows (Ward, Lock, 3s. 6d.), is a tale of mystery and murder, and as the mystery is well preserved, and the murder is sufficiently gruesome, the story may be considered to have justified its existence.

The spring publishing season in Germany has brought forth a large number of new novels. Among the most notable are MENSCHENKINDER, by Lou Andreas-Salomé; MONTBLANC, by Rudolf Stratz; DER SÄNGER, by Adolf Wilbrandt, all from the firm of Cotta. PATER MATERNAS, by George Taylor (Dr. Adolf Hausrath) is an excellent historical novel, of which the scene is laid in Rome in the early years of the sixteenth century. DIE MACHT DER STUNDE, by Paul Heyse, and VOLLMONDZAUBER, by Ossip Schubin, are pleasing contributions to short-story literature. Translations of novels by Conan Doyle, Mrs. Humphry Ward, and Mrs. Clifford have also just appeared.

Correspondence.

"THE TWO PROTECTORS." TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—I have lately read your very fair review of my book, "The Two Protectors." You object to my remark that "Popery, under Laud, had a free hand." Perhaps it would have been better if I had said, "Popery, or its twin-sister." It is beyond contradiction that vast numbers of Englishmen of that day, including not a few members of the Church of England, fully believed that Laud was leading the nation back to Rome—indeed, this firm belief was one of the principal causes of the war.

You further object to my remarks about the "Romanizing clergy" of the present day; but when men like Cardinal Vaughan and the Roman Catholic Bishop of Liverpool distinctly state that the Ritualists were teaching Roman Catholic doctrines where the Roman Catholic priest could not go, and were leading the people back to Rome, it appears to me my remarks are fully justified.

With reference to my statement as to the action of the "sovereign people" in following the example set by the "sovereign individual" in cutting off crowned heads, you make the astonishing observation that none of these latter were "sovereigns." Was not Mary, Queen of Scots, an independent sovereign? It would surely be a mere subterfuge to argue that she was not a sovereign, because at the time of her execution she was a prisoner.

Perhaps it is too much for me to expect that you will publish this letter, but if you will do so, I shall esteem your courtesy.

I am, Sir, yours respectfully.

RICHARD TANGYE.

[It is, of course, open to Sir Richard Tangye to call the Anglicanism of Laud "the twin-sister of Popery." But the phrase represents a confusion of thought which exists to-day just as it did under Laud. If Sir Richard will read an article in the Nuova Antologia for June by Mr. Richard Bagot he will find that some Romanists regard the so-called "Romanizing clergy" as a great barrier against Rome.

With regard to Mary, Queen of Scots, we hope that Sir Richard will not consider it a subterfuge if we remind him that Mary Stuart abdicated in favour of her son on July 24th, 1567—more than twenty years before her execution.]

ENGLISH HEXAMETERS. TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—I do not feel quite sure whether Mr. Omond meant to ask a question or not in his reference to my letter, but I ought to have said that the "educated Greek" alluded to did read as prose, but with a certain rhythmical swing, those passages of Homer which he employed to illustrate his theory of the manner in which it should be read, in contradistinction to scansion—a distinction, he maintained, which should be made absolute. The grounds of the difference, as far as I am capable of judging, were that classic poetry was never meant to be read, but to be sung, and this was curiously illustrated to me by my subsequent experiences in Montenegro, where the chanting of the epics is strongly analogous to the manner of delivering the service in the Eastern Church, which, I suppose, is the nearest survival of the ancient music that we have. Is not, in fact, our scansion, severely considered, simply sing-song of metrical composition, which, strictly, ought to be musical and instrumentally accompanied? Nobody has written English verse more musically than Swinburne, I think, and I remember to have heard him read his own poetry, and he practically chanted it. It seems to me that our scansion is an utterly inadequate emulation of the ancient recitative, and that the attempt to adapt the system to English poetry, unless set to music, is out of the question, even in the "plastic work of a grand poet," supposed by Mr. Tarelli, and that a successful effort to make the accent coincide with the artificial scansion would be merely a literary curiosity. Set the verse to music, and ignore accent completely, and the problem is solved in what seems to me the only natural method of solving it.

Yours truly, W. J. STILLMAN.

Authors and Publishers.

The "boom" in the stories of the Rev. Charles M. Sheldon seems to have subsided as suddenly as it arose. A few months ago "In His Steps" and the others of the series were selling as fast as they could be printed. Now there is scarcely any demand for them. Those publishers who went into the "boom" late are sorry they did not leave the books alone.

Mr. Lane announces a new and cheap edition of "Essays on Subjects connected with The Reformation in England," by the late Dr. Samuel Roffey Maitland, who was librarian to Archbishop Howley, and keeper of the manuscripts at Lambeth. It will be edited, with an introduction, by the Rev. Arthur Wollaston Hutton.

A first instalment of "Unpublished Letters of George Borrow" (lately discovered in the crypt at the Bible House) appears in the Bible Society's Monthly Reporter for July.

Olive Schreiner is issuing, through Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton, in shilling booklet form, her views on the present crisis in South Africa.

"The Case for Protection" is the title of Mr. Ernest E. Williams' new work, which will be published by Mr. Grant Richards in September.

The book on Mr. Pinero which we announced a week or two back is being prepared by Mr. H. Hamilton Fyfe. It will form a volume of Messrs. Greening's "Writers of To-day" Series.

Professor Ahlwardt, of Greifswald, has been at work for some time past on a collection of "Old Arabian Poems" which will shortly be ready for the press.

"The Wisdom of Ben Sira," being parts of Ecclesiasticus from the Cairo Heb. MSS., edited by Dr. Taylor, of St. John's College, Cambridge, will be published very shortly.

"Forest Notes" is the title of a little collection of country poems by Mr. and Mrs. Eugene Lee-Hamilton which Mr. Grant Richards will publish on July 4th. Mrs. Lee-Hamilton is, perhaps, better known to readers by her maiden name of Miss Annie E. Holdsworth.

"Studies of the Portrait of Christ," by the well-known preacher and writer of Edinburgh, Dr. George Matheson, is a work that will appear in the autumn, published by Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton. It is an attempt to trace a development in Christ's work as delineated in the Gospel narrative.

Messrs. Methuen will very shortly publish in their series of Little Guides "Shakespeare's Country," by Professor B. C. A. Windle, F.R.S. It describes Stratford-on-Avon and its adjacent villages, and also Warwick, Leamington, Kenilworth, Coventry, and Edge Hill, and contains 14 illustrations and a map by Mr. E. H. New.

The late Mr. James Muir, of Glasgow, left a large quantity of material for a topographical history of the city. He had long made a special study of the subject, and intended to publish a volume, but was unable to carry out his project. Mr. Benjamin Taylor has undertaken the work of arranging and editing Mr. Muir's notes and memoranda, and these will form a book which is likely to be of considerable interest. It will be published this month under the title, "Glasgow Streets and Places."

A special number of the King's College Magazine contains an illustrated record of the "Tale of Troy," a play which, though it dates so far back as '83, is memorable for the artistic interest which it gained from the co-operation of the late Lord Leighton, Sir Edward Poynter, and the late Sir Charles Newton. The company also included many names of distinction, with which some interesting reminiscences are coupled by the writer of the articles, Prof. Warr. One which awakens regret is that of J. K. Stephen, of whom there is an excellent likeness in the character of Hector.

Mr. Alan Reid, F.E.I.S., has prepared a work on the poets of Fife and Kinross, similar to that which he published recently under the title of "The Bards of Angus and the Mearns." Fife has produced a great number of poets, and Kinross, although a very small county, is not without its bards. In dealing with one of these, Michael Bruce, the old controversy about the authorship of the "Ode to a Cuckoo" will doubtless be again revived. The book is to appear about the end of this year or the beginning of next.

Mr. Hodges is about to publish the remaining two volumes of Mr. Oswald Reichel's "Complete Manual of Canon Law," which will appear in monthly parts. Volume I. dealt with the Sacraments, and was issued in 1896. The following year came Volume II., dealing with Church Discipline. The subject of the two remaining books will be Church Government, Volume III. being devoted to Legislative and Administrative Government in general, and Volume IV. to that of the Diocese and the Parish. The whole subject will be treated not from the platform of ecclesiastical law—that is, law enforced by the State touching the Church—but from the platform of the canonist, who accepts only as the law of the Church law which comes to it by competent spiritual authority.

Among the new Italian books, ready or announced, we may mention "L'Incomprensibile" by Cordelia (Virginia Treves); "Il Fuoco" by Gabriele d'Annunzio; "Raggio di Dio" by Anton Giulio Barrili; "La Via di Damasco," by Daniela D'Artez; "Silvano" by Orazio Grandi; "Il Figurinajo" by Giuseppe Mantica, illustrated by Ettore Ximenes; and "Vita di Vittorio Emanuele II." by Giuseppe Massari.

The popular Art Monographs issued by Velhagen and Klasing are to be imitated in a series of Literary Monographs by a Vienna publishing house, under the editorship of Dr. Rudolph Lothar. The series aims at giving an Universal History of Literature in separate narratives. Arrangements are already made for several of the volumes, among others on Friedrich Hebbel and Guy de Maupassant.

Baron Gunzburg, the well-known St. Petersburg scholar and banker, has done a graceful act in promoting the publication of a series of essays in honour of the professorial jubilee of his learned compatriot, Dr. D. Chwolson. Professor Chwolson has made his mark both as a teacher and an author. His first important publication was a work in two volumes entitled "Die Ssabier und der Ssabismus" (St. Petersburg, 1856); but he will probably be best remembered by his treatises on Semitic inscriptions found in the Crimea and parts of Asia. He also translated several books of the Bible into Russian for the "British and Foreign Bible Society" (1875). His essay on the date of the Last Supper, which was published in 1892, excited some discussion in England. The French title of the book issued in his honour is "Recueil des travaux rédigés en mémoire du jubilé scientifique de M. Daniel Chwolson, Professeur émérité à l'Université de St. Petersburg, 1846-1896." It contains one essay in English (by Dr. C. D. Ginsburg), one in French (by Baron Gunzburg himself), two in Russian, and five in German, treating of Hebrew, Coptic, and Ethiopic. The publishers are S. Calvary & Co., Berlin.

"The Colossus" is the title which Mr. Morley Roberts has chosen for his new novel, suggested by the career and ambitions of Mr. Cecil Rhodes. It will be published in October by Mr. Edward Arnold.

Mrs. Hugh Fraser author of "A Diplomatist's Wife in Japan," has written another volume of tales of New Japan which Messrs. Hutchinson will publish shortly under the title of "The Custom of the Country."

Among the novels finished but held back for the autumn are included "Frauds and Holy Shifts," by Mr. Tom Gallon, and "The Yellow Man," by Mr. Carlton Dawe.

A sequel to Mr. R. Andover's book of humour "We Three and Troddles," now running in a popular London weekly under the title of "Troddles and Us—and Others," will be published in book form in the autumn.

Miss Evelyn Sharp's fairy-book for next Christmas will be called "The Other Side of the Moon." Mr. John Lane, who published that successful child's story "Wymys" for Miss Sharp, will also issue this.

The remarks of Mr. Daldy at the Publishers' Congress, which were briefly reported in our issue of June 17, referred not to a Canadian Copyright Bill, but to the Imperial Copyright Bill, which he anticipated would be passed next Session.

In a quotation which we made last week in our review of Mr. W. J. Stillman's book on Francesco Crispi, "the corruption of personal ambitions has eaten up the general ambition of its Government" should have read "the conflict of personal ambitions has eaten up the well-being of its Government." In the next sentence—"Crispi's dream was an idle one, and perhaps his greatest sorrow is to see its disillusion"—"his" should be substituted for "its."

The alliance which Harper and Brothers have formed with the S. S. McClure Company is not to result, so far as can be learnt, in the merging of either firm in the other. Each will go on as at present, but certain publishing enterprises will be carried on between them.

Mr. Douglas Sladen, who has severed his connexion with "Who's Who," is entering upon a new profession as a literary agent, in partnership with Mr. J. Eveleigh Nash.

LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

BIOGRAPHY.

Dictionary of National Biography. Vol. LIX. Wakeman-Watkins. Ed. by Sidney Lee. 9½ x 6½ in., 450 pp. London, 1899.

Claude Bernard. Masters of Medicine. By Michael Foster, M.A., M.D., &c. 7½ x 5½ in., 245 pp. London, 1899. Unwin. 3s. 6d.

Blamarek. Some Secret Pages of His History. (Condensed Ed.) By Dr. M. Busch. 8½ x 5½ in., 576 pp. London, 1899. Macmillan. 10s. n.

CLASSICAL.
Sextus Empiricus and Greek Scepticism. By Mary M. Patrick. 7½ x 5 in., 163 pp. Cambridge, 1899. Bell. 5s. n.

DRAMA.
Sir Paul Pindar, and other Plays. By Harry N. Maugham. 10 x 6½ in., 300 pp. London, 1899. Grant Richards. 6s. n.

FICTION.
The Market Place. By Harold Frederic. 7½ x 5½ in., 360 pp. London, 1899. Heinemann. 6s.

In Kings' Houses. By Julia C. R. Dorr. 8 x 5½ in., 372 pp. London, 1899. Duckworth. 6s.

Slaves of Chance. By Ferrier Langworthy. 8 x 5½ in., 287 pp. London, 1899. Smithers. 4s. 6d. n.

Gwyr y Dolau; neu Ffordd y Troseddwr. Gan W. Llewellyn Williams. 7½ x 5 in., 128 pp. Caernarfon, 1899.

The Untold Half. By "Alien." 7½ x 5 in., 406 pp. London, 1899. Hutchinson. 6s.

Taurus; or, Written in the Book of Fate. By Emily S. Lord. 8 x 5½ in., 386 pp. London, 1899. Sampson Low. 6s.

Hooligan Nights. Ed. by Clarence Rook. 7½ x 5 in., 289 pp. London, 1899. Grant Richards. 6s.

From the Broad Acres. By J. S. Fletcher. 6½ x 4½ in., 280 pp. London, 1899. Grant Richards. 2s.

Mona. By Alice A. Clowes. 7½ x 5 in., 261 pp. London, 1899. Sonnenschein. 3s. 6d.

Vassar Studies. By Julia A. Schwartz. 7 x 5 in., 280 pp. London, 1899. Putnam. 5s.

Chronicles of Teddy's Village. By Mrs. Murray Hickson. 7½ x 5½ in., 319 pp. London, 1899. Ward, Lock. 3s. 6d.

Thady Halloran of the Irish Brigade. By J. W. Breslin. 7½ x 5½ in., 252 pp. London, 1899. Unwin. 6s.

A Romance of Ceylon. By E. O. Walker, C.I.E. 7½ x 5½ in., 252 pp. London, 1899. Unwin. 6s.

GEOGRAPHY.
Russia on the Pacific and the Siberian Railway. By Vladimir. 9 x 5½ in., 373 pp. London, 1899. Sampson Low. 1s.

Industrial Cuba. Being a Study of the Present Commercial and Industrial Conditions, &c. By Robert P. Porter. 9 x 6 in., 428 pp. London, 1899. Putnam. 15s.

HISTORY.
State Trials. Political and Social. Selected and Ed. by H. L. Stephen. 2 vols. 7 x 4½ in., 257 + 319 pp. London, 1899. Duckworth. 5s. n.

LITERARY.
Fable and Song in Italy. By E. M. Clarke. 8½ x 5½ in., 260 pp. London, 1899. Grant Richards. 5s.

Præterita. Vol. II. By John Ruskin, LL.D., D.C.L. 7½ x 5 in., 362 pp. London, 1899. G. Allen. 5s. n.

Studies in Religion from Shakespeare. By A. N. Blatchford. 7½ x 5 in., 83 pp. London, 1899. Stock. 1s.

Flaubert. By Emile Faquet. (Les Grands Ecrivains Français.) 7½ x 5 in., 192 pp. Paris, 1899. Hachette. Fr. 2.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Appreciations and Addresses delivered by Lord Rosebery. Ed. by Charles Geake. 7½ x 5½ in., 344 pp. London, 1899. Lane. 5s. n.

A New English Dictionary. A-Adrius. Vol. I., No. 1. Reissued in Monthly Parts. Ed. by Dr. J. A. H. Murray. 14 x 11 in., 88 pp. Oxford, 1899.

Book of Games and Amusements. (Penny Handbooks.) 7 x 5 in., 94 pp. London, 1899. Ward, Lock.

PHILOSOPHY.
Realism: A Paradox. By David M. Haylings. 7 x 4½ in., 114 pp. London, 1899. Unwin. 2s. 6d.

POETRY.
Flowers of the Wind. By Charlotte Mansfield. 7 x 4½ in., 53 pp. London, 1899. Elkin Mathews. 2s. 6d. n.

The Hymn of Bardaisan. Rendered into English by F. Crawford Burkitt. 6 x 4½ in., 30 pp. London, 1899. Arnold. 7s. 6d. n.

In Ashover Valley. A Volume of Verse. By J. Fernie. 7 x 5½ in., 96 pp. Derby, 1899. Murray. 2s. 6d. n.

REPRINTS.
As You Like It. (The Chiswick Shakespeare.) Ed. by J. Dennis. 6 x 4 in., 119 pp. London, 1899. Bell. 1s. 6d. n.

The Old Curiosity Shop. By Charles Dickens. (Temple Ed.) 2 vols. 6 x 4 in., xiii + 382 + 397 pp. London, 1899. Dent. 3s. n.

SCIENCE.
A Text-Book of Plant Diseases. By George Massee, F.L.S. 7½ x 5 in., xii + 458 pp. London, 1899. Duckworth. 5s. n.

Curiosities of Light and Sight. By S. Bidwell, LL.B., F.R.S. 7½ x 5 in., xii + 226 pp. London, 1899. Sonnenschein. 2s. 6d.

SPORT.

Wild Life in Hampshire Highlands. (The Haddon Hall Library.) By G. A. B. Devar. 8½ x 5½ in., 304 pp. London, 1899. Dent. 7s. 6d. n.

THEOLOGY.

The Bible for Home Reading. 2nd Part. By C. G. Montefiore. 8 x 5½ in., xxvii + 799 pp. London, 1899. Macmillan. 5s. 6d. n.

Texts and Studies. Vol. V., No. 5. Clement of Alexandria's Biblical Text. By P. M. Barnard, M.A. 9 x 5½ in., 64 pp. Cambridge, 1899. University Press. 4s. n.

Present Day Papers on Romanism. The Supper of the Lord. By H. C. G. Moule, D.D. 7½ x 4½ in., 55 pp. London, 1899. R.T.S. 3d.

TOPOGRAPHY.

A Picturesque History of Yorkshire. Part IV. By J. S. Fletcher. 9½ x 7 in., London, 1899. Dent. 1s. n.

Guide to Jersey, Guernsey, Herm, &c. By C. B. Black. 6½ x 4½ in., 138 pp. London, 1899. Black. 1s.

A Handbook for Travellers in Somerset. 5th Ed. 6½ x 4½ in., xxxv + 536 pp. London, 1899. Murray. 6s.

TRAVEL.

Australian Sketches. Made on Tour. By Harry Furness. 9½ x 7½ in., 75 pp. London, 1899. Ward, Lock. 2s. 6d.

Twelve Months in Klondyke. By Robert C. Kirk. 7½ x 5½ in., 273 pp. London, 1899. Heinemann. 6s. n.

Impressions of America. By T. C. Porter. Illustrated. 9 x 6 in., xxiv + 241 pp. London, 1899. Pearson. 10s. 6d.

Sketches and Studies in South Africa. By W. J. Knox Little, M.A. 9½ x 6½ in., 328 pp. London, 1899. Isbister. 10s. 6d.

END OF VOL. IV.

INDEX TO VOL. IV.

AMERICAN LETTERS—		AUSTRALIAN LETTERS—		AUTHORS OF BOOKS REVIEWED—		AUTHORS OF BOOKS REVIEWED—
				(continued)		(continued)
American Literature in Exile ..	313	Australian Volksliede, The ..	343	Baedeker, Karl ..	175, 573	Bickerdye, John ..	558
American Prose ..	98	Concerning the Parochial Spirit of Colonial Literature ..	449	bahr, Herman ..	684	Bidder, George ..	465
Arms and the Men ..	578	Poor Man's Library in Australia, A ..	450	Bailey, J. C. ..	382	Bidez, J. ..	544
Canadian Habitant in Recent Fiction, The ..	473	AUTHORS OF BOOKS REVIEWED—		Bain, Robert ..	464	Bie, Oscar ..	573
Case in Point, A ..	370	Abbott, Evelyn ..	646	Baker, James ..	121	Bierstadt, Oscar A. ..	306
Concerning a Counsel of Imperfection ..	426	Abbott, Lyman ..	547	Baker, Sir Sherston ..	599	Bigg, Charles ..	520
Destiny of the Letter B in America ..	46	A'Beckett, Arthur W. ..	573	Baldock, Col. T. S. ..	568	Bindosa, Harold ..	107
Garland's Grant ..	151	Ackworth, John ..	122	Baldwin, James Mark ..	336	Binet, Alfred ..	583
Mr. Remington's Wild Men ..	208	Adam Paul ..	96, 289	Balfour, Graham ..	86	Binyon, Laurence ..	39, 227
New Kind of Play, A ..	472	Adams, Francis ..	436	Ball, John ..	573	Birchough, Mabel C. ..	239
New Sort of Stories, The ..	691	Adams, Geo. Burton ..	391	Ballingier, John ..	87	Birkbeck, W. J. ..	667
Old Cambridge ..	691	Adams, W. Marshall ..	416	Balme, E. ..	479	Birrell, Augustine ..	142
Opportunity for American Fiction, An ..	525, 579	Addy, Sidney Oldall ..	307	Bannerman, Frances ..	543	Birt, Archibald ..	666
Problems of Existence in Fiction ..	637	Adeney, Walter F. ..	465	Barclay, Isabella ..	87	Blakiston ..	89
Rosenfeld's Songs from the Ghetto ..	525	Adino, P. G. ..	360	Barclay, Thomas ..	545	Blass, Professor ..	628
Subscription Theatre, A ..	425	Aide, Hamilton ..	479	Bardoux, M. ..	198	Blatchford, Ambrose N. ..	441
Suggestions of a Patriotic Play ..	264	Aitken, George A. ..	277	Barker, Amelia M. ..	685	Bloch, Johann v. ..	541
Vengeance of the Female ..	637	Alexander, Mrs. ..	316	Barnett, Edith A. ..	502	Blok, Petrus Johannes ..	306
AMONG MY BOOKS—		Alexander, Rupert ..	528	Barr, Robert ..	375	Blount, Godfrey ..	515
After Reading Thackeray ..	91	Alge, S. ..	282	Barracand, Leon ..	667	Bodington, Canon ..	657
"Among my Books" ..	685	Ali, Syed Ameer ..	541	Barraud, Father ..	86	Bodkin, McDonnell ..	527
An Emperor's Memoirs ..	632	Allen, Alexander V. G. ..	303	Barrett, Wilson ..	282	Boevey, Crawley ..	557
At Ely Minister ..	574	Allen, Grant ..	227, 527	Barrie, J. M. ..	65	Bossier, Gaston ..	656
British Merlin, The ..	115	Anderson, William G. ..	172	Barry, John Arthur ..	583	Boland, Mary A. ..	40
Charles James Fox as a Reading Man ..	201	Anderson, Isabella M. ..	253	Bates, William ..	183	Boldredwood, Rolf ..	21, 442
Classic of Forestry, The ..	146	Andrews, Samuel J. ..	465	Batson, Mary ..	519	Bond, Francis ..	280
Fixed Idea, The ..	231	Ansoerg, W. J. ..	358	Bazin, René ..	345	Bonney, T. G. ..	566
In a Don's Library ..	602	Antommarchi ..	289	Beaman, A. H. ..	683	Boscawen, St. Chad ..	114
James Howell ..	443	Appieton, G. W. ..	429	Beames, Capt. D. ..	526	Bottomley, Gordon ..	543
Literæ Humaniores ..	668	Arber, Professor ..	594	Beavan, Arthur H. ..	327	Bovet, Marie Anne de ..	96
Mood and the Book, The ..	466	Arbutnot, Sir Alex. John ..	173	Becke, Louis ..	571, 583	Bower, Capt. H. M. ..	571
My Books ..	337	Archer, W. ..	230	Beeching, H. C. ..	64	Bowden, Henry Sebastian ..	652
Notes on Sir Geo. Trevelyan's "American Revolution" ..	521	Archer-Hind, R. D. ..	513	Beerbohm, Max ..	436	Bowles, Fred. G. ..	464
Phonetics and Prosody ..	176	Armstrong ..	112	Begbie, Harold ..	655	Bowler, M. ..	479
Pilgrim Scholars ..	308	Arnold-Foster, H. O. ..	667	Bell, Mrs. Arthur ..	442, 599	Boyd, Alec. J. ..	346
Poëde de Mr. George Meredith, La ..	283	Arthur, William ..	363	Belloe, Hilare ..	325	Bradley, A. G. ..	113
Poetry ..	269	Ascher, Isidore G. ..	21	Belloe-Lowndes, Mrs. ..	527	Braine, Sheila ..	121
Short Treatise on Hunting, A ..	364	Assisi, Brother Leo of ..	252	Benn, A. W. ..	13	Brandes, George ..	648
Swiss Scholars in the Alps ..	393	Aston, W. G. ..	193	Bennett, Lucy A. ..	543	Brereton, Austin ..	520
Thomas Browne on France ..	548	Atterton, Gertrude ..	374	Benson, E. F. ..	291	Bretton, Frederick ..	584
"Unhappy Welsted" ..	418	Atkins, J. B. ..	221	Beresford, Lord Charles ..	535	Bridges, John A. ..	86
Well of Pure English, The ..	15	Atkinson, C. O. ..	189	Bernard, G. H. ..	465	Bridgett, T. E. ..	86
What Tom Brown Reads ..	496	Attwell, Henry ..	363	Berry, A. ..	146	Bright, Charles ..	14
Women as Historians ..	41, 67	Author of "L'Atelier du Lys" ..	121	Bersly, A. A. ..	325	Bright, Edward Brailsford ..	14
		Author of "L'Atelier du Lys" ..	121	Berthouy, Jean ..	159	Bright, Florence ..	183
		Bacon, Leonard Woolley ..	581	Bertrand, Louis ..	687	Brightman, Rev. F. E. ..	442
				Berant, Sir Walter ..	197	Brightwen, Mrs. ..	516

AUTHORS OF BOOKS REVIEWED— (continued)	PAGE	AUTHORS OF BOOKS REVIEWED— (continued)	PAGE	AUTHORS OF BOOKS REVIEWED— (continued)	PAGE	AUTHORS OF BOOKS REVIEWED— (continued)	PAGE
Brinton, Selwyn	490	De Maupassant, Guy	600	Geffroy, Aug.	442	Isley, Marshall	86
Briscoe, J. Potter	64	D'Ovidio, Prof.	228	Gell, Mrs. Lyttelton	114	Image, Selwyn	39
Brisson, Adolphe	519	De Tablay, Lord	592	George, Herford B.	677	Inman, Col. Henry	440
Britten, F. J.	516	Dean, Mrs. Andrew	428	Gerard, Dorothea	375	"Iota"	527
Brooke, L. K.	573	Deamer, Percy	388	Gerrard, Wirt	239	Israel	442
Brooke, Stoford	63, 165	Debrett	200	Gibbs, J. Arthur	113	J. A.	86
Broughton, Rhoda	556	Delaire, Jean	567	Gibson, Edgar C. S.	389	J. B.	620
Brown, Hume	356	Deland, Margaret	120	Giles, Herbert A.	87	Jacks, William	517
Brown, Vincent	249	Dennan, Burford	558	Gillespie, A. Lockhart	66	Jackson, A. V. Williams	586
Browne, Phyllis	40	Denny, John	517	Gladdeu, Washington	304	Jackson, Blomfield	230
Browlie, Rev. John	520	Depardieu, Félix	667	Godfrey, Elizabeth	346, 558	Jackson, Frederick G.	533
Bruce, A. B.	390	Des Ferrières, J.	667	Goldsmith, O.	332	Jackson, G. Hunt	543
Bruncetiere, M.	305	Des Ombiaux, Maurice	667	Goltz, Gen. v. der	362	Jackson, Holbrook	306
Bryce, Rt. Hon. James	591	Deverell, F. H.	391	Gomme, Laurence	210, 391	Jacobs, Joseph	200, 317
Buchan, John	88, 527	Devine, Dr.	491	Gordon, John	199	James, Henry	170, 475
Budge, E. A. Wallis	625	Dew-Smith, Mrs.	557	Gordon, Samuel	640	Jane, Mr.	492
Bullen, John	415	Dewar, A. R.	22	Gordon-Alexander, Lt.-Col. W.	640	Janes, Emily	200
Bullen, Frank T.	175, 457	Dewar, G. A. B.	441, 682	Gore, Canon	388	Jeffery, Walter	570
Bulgakoff, Professor	657	Dickens, Mary Angela	479	Gore-Booth, Eva	86	Jell, Canon	304
Burchell, S. H.	345	Dickson, John	545	Goulburn, Deau	64	Jenson, Wilhelm	240
Burgin, G. E.	98, 376	Dike, Sir Charles	114	Gould, F. C.	655	Jepson, Edgar	526
Burleigh, Bennet	248	Dill, Samuel	3	Gould, Nat	478, 479	Johansen, Lieut.	174
Burrard, W. Dutton	479	Diosy, Arthur	196	Gowing, Mrs. Aylmer	317	Johnson, K. Brimley	278
Burrows, Guy	223	Dobson, Austin	487	Graeme, Alastor	584	Johnson, Rev. J. B.	63
Burton, Bloundelle	555	Dodge, W. D.	546	Graham, James M.	317	Johnston, James	361
Butler, Dr.	63, 87	Dodgson, Campbell	224	Graham, K. R. Cunningham	57, 441	Johnston, J. O.	200
Butler, Samuel	36	Dole, Nathan Haskell	61, 477	Graham, William	34	Johnston, Sir Harry H.	191
Butler, Sir W. F.	255	Domville, Lady Margaret	682	Grant-Luff, Sir M. E.	250, 592	Johnston, William A.	373
Bygate, J. E.	520	Dougall, Lily	375	Gray, J. H.	679	Johnstone, David Lawson	154
Cable, George W.	686	Douglas, Prof.	479	Gray, John	493	Jones, Adnah D.	629
Caffyn, Mrs. Mannington	527	Douglas, Theo.	479	Gray, Maxwell	464	Jones, Henry Arthur	109
Caird, Dr.	62	Doyle, A. Conan	345	Green, Elia Goodwin	84	Jones, James Ifano	87
Caird, John	307	Doyle, John A.	56	Gregorovius, Ferdinand	334	Jones, Mrs. Herbert	392
Caird, L. H.	528	Du Bois, Count Albert	624	Grey, Sir Edward	514	Jones, W. Braunston	240
Cameron, Mrs. Lovett	346	Dudney, Mrs. H. E.	477	Gribble, Francis	678	Jones, William	518
Campbell, Archie	38, 646	Duff, C. Mabel	493	Griffiths, George	347	Jowett, Benjamin	387
Campbell, Prof. Lewis	693	Dufour, Albert	289	Griffiths, Major Arthur	37	Karageorgievitch, Prince Bojdar	682
Capes, Bernard	239	Dunbar, Paul Laurence	527	Guiney, Louise Imogen	85	Kaye, Ed.	640
Carey, Rosa Nouchette	209	Dumas, F.	258, 572	Gulland, W. G.	640	Keene, Charles Haines	36
Carleton, William	225	Dupré, Edouard	667	Guthrie Ramsay	121, 354, 488	Kelley, F. E.	573
Carnegie, David W.	630	Durkheim	600	Gwynn, Stephen	281	Kelly, Bernard W.	391
Carnie, T. West	392	Dutt, Jogesh Chunder	597	Haeckel, Prof.	282	Kendall, May	21
Carpenter, Edward	281	Dutt, Romesh	64, 597	Halcombe, P. D.	282	Kennedy, Arabella	477
Carter, G.	363	Dutton, Annie Victoria	21	Haldane, E. S.	621	Kennard, Mrs. Edward	479
Cartwright, F. L.	171	Dyer, Thielton	173	Hale, Edward Everett	620	Kennedy, J.	465
Cesarewicz, Evelyn Martinego	572	Dyke, Wilmot, Capt. S.	8	Hall, A.	653	Kenyon, F. G.	185
Chadwick, H. M.	171	Eastlake, Charles L.	279	Hall, Stanley	385	Keppel, Sir Henry	256
Chambers, R. W.	317	Eden, Charles	210	Hall, W. H.	17	Kernahan, Mrs. Coulson	346, 683
Chamisso, Adelbert	114	Edwards, G. M.	282, 679	Halsham, John	19	Knapp, Georges	426, 598
Champrays, Basil	464	Ellis, E.	143	Hambler, Herbert Elliot	347	King, L. W.	40
Chapman, E. J.	184	Ellis, T. Mullett	678	Hamilton, Cosmo	318, 583	King, Miss Grace	107
Charles, Joseph F.	601	Ellis, William Ashton	622	Hamilton, Grammont	316	Kingsley, Mary H.	650
Cheetham, Archdeacon	347	Elmie, George R.	570	Hamilton, Sir Richard Vesey	9	Kingsley, Rose G.	66
Chetwynd, Hon. Mrs. Henry	289	Elton, Mrs. L. M.	558	Hammond, Canon	64	Kinross, Samuel	556
Chuquet, Arthur	657	Ely, Dean of	305, 465	Hanna, Col. H. B.	571	Kirby, F. Vaughan	573
Church, Dean	492	Enfield, Mary	520	Harland, Mrs.	306	Klaczko, Julian	442
Clarke, Allen	64	Engelhardt, P.	656	Harnack, Prof.	520, 601	Knapp, Wm. I.	224
Clifford, Dr.	442	Enoch, Frederick	527	Harper, Wilson	598, 699	Knapp, Wm. I.	273
Clifton, Prof.	694	Escott, T. H. S.	227	Harrison, Henry	39	Krebbel, H. E.	279
Cobb, Thomas	429	Estela, Fray Diego de	274	Harrison, Wilmot	209	Kürschner, Joseph	572
Cobban, Maclaren	440	Evans, A. H.	306	Hartley, Mary	478	Kurtz, Prof.	230
Cody, Col. Wm. F.	486	Evans, E. P.	13	Hartley, O. C.	493	Lacroix, Désiré	289
Coghlin, Mrs. Harry	441	Evans, George Essex	168, 252	Hausemann, W. A.	442	La Jeunesse, Ernest	667
Colby, Prof.	382	Everett-Green, Evelyn	317	Haweis, Mrs.	10	Lambert, George	563
Coleridge, Ernest Hartley	594	Faguet, Emile	141	Haweis, Rev. H. R.	86	Lane-Poole, Stanley	65, 253, 572
Coll, Bennett	558	Fairbairn, A. M.	137	Hay, Helen	441	Lang, Andrew	11
Collins, Professor W. E.	90	Fairfield, Charles	429	Hayward, Abraham	623, 666	Lang, Mrs. Andrew	654
Colman, C. S.	9	Farjeon, B. L.	71	Headlam, Cecil	539	Lawthorpe, Professor	30
Colomb, Admiral P. H.	253	Farningham, Marianne	593	Hearne, Lafadio	442	Larmine, William	600
Compagetti, Domenico	144	Farrar, Deau	307	Héau, Maurice	363	Larroum-t. Gustave	13
Compton, Berdmore	547	Farrar, A.	171	Henderson, Bernard W.	33	Latta, Robert	566
Cone, Orello	628	Fenn, George Manville	490	Henderson, T. N.	113	Laughton, John Knox	489, 573
Conytable, H. S.	654	Field, Mrs.	655	Henson, Rev. H. Hensley	569	Law, Ernest	229
Conway, R. S.	35	Filding	20	Herford, Dr.	62, 305	Lawler, John	36
Conylure	361	Fittne	476	Heron, E. and W.	292	Lawton, W. C.	651
Cook, Edward T.	573	Findlater, Jane F.	210	Heron-Allen, Edward	513	Leach, A. F.	316
Cooke, Henry	656	Findlater, Mary	210	Hicks, R. D.	600	Le Gallienne, Richard	65
Coolidge, W. A. B.	657	Finnemore, Emily Pearson	128, 40	Higginson, T. W.	387	Lee, Dr. F. G.	32, 381
Cooper, William John	516	Fischer, Th. A.	652	Hill, Constance	222	Lee, Sydney	223
Cope, E. M.	485	Fisher, G. W.	139	Hill, George Birkbeck	557, 695	Leibniz	13
Copeman, S. Monckton	442	Fisher, Herbert	546	Hill, Hendon	626	Leigh, Austen	679
Copland, Charles Townsend	145	Fisher, Lala	626	Hirst, T. Crowther	226	Leigh, John Garrett	558
Corbett, Mrs. Geo.	584	Fiske, John	145	Hodder, Edwin	304	Leland, C. C.	516
Cornwall-Jones	442	Fison, A. H.	66	Hodgson, James	571	Leonard, H. G.	657
Cottin, Paul	684	Fitzgerald, Rev. W. H.	62	Hoenig	240	Lesauur, Daniel	666
Courtot, Baroness Coele de	556	Fitzgerald, Lord Edmond	492	Hoe, Mrs. Cahel	547	Lewy, Charles	666
Craddock, Charles Egbert	239	Flaisher, J. H.	282	Hoff, J. H. Varr	385	Levy-Veats, S.	437
Craig, J. Ducau	543	Fletcher, Henry	341	Hogarth, Louise E.	619	Lewine, J.	489
Craig, R. S.	640	Fletcher, J. H.	390, 558	Hogarth, David G.	598	Lewis, Agnes Smith	175
Crawford, Maude	230	Ford, George	656	Hole, Dean	627	Lewis, H. H.	14
Crawford, V. M.	14	Ford, John D.	227	Holland, Maud	137, 336	Lewis, Mrs. C. L.	597
Creighton, Prof. J. E.	258	Ford, Henry Jones	301	Holland, Philemon	673	Lidzbarski, Mark	20
Cresswell, Boatrix F.	465	Ford, Paul Leicester	666	Holmes, Edmund	649	Lighthall, W. D.	640
Cripps, W. J.	476	Förle, Gertrude	502	Holmes, F. M.	114	Lindsay, Harry	601
Crockett, R. R.	453	Foullée, M.	199	Home, Hon. James A.	582	Littles, A. E.	304
Croker, B. M.	316	Fowke, Frank Rede	172	Hood, Conrad	65	Loane, G. G.	282
Cross, Margaret B.	239	Fowler, Ellen Thorneycroft	373	Hopwood, H. V.	429, 567	Lock, Dr.	316
Cross, Victoria	598	Fraser, Campbell	12	Horner, E. W.	282	Locke, William J.	31
Crossley, Sydney	64	Fraser, Mrs. Hugh	357	Hort, A. F.	389	Lodge, Henry Cabot	520
Crow, Martha Foote	484	Frer, Walter Howard	544	Hort, Prof.	63	Longhead, Flora Haines	240
Crowley, Aleister	547	Fried, A. H.	695	Horton, Dr.	98, 227, 536	Longfellow, William P. P.	491
Crozier, John Beattie	414, 581	Fuller-Maitland, Ella	400	Housman, Laurence	289	Loria, Achille	170, 519
Curtin, Jeremiah	273	Fuller-Maitland, J. A.	386	Housaye, Henry	582	Lotti, Pierre	416
Dale, Neilie	573	G. G.	11	Howard, Conrad	582	Lovett, Richard	520
Dames, E. Longworth	258	Gachot, Edouard	283	Howell, W. D.	582	Lowie, Cecil	374
Dändliker, Karl	657	Gaidner, James	584	Hubbard, Elbert	478	Loyd, Lady Mary	681
Danks, Archdeacon	40	Gallenga	240	Hudson, Henry	411	Lubbock, Alfred	439
Darby, Dean	519	Gallon, Tom	479	Hull, Eleanor	503	Lubbock, Sir John	655
Daudet, Ernest	667	Galloway, Robert L.	362	Hulme-Beaman, Emerie	184	Lucas, E. V.	570
Davenport, Philip	502	Gamlin, Mrs. Hilda	510	Hume, Fergus	112	Lumden, Sir Peter	564
David, Mrs. Edgeworth	392	Gardiner, Samuel Rawson	492, 675	Hunter, Sir Wm. Wilson	64	Lytow, Francis, Count	281
Davidson, Morrison	547	Gardner, Starkie	61	Hunter, Sir Wm. Wilson	247	Lyde, L. W.	682
Davis, Col. Newham	598	Garnett, Dr.	39	Hutchinson	543	Lynch, Hannah	142
Davis, Frederick	221	Gardner, Russell M.	390	Hutton, Richard Holt	275	Lyons, Henri	373
Davis, Richard Harding	558	Gautier, Judith	96	Hutton, W. H.	657	Lytelton, Katharine	84
Davis, Sir John	555	Gay, Madame Sophie	20	Hyde, Douglas	410	MacCabe, Joseph	174
Dawe, Carlton	209	Geatry, Caroline	90	Hynam, F. Ethel	211

AUTHORS OF BOOKS REVIEWED— (continued)	PAGE	AUTHORS OF BOOKS REVIEWED— (continued)	PAGE	AUTHORS OF BOOKS REVIEWED— (continued)	PAGE	AUTHORS OF BOOKS REVIEWED— (continued)	PAGE
McCarthy, Justin	37, 301, 509	Ottley, R. L.	519	Schofield, Dr.	13	Verestchagin, Vassili	174
McClintock, Sir F. L.	593	Ottwell, John	543	Schuckburgh, E. S.	282	Verity, A. W.	282
MacColl, Malcolm	512	"Ouida"	583	Schur, Ed.	667	Verne, Jules	240
MacDonagh, Michael	5	Outram, Leonard	210	Scott, Clement	184	Vernoy, Margaret M.	81
Macdougall, W. B.	183	Overton, Canon	114	Scott, Leader	585	Vibert, Col. Edward	585
MacInnes, Robert	162	Page, T. E.	282	Scott, Temple	555	Vickers, Mrs. Eleanor Grant	653
MacIlroy, Archibald	240	Page, Thomas Nelson	154	Scott, William	228	Vignole, C. J.	517
Mackail, J. W.	451	Palgrave, Gwenllian F.	259	Sedgfield, Walter John	329	Vincent, Arthur	361
Mackenzie, Alexander	5/2	Palmer, Arthur	144	Sedgwick, Anne D.	428	Vintras, Louis	184
Mackie, Gascoigne	86	Palmer, E. Reeves	304	Selby, Thos. G.	417	Vogelsang, Karl	416
Mackintosh, Robert	626	Paravicini, Frances de	86	Selden, Camille	333	Voigt, J. C.	540
Macklaren, Ian	21, 22, 65	Parker, Charles Stuart	135	Sell, Edward	597	Volkmann, Ludwig	462
MacLean, Alison	317	Parker, Joseph	122	Semon	226	Waddell, L. A.	170
MacLean, Norman	597	Parker, Mrs.	542	Shadwell, Arthur	253	Waite, Arthur Edward	624
MacLeod, Fiona	612	Parker, Nellie	502	Shadwell, Charles Lancelot	329	Walford, L. B.	153
M'Manus, L.	667	Parkman, Francis	273, 518, 630	Shakespeare, O.	316	Walford, S. E.	478
Macpherson	465	Parmentier, L.	544	Sharpe, Bowdler	277	Walaszewski, K.	86
Macpherson, Hector C.	441	Partridge, Mildred	230	Shaw, Bernard	111	Walker, G. H.	21
Macpherson, Jean	640	Pasolini, Count Pier Desiderio	31	Shaw, Byam	517	Wallace, Robert	600
Macpherson of Kingsie, Alex.	391	Pastor, Dr. Ludwig	328	Shaw, James	600	Walters, Cuming	516
Materlinck	230	Pater, Walter	330	Sheehan, E. A.	210	Wanklyn, J. A.	657
Magnus, Lady	331	Peterson, Arthur	384	Sherwell, Arthur	441	Ward, Arabella	658
Mailard, Léon	620	Patrick, Mary Mills	684	Shiel, M. P.	375	Ward, A. W.	230
Maiset, Jeanne	667	Payne, Edward John	412	Shore, Hon. H. N.	629	Ward, Mrs. Humphry	478
Maisonrouve	667	Peauce, Capt. Francis B.	49	Shorter, Mrs. Clement	563	Ward, Mrs. Wilfred	465
Maitland, Frederic Wm.	192	Pease, Howard	533	Shortz, Robert	347	Warden, Florence	640
Malcolm, Lady	335	Pemberton, Max	502	Sigwick, Arthur	282	Warner, Townsend	491
Mallock, W. H.	582	Pennell, E. Robins.	59	Sidis, Dr.	12	Warren, Kate M.	282
Marchmont	693	Pennell, Joseph	59	Siolkiewicz, Henryk	655	Waters, W. G.	28
Marden, Orison Swett	90	Peters, Carl	416	Sjerson, Dora	566	Watson, Alfred E. T.	97
Marillier	254	Petersen, Marie	211	Simons, D. W.	465	Watson, H. B. Marriott	556
Marks, Montague	381	Philips, Wm. Henry	363	Stimpson, Richard	652	Watson, John Reay	86
Marr, J. E.	654	Philpott, T. L.	279	Skinner, Henrietta Dana	558	Watson, R. W. Seton	112
Marryat, Mrs. F. Townshend	584	Phillips, Claude	224	Slater, J. H.	10	Watts, H. G.	583
Marsh, Richard	71, 694	Phillips, F. Emily	694	Slonson, Annie Trumbull	240	Watt, Duntou, Theodore	557
Martin, Ewart	584	Pike, G. Holden	461	Smith, Edgar Maurice	209	Webb, Frederic J.	479
Martin, Mrs. Herbert	122, 278, 558	Pinero, A.	110	Smith, George Adam	39	Webb, Rev. John	653
Martyn, Edward	109	Plarr, Victor	39	Smith, H. P.	389	Webster, H. Cayley	225
Marx, Karl	694	Plummer, Dr.	330	Smith, Horace	516	Weldon, J. E. C.	168
Masson, Frédéric	289	Pognon, H.	360	Smith, W. B.	307	Wells, H. G.	583
Masson, Rosaline	87	Pollock, Sir Fredk.	363, 400	Snell, F. J.	219	Werner, A.	555
Masson-Forestier	96	Poste, E.	36	Somers, (London)	71	Westall, William	318
Mathias, Walter J.	362	Potoczek, Anne	28	Suan, Rosalind	86	Westcott, E. Noyes	429
Matheson, Annie	85	Power, Edith M.	584	Speight, E. E.	261	Westlake, Professor	336
Mathew, Frank	583	Power-Berrey, K. Y.	683	Spencer, Baldwin	167	Wharton, Anne Hollingsworth	236
Mathews, C. E.	6	Pynting, J. H.	280	Spencer, Edward	306	Wharton, Edith	693
Maxwell, Sir Herbert	7, 278	Præd, Mrs. Campbell	556	Spigge, S. Squire	347	Whites, H.	258
Meade, L. T.	211	Price, E. D.	573	Stacpole, Henry de Vere	346	Whitely, Henry	563
Meehan, B. and J. F.	114	Price, Eleanor C.	346	Stanbridge, J. W.	304	Whitely, Stephen	169
Meldrum, David S.	494	Price, Julius M.	175	Stebbing, Mr.	558	Wherry, Albania	173
Melville, Herman	278	Prichard, E. and Hesketh	558	Stephens, W. Walker	239	Whibley, Charles	627
Melville, Whyte	493	Prichard, Tudor	90	Stevens, W. H. Pettit	572	Whistler, Charles	210
Menda, Bowen Stilon	491	Pullan, Leighton	519	Steward, W.	113	Whitaker	200
Menger, Dr.	305	Putnam, Ruth	306	Stewart, Sir J. Grainger	464	White, Percy	428
Merrick, E. M.	572	Quiller-Couch, Lillian	528	Stillman, W. J.	651	Whiteing, Richard	315
Meyer, Hans	503	Kadford, Dollie	239	Stirling, A. H.	363	Whiteway, R. S.	493
Miall, A. Bernard	541	Rafferty, F. W.	516	Stock, Eugene	303	Whitman, R. Sney	330
Millar, J.	86	Raine, Allen	347	Stook, St. George	143	Whitmarsh, H. Phelps	71
Millar, Marion	429	Ralph, Julian	346	Stockett, Frank	184	Whyte, Frederic	84
Miller, G. W.	418	Ramsey, Mrs.	694	Stokes, Margaret	114	Wiel, Althea	65
Miller, Walter	500	Rausch, Prof.	230	Storey, G. A.	173	Wilkinson, Spenser	435
Milne, James	599	Ratzel, Friedrich	87	Storr, F.	573	Willard, Ashton Rollins	488
Molener, Samuel Paul	335	Raymond, Walter	428	Story, Alfred T.	547	Williams, Charles	558
Monck, W. H. S.	654	Rea, Hope	490	Strang, William	227	Williams, James	86
Moncrieff, A. R. Hope	630	Read, Carveth	13	Stratton, Helen	465	Williams, Leonard	630
Money-Coutts, F. B.	85	Read, Opie	656	Strenne, Rev. A. W.	465	Williams, Neil Wynn	556
Monier-Williams, M. S.	144	Reader, E. E.	528	Strettell, Alma	332	Williams, Mrs. C. H.	566
Monkhouse, Allan	210	Réjean, M. E.	494	Stretton, Hester	22	Wilson, Bishop	520
Montefiore, Sara	548	Reid, Andrew	38	Sturges, Julian	240	Windsor, A. H.	90
Moore, Arthur	558	Reid, Arnot	331	Suckling, Marianne	257	Windt, Harry de	572
Moore, F. Frankfort	428	Reid, Sir Wenysa	409	Sullivan, T. D.	240	Winterbotham, Canon	63
Moore, George	109	Relton, Rev. Frederic	520	Sutcliffe, Halliwell	154	Wiseman, Cardinal	204
Moore, Spencer	592	Renan	53	Sutro, Alfred	230	Wishaw, Fred	478
Mors, Paul Elmer	567	Renton, A. Wood	251	Swete, Dr.	389	Woodberry, G. E.	684
Morison, Theodore	569	Reppier, Agnes	359	Sykes, D. F. E.	21	Woodroffe, Paul	193
Morrah, Herbert	121	Reynolds	307	Sylvester, Paul	34	Woodward, G. R.	196
Morris, Sir Lewis	282	Richardson, H. L.	40	Takuhashi, Professor Sakuyō	336	Worcester, Dean C.	86
Morris, William O'Connor	421	Richmond, Sir W.	227	Tangye, Sir Richard	465	Wright, Henry	557
Morse, Charles Russell	374	Richter, J. P.	490	Tanner, E.	491	Wright, W.	597
Moscheles, Felix	359	Rickett, Arthur	35	Tarquary, Mrs. Bertram	521	Wyllarde, Dolf	428
Mosher, Martha B.	442	Rippman, Walter	90	Taylor, Canon Isaac	338	Wyndham, Horace	569
Moulton, Richard G.	114, 520	"Rits"	282	Taylor, Emily Dayton	336	X. Miss	516
Mrazovic, Milena	557	Ritchie, Anne	665	Taylor, Emily	227	Yarnall, Eliza	675
Mulholland, Rosa	217	Ritchie, James Ewing	50	Taylor, Emily	227	Yeats, W. B.	439, 565
Müller, F. Max	255, 597	Rivington, Rev. Luke	600	Taylor, Emily	227	Yonge, Miss	518
Munroe, Kirk	154	Rivington, Septimus	141	Taylor, Emily	227	Young, T. E.	391
Münsterberg, Prof. Hugo	684	Roberts, Morley	435	Taylor, Emily	227	Youngusband, Maj. G. J.	384
Müntz, Eugene	138	Roberts, M. Rhy	627	Thedden, Henry	437	Zivy, Henry	289
Murfree, Miss	556	Roberts, M. Rhy	627	Thomas, Cyrus	412
Murray	494	Robertson, C. Grant	680	Thomas, Emile	628
Murray, Dr.	88, 623	Robinson, Hon. Sir J.	655	Thomas, Herbert	543
Naylor, E. W.	573	Robinson, Mrs. Aubrey	517	Thompson, A. Douglas	331
Nazarbek, Aytia	558	Rod, Edouard	96, 166	Thompson, H. L.	567
Nedetz, Dr. Ljubomir	332	Rodney, Harley	346	Thompson, Silvanus P.	39
Nelson, G. R.	282	Rodway, James	624	Thompson, H. C.	653
Newfield, J. C.	520	Rosenfeld, Morris	333	Thomson, J. J. Arthur	280
Newbolt, Canon	200	Ross, J. H.	61	Thornburn, S. S.	390
Newbolt, W. C. E.	519	Rossett, William Michael	87	Thornhill, Mark	597
Newcastle, Duke of	240	Routh, Dr.	441	Thornthorn, Douglas M.	547
Newcomen, George	20	Rowntree, Joseph	21	Thorp, F. H.	694
Newland, Simpson	622	Ruff, John B.	180	Threlfall, J. R.	631
Newman, Ernest	21	Rumbold, Mr.	573	Tie's, Professor	148
Nicholas, Anna	175	Rumney, A. W.	279	Todd, David F.	601
Nicholl, Edith M.	71	Runciman, J. F.	583	Todd, Margaret	653
Nicholson, Claud	493, 583	Russell, H. Rutherford	211	Tomkins, H. G.	374
Nicholson, Edward B.	625	Russell, James E.	428	Townsend, Surtees	542
Nietzsche, Friedrich	667	Russell, T. Baron	682	Townshend, R. B.	210
Nisbet, J. F.	429	S. L. G. H.	648	Toynbee, William	375
Noë, Michel	305	St. Aubyn, Alan	258	Tracy, Louis	494
Nordau, Max	247	St. Barbe, Reginald	175	Trevelyan, Geo. Macaulay	29
Norie, W. Drummond	71	Saintsbury, George	543	Trevelyan, Sir George Otto	666
Norris, Frank	228	Sallisbury, Bishop	141	Trumbull, Annie Eliot	616
Norris, Paul	90, 516	Sampson, Admiral W. T.	141	Tschudi, Clara	546
Nye, G. H. K.	694	Samuels, E.	491	Turner, Charles Edward	624
Odgers, Blake	65, 209	Sargant, John	462	Tweedie, Mrs. Alec	83
O'Bill, Rex	223	Saroles, Charles	544	Tyskiewicz, Count Michael	317
O'Donoghue, O. J.	281	Saunders, Marshall	555	Tyman-Hinkson, Mrs.	630
Old, W. Gorn.	303	Saunders, T. Bailey	655	Tyndall, Professor	375
Ollivant, Alfred	229	Saunders, Leopold de	479	Tytler, Sarah	494
Oman, C. W. C.	556	Savage, Col.	382	Upton, Sarah Carr	502
"Onyx"	528	Saxby, Col. J. J.	114	Uward, Allen	598
Oppenheim, E. C.	58	Schlumberger, M.	199	Vandervell, Harry	336
Oppenheim, E. Phillips	516	Schmeisser, Karl	416	Vaughan, Alexander	641
Ordish, Fairman				Vaughan, Cardinal	304
Oscar, W. N.
Ostrovsky
O'Sullivan, Vincent

CANADIAN LETTER—

CONTRIBUTORS OF SIGNED
ARTICLES, LETTERS, &c.—

A Mere Author	186
Abbott, T. K.	403
Adcock, A. St. John	495
Alderson, E. S.	480
Amicus Curiae	529, 535
An Author	157
Anderson, Henry C. L.	376
Archer, William	177
Arnold, Sir Edwin	193, 539
Author	128
Author of "Sursim Corda"	156
B.	642
Bartram, George	574
Bateson, H. D.	641
Bathurst, J. Kellick	671
Beard, Lewis	671
Beames, Captain D.	551
Beesly, A. H.	402
Beeson, Arthur C.	497
Benson, E. F.	604
Besant, Sir Walter	99
Betham-Edwards, M.	377
Boscawen, W. St. Chad	428
Brades, George	47
Breton, Austin	294
Bright, Charles	50
Bromley, Beatrice M.	231
Burchell, Sidney H.	505
C.	403

Digitized by Google

NOTES—(continued)	PAGE	NOTES—(continued)	PAGE	NOTES—(continued)	PAGE	NOTES—(continued)	PAGE
Coxon, J. K.	312	"Grosseteste (R.), Life of"	403	"Library Association Year Book"	635	Penicik House, Fire at	664
Crane, Stephen	349	Groth, Klaus, Death of	608	Life's a Dream	496	"Pensions and Progress"	406
Crane, Walter	562	"Guide to Dancing"	163	Ligue de la Patrie Française	219	Peth Town Council	531
Critical Club, Letters of	69	"Guide to the System of Cataloguing"	367	"Like Another Helen"	586	Petrarch's Library	268
"Cromwell as a Soldier"	213	Guille-Allis Library	287	"Like he did"	45	"Petticoats"	506
Cromwell Tercentenary	408, 430, 434	Hallen, Rev. A. W. C., Death of	424	Lanton, Mrs. Lynn, Biography of	368	Philippis, Stephen	190
Cupples, Annie J. D.	94	Halves	634	Literary Monographs	696	Philosophical Society	55
Curtin, Mr.	350	Hamilton, Walter	158	"Literary Year Book," The	162	Pi Margal	182
Cust, L.	505	Hamlet, Royal Translator of	313	Literature and Science	29	"Pictorial Edinburgh"	672
"Custom of the Country," The	696	Hampshire, History of	320	Literature at Cambridge	286	Pinerio, Mr.	696
Cyrano de Bergerac	131	Handwriting, History of	652	"Little Book of Death and Rest"	481	Plagiolarism	95
"Daily Telegraph"	149	Hagood, Norman	70	Little, Canon Knox	550	Plato-Lexicon, New	186, 560
Daily, Mr.	686	Hauptmann, Gerhard	696	"Little Journeys to the Homes of"	635	Playgoers' Club	107
Dante Society	587	Hay, Mr.	563	"Eminent Painters"	635	Playwrights in Germany	263
Dante's "Divina Commedia"	377	Hazlitt Literary Society	45	Little, Mrs. A.	552	Plays, New	94
Darmesteter, Mme.	563	Hebeck of Bannisdale	368	"London Letter"	422	Plumtree, Miss C.	294
"Das litterarische Koho"	163	Helps, Sir Arthur	69	Loti, Pierre	180, 235, 296	Pluralism in Reviews	508
Daudet, Life of	338	Hennaus, Felicia	45, 118, 551	Louvre, Pictures in the	396	Pniower, Dr. Otto	481
Decadence of Magazines	552	"Heredity"	431	"Love's Comedy," Translation of	214	Poison in Fiction	234, 312
Decorative Borders to Books	44	"Heresies"	470	Ludwig II. of Bavaria	480	Pollok, Robert	630
Delavigne, M. Arthur	93	Hexameters	470	Lyde, W.	615	Postage of Periodicals	151, 313
Derivation, Words without	59	Highways and Byways Series	268	"Lyke-Wake Dirge," A	672	Poushkin	587
"Dickens and His Illustrators"	187	Hire-purchase System	422	Macedonia, Mr.	206	"Praterita"	567
Dickens in the Antipodes	551	Historic Manuscripts Commission	350	Mackail, J. W.	311	Prevost, M. Marcel, Election of	369
Dickens Sale at Sotheby's	552, 636	Historical Dramas	470	Mackail, To	296	Price, Rev. Bartholomew	18
Dictionary, English Dialect	25	"History of the Belvoir Hunt," The	643	Maga, To	93	Prisoner of the Khalefa, A	461
"Die Umschau"	19	"History of Intellectual Develop-ment"	403	Mahabharata	214	Private Libraries	205
Discount Question	243	History of Life in the United States	405	"Main Streams of 19th Century"	47	Proper Names, Decay of	470
"Dissolving Views"	378	Hogan's Life of Dante	644	"Man in the Moon, The"	179	"Psychology of Woman"	531
Dixon's Game Birds, &c.	220	Hood, T., Centenary of	551	Manual of Library Cataloguing	498	Public Schools, Books about	431
Doobson's (Austin) Triolet	446	"Hooligan Nights," The	285, 615	Margoliouth, Prof. D. S.	662	Publishers' Announcements	294
Dollinger, Dr.	158	Horne "Orion"	498	Mark Twain	535	Publishers' Association	243, 324
"Dome," The	312	"How to Do It"	349	Marriage Addresses, Collection of	515	"Publishers' Circular"	28
"Dominion of Dreams," The	321	Hughes, Tom, Statue to	674, 690	Marsh, Mr. R.	671	Publishers' Risk	448
Donnelly, J.	190	"Human Machine," The	403	Marsell, A. Political Satires of	690	Puroell, E. S.	615
"Dooley, Mr."	312	Human Skin for Bookbinding	525	Mason, A. E. W.	405	Queen Nathalie of Milan	321
Drama, Criticisms of	207	"L'Humanité Nouvelle"	70	Masque, The	562, 689	"Quo Vadis," Translation of	356
Dramatic Authors, Soc. of	459, 634	Hume, Alexander	458	Mathews, Brander	638	Racine, Anniversary of the Death of	409
Drama, English and German	207	Humour in Women	458	Mathew, F.	596	Rawnsley's, Canon, Poem	93
Drummond (Prof.), Memoir of	179	"Hundred Best Books"	18	"Mayfair"	406	Readers, English and German	663
Duse, Eleonora	552	"Hundred Best Novels"	149	McCarthy, Justin	531	"Reason of State"	456
Economics, London School of	46	Huntingdon Grammar School	499	McKain, B.	295, 643	"Recessional," Reprint of	421
Edinburgh Bibliographical Society	70	Huymans, M.	94	Measure for Measure	340	"Red Shoes, The"	150
Edinburgh Magazine	68	Hynes, Cutcliffe	616	Medical Books	349	Redemption of Africa, The	349
Elegiacs	578, 608	Illicit Commis-sions	577	Melodrama	150	Reid, Alan	656
Elizabethan Stage Society	149, 498, 689	Illuminated MSS.	423	Melville, Lewis	507	Reissues	234
Ellis, T. M.	607	Illustrated Books	119	"Memoirs of the Poets"	545	Religious Trist Society	523
Embroidery	532	"Illustrated London News," Editor-ship of	559	Mendes, M. Camille	552	Remington, F.	208
"Emotions and the Will," The	446	"Imperial Interest Series"	431, 455	Mendicure de France	180	Repentance, A	403
Empress Josephine, Life of	670	Imperial Press (Ltd.) v. Johnson	500	Meredith's Works, Incomplete Edi-tions of	340, 370, 391	Reserve System	288
English Catalogue of Books	325	Indian Excavations	119	"Merry Tales of the Wise Men of Gotham"	481	"Resurrection"	263, 321
English Dictionary, New	55, 150	"Indian Gazette"	311	Rever's Tragedy	54	Reuter, Baron	219
English History, Cataloguing	45	"In His Steps"	311	Review of Griffith Davenport	71	Rever's Tragedy	54
English Literature, Intermediate Text-Book of	78	"In the Khalifa's Clutches"	531	Review of Review	508	Reviewers, Pluralism in	508
English Novelists in America	663	International Congress of Compara-tive Literature	500	Revision of Published Text	505	Reynolds, Sir J.	498
"English Writers of To-day"	455, 644	International Congress of Publishers	618	Reynolds, Sir J., House	607	Reynolds, Sir J., House	607
Erickmann, Karl	531	International Copyright	380	Rhodotavakis, Constantine	288	"River War," The	615, 643
"Fair Maid's House, The"	481	International Exhibition of Pictures	587	"Rivista Moderna"	150	Roberts, Prof. Rhys	320, 381
"Fall of the Sparrow," The	320	"International Geography"	480	Roberts, Prof. Rhys	320, 381	Roberts, Prof. Rhys	320, 381
"Fauna Hawaiianis"	320	Ireland, Education in	29	Rodenbach, G. Memorial to	369	Rose and Chrysanthemum	482
Febvre, M. Frederic	234	Irish Bible, the Highlands	531	Rodman, M. Edouard	482	Rousseau Library and Museum	636
"Femmes Nouvelles"	180, 320	Irish Literary Theatre	509	Rose and Chrysanthemum	482	Royal Academy Banquet	458
Field (Miss), Life of	403	Irish Text Society	187	Rousseau Library and Museum	636	Royal Botanic Society	689
Fielding's Works, Reprint of	268	Irish University Question	404	Royal Historical Society	45	Royal Institution, Centenary of	615
Filion, M. Augustin	106	Irving, Sir H.	634	Royal Literary Fund	380, 447	Ruskin, Birthday of	134
Fiona Macleod	531	"Islam in Africa"	588	Ruskin, Birthday of	134	"Russia in Asia"	455
"Fire and Frost"	73	Isola	505	Russian Classical Authors	481	St. George, Hanover-square, Libraries	578
Fitchett, Rev. W. H.	77, 577	Italian Ambassador on Dante	624	Sancrit-English Dictionary	349	Savonarola	560
Fitzmaurice, Lord E.	587	Italian Books	696	Schnitzler's, A., plays	341	School for Scandal	70
Fletcher, J. S.	531	Italian Translations	214	Schnitzler's, A., plays	341	School World	69, 446
"Flora of Cheshire, The"	456	Italy, Books dealing with	405	Schreiner, Olive	696	Sciences, Imperial Academy of	52
Fontaine, T.	672	James, Dr. E. J.	214	Scotland, Social Development of	349	"Scotland and the Commonwealth"	295
Footprints of Authors	206	Japanese Literature, History of	76	Scott, Sir Walter	68	"Scots Magazine"	23
Foreign Postal Rate for Journals	636	Jean Jacques Rousseau, Translation of	500	Scott, Clement	26, 187	Scott, Letters of	368
"Forest Notes"	636	Jean Reynaud Prize, The	151	Scott, Clement	26, 187	Scott, Letters of	368
Fortescue, G. K.	2, 205	Jerome, Jerome K.	150	Scott, Clement	26, 187	Scott, Letters of	368
Fortes (H.), Death of	368	"Jewish World"	69	Scott, Clement	26, 187	Scott, Letters of	368
Foster, Sir M.	615	"Johnny Crapaud and his Journals"	69	Scott, Clement	26, 187	Scott, Letters of	368
Foxwell's, Prof., Collection of Books	664	Johnson Club at Bath	662	Scott, Clement	26, 187	Scott, Letters of	368
Freemantle, S. T.	268	Johnson, C. W. and G. W., Sale of	609	Scott, Clement	26, 187	Scott, Letters of	368
French Hall Marks	587	Libraries of	609	Scott, Clement	26, 187	Scott, Letters of	368
French Journalists' Mistakes	70	Jonson, Ben	233	Scott, Clement	26, 187	Scott, Letters of	368
French Literary Men's Favourite Ani-mals	180	"Jubilee Series"	103	Scott, Clement	26, 187	Scott, Letters of	368
French Novels	563	"Judith Moore"	72	Scott, Clement	26, 187	Scott, Letters of	368
French Painters of the 18th Century	643	Karn, Dr. F.	214	Scott, Clement	26, 187	Scott, Letters of	368
French Revolution, Literature of	272, 286, 396	Kenta, Bas-relief to	470	Scott, Clement	26, 187	Scott, Letters of	368
French Romancists	587	Kilmecott Press	150	Scott, Clement	26, 187	Scott, Letters of	368
French Translations	287	Kilkeny Theatre Royal	696	Scott, Clement	26, 187	Scott, Letters of	368
French Translations of English Plays	118	"King's College Magazine"	696	Scott, Clement	26, 187	Scott, Letters of	368
Fulda, Dr. L.	235	Kipling	214, 262	Scott, Clement	26, 187	Scott, Letters of	368
Gardner, Dr.	151, 587	Kipling M8	403	Scott, Clement	26, 187	Scott, Letters of	368
Garland, Hamlin	178, 674	Kipling, Rudyard 19, 246, 424, 484, 522, 534	643	Scott, Clement	26, 187	Scott, Letters of	368
Garnett, Dr.	397	Kipling's Prose Writings	643	Scott, Clement	26, 187	Scott, Letters of	368
Gay Lord Queer, The	103	Kyd	149	Scott, Clement	26, 187	Scott, Letters of	368
"Gerald Fitzgerald, the Chevalier"	350	"La Bonne Prière"	455	Scott, Clement	26, 187	Scott, Letters of	368
German Art	663	"La Caravane"	158	Scott, Clement	26, 187	Scott, Letters of	368
German and English Readers	340	"La Revue Parisienne"	338	Scott, Clement	26, 187	Scott, Letters of	368
German Criticisms of English Novels	235	Labour College, Oxford	69	Scott, Clement	26, 187	Scott, Letters of	368
German Drama	235	"Ladies' Home Journal"	447	Scott, Clement	26, 187	Scott, Letters of	368
Germanic Year	405	Lady Novelists	69	Scott, Clement	26, 187	Scott, Letters of	368
German Translations	235, 273	"Lady of Quality," Cheap Edition of	605	Scott, Clement	26, 187	Scott, Letters of	368
Gerrard, W.	505	Lallemand, Prof.	119	Scott, Clement	26, 187	Scott, Letters of	368
Ginsburg, Dr. C. D.	158	Lamb, Bas-relief to	470	Scott, Clement	26, 187	Scott, Letters of	368
Ginsing (G.), French Translations of	613	Lampen, Rev. C. D.	480	Scott, Clement	26, 187	Scott, Letters of	368
"Glasgow Streets and Places"	396	Langens, M. de	480	Scott, Clement	26, 187	Scott, Letters of	368
Glasgow University	644	Lange, Julius	69	Scott, Clement	26, 187	Scott, Letters of	368
"God is Love"	607	Langues, Decaying	69	Scott, Clement	26, 187	Scott, Letters of	368
Godwin, Bishop	93	Latin Quotation	191	Scott, Clement	26, 187	Scott, Letters of	368
Goethe's "Last Love"	341	"Latin Races"	321	Scott, Clement	26, 187	Scott, Letters of	368
"Golden Treasury Series"	187	"Law in Taste"	462	Scott, Clement	26, 187	Scott, Letters of	368
Gordon, Hist. of House of	45	Lawrence, A. H.	431	Scott, Clement	26, 187	Scott, Letters of	368
Gort, H. E.	430	Laws of Gravity	577	Scott, Clement	26, 187	Scott, Letters of	368
Gosse, Edmund	178	Lee's (Sidney) Lecture	205, 434	Scott, Clement	26, 187	Scott, Letters of	368
Gould, Nat	482	Legion of Honour, Members of the	80	Scott, Clement	26, 187	Scott, Letters of	368
Gower	404	Legitimist Calendar	423	Scott, Clement	26, 187	Scott, Letters of	368
Gowing, Richard	587	"Leslie, Alex., The Life and Campaigns of"	615	Scott, Clement	26, 187	Scott, Letters of	368
Graham, Rev. H. G.	587	Letter Writing	298	Scott, Clement	26, 187	Scott, Letters of	368
Granville, Lord, Life of	506	"Lewis Carroll"	103	Scott, Clement	26, 187	Scott, Letters of	368
Grant, Mme. Sarah	151	Liblin, J., Death of	369	Scott, Clement	26, 187	Scott, Letters of	368
Grand, Cal. U. S.	213	Library Assistants' Association	29	Scott, Clement	26, 187	Scott, Letters of	368
Gray, Sir Edward	243			Scott, Clement	26, 187	Scott, Letters of	368
Gray, Sir George .

NOTES—(continued)	PAGE	OBITUARIES—(continued)	PAGE	BIOGRAPHY—(continued)	PAGE	BOOKS OF REFERENCE—(continued)	PAGE
Spencer's Catalogue	690	Hervé, Edouard	60	Charles Kingsley	305	Catalogue of the Library of Syon	229
Spiegelhafer, Friedrich	207	Hogan, Michael	452	Christy her Crayon's Recollections	90	Monastery	229
"Star, The"	51, 54	Kelly, Augustin Bernard	641	Country Schoolmaster, A	600	Catalogue of the Wade Collection of	87
Star, W. Jun.	563	Kiepert, Heinrich	453	Danton	325	Chinese and Manchu books	282
Stenzel, Major von	424	Lampman, Archibald	347	Diary of St. Helena, A	333	Clergy Directory, The	282
Step, E.	587	Leitner, Dr. Gottlieb William	317	Diary of Samuel Pops	563	Debre's House of Commons and	200
Stevenson	472	Lichtenberger, F.	50	Dictionary of National Biography	32, 381	Judicial Bench	200
Stevenson's House	368	Marshall, Mrs.	503	Dr. Southwood Smith	14	Englishwoman's Year Book	200
Stevenson's Works in French	313	Nailler, Charles	240	Edward Meyrick Goulburn	144	Every Man His Own Lawyer	200
"Stories from Machines"	404	Paileron, Edouard	452	Elizabeth, Empress of Austria	6	Literary Year Book	200
Stories, The New Sort of	691	Purcell, Ed. Sheridan	452	Episcopate of Charles Wordsworth, The	517	Morison's Chronicle of the Year's	573
Stuart Papers, The	349	Rumsey, Almaric	401	Eugénie, Empress of the English Court	517	New	83, 623
Stuarts, Books on the	103	Sarcey, Francisque	528	Famous Ladies of the English Court	358	Official Year Book of the Church of	282
"Studia Sinaitica"	616	Stevens, Joseph	401	Fragments of an Autobiography	651	England	14
"Studies in Dante"	135	Stevens, Thomas Moffit	453	Francisco Crampi	289	Peasage, The	442
Studies in Some Famous Letters	213	Truolose, Edward	125	Francis Turner Palgrave	93	Statesman's Year Book	200
Studies of the Portrait of Christ	696	Turrini, Giuseppe	503	George Harley, F.R.S.	520	Walford's House of Commons, &c.	200
Subject-Indexing	299, 422	Vincent, Benjamin	292	God First: Hester Needham's Work	333	Whitaker's Naval & Military Directory	200
Subscription Theatre	425	Vogel, Sir Julius	401	in Sumatra	40	Whitaker's Titled Persons	200
Sudermann	119, 181	Williams, Sir M. Monier	267	Heinrich Heine's Last Days	327
"Sun-Children's Budget"	405	Xau, M.	231	Henry Robert Reynolds	621
Sunday Daily Mail	523			James and Horace Smith	620
Sunday Newspapers	381, 397			James Frederick Ferrier	223
"Sundown Letters"	208			James Russell Lowell and his Friends	682
Swinnburne	424			Jarome Caran	619
Swiss Journalism	93			King's Mother, The	639
Syriac MSS.	70			Leary Louis Stuart	520
Szilagi, Dr. Alexander	94			Leonard de Vinci	9
"Tale of Two Cities"	213			Letters and Papers of Sir Thomas	163
Taylor, Rev. C.	247, 643			Byam Martin	485
Tennyson, Lord	499			Letters of Robert Browning and Eliza-	492
"Terrible Parish" of Dunkell	500			Leh Barrett Barrett, The	573
Texte, Prof.	408			Letters of Thomas Carlyle to his	520
Thackeray, Biographical Edition of	149			youngest Sister	391
Thackeray, Discovers	320			Letters of Albert Morel	39
"Theatrical World"	525			Life and Remains of Quick	517
"Theory of a Leisure Class"	643			Life of Bishop Smythies	86
Thomas, Miss M.	562			Life of Danton	408
Thompson, C. M.	652			Life of Henry Benedict Stuart	459
Thompson, Sir C. M.	523			Life of Prince Drummond	273
Titles, Copyright in	505			Life of Prince Bismarck	173
Tolstoi	294			Life of St. Edmund of Abingdon	570
Tommy and Grisel	80, 106, 180			Life of Vice-Admiral Edmund, Lord	545
Tournour, Cyril	340			Lyons	86
"Tragedy, The"	341			Life of William Forster Gladstone, The	648
Translations of English Literature	643			Life of William Morris	567
Travels, Sir G., Speech on History	63, 118			Life Story of the late Sir Charles	56
Trinidad, Literary History of	89			Tilston Bright, The	9
"True Religion"	207			Life, Writings, and Correspondence	56
Tsai's Receipt, The	286			of George Borrow	513
Twain, Mark	397			Lord Olive	282
Turgenev	178			Lumsden of the Guides	282
Turner, Age and Art of	47			Martyrdom of an Empress, The	282
Turpie, Capt. R.	672			Marylenka	282
"Turning of Tires, The"	587			Matthew Arnold	282
Tyrrill, Prof. R.	587			Memoirs of H. C. Liddell	282
"Ungdomsvers"	579			Memoires du Gen. Baron Desvernois	282
Universal Exhibition of 1900	579			Memoirs and Correspondence of Susan	282
Urquhart, Sir T., Life of	587			Ferrier	282
Vanor, M.	587			Memoirs of Admiral Rt. Hon. Sir	282
Veblen, Thorstein	579			Astley Cooper Key, G.C.B.	282
"Vengeance of the Female"	579			Memoirs of Father Healy	282
Versetlagin, M.	579			Memoirs of Half a Century	282
Vierdott-arcia, Madame	579			Memoir of Sir Robert P. Stewart	282
"Victor of Bray" Original	579			Memoirs of the Baionese Cecile de	282
Victorian County Histories	579			Cu root	282
"Virgiles Fortes, Les"	579			Memoirs of the Verney Family from	282
"Village Coquettes, The"	579			1660 to 1656	282
Vivanti, Annie	579			Mich o Faraday	282
Voynich, Mrs.	579			Montealm and Wolfe	282
Waddell, Major L. A.	579			My Iner Life	282
Wakeman, H. O., Death of	579			Naval Pioneer of Australia, The	282
Wallace, Dr. R.	579			Nelson's Friendships	282
Wallace, W.	579			Newman Hall	282
Wallachs of Macedonia	579			Pers Gaveston	282
Walpole, Sir Spencer	579			Pollock and Astoun	282
Ward, J.	579			Portraits Intimes	282
Ward, Mrs. Humphry	579			Ramakridina	282
War, Literature of	579			Reminiscences	282
"War of the Future," The	579			Renaud de Châtillon	282
Warren, J. Low	579			Richard Holt Hutton of the "Spec-	282
Wells, G. R.	579			tator"	282
Welsh Dramatic Society	579			Robert Raikes: The Man and his Work	282
Welsh Prose Works	579			Romance of a Pro-Consul	282
West Ham Libraries	579			Royal Friendships	282
Wheeler, J. G.	579			Sailor's Life under Four Sovereigns, A	282
Wheeler, J. G.	579			St. Francis of Assisi	282
Wheeler, J. G.	579			Sir George Pomeroi-Coley	282
Wheeler, J. G.	579			Sir Robert Peel	282
Wheeler, J. G.	579			Sketches from Memory	282
White, Gleeson, Library of	579			Some Account of George William Wil-	282
White, Sir W., Life of	579			shire, Baron Bramwell of Hever	282
White, Mrs. Gleeson	579			Story of the Princess des Ursins in	282
"Who's Who," American Edition of	579			Spain, The	282
Wildenbruch, E. von	579			Thomas Moore	282
Wilcox, Marion	579			Thomas Reid	282
Williamson, Dr. G. C.	579			Two Protectors, Oliver and Richard	282
Windham's Tour in France	579			Cromwell	282
"With Kitchener to Khartum" (six-	579			Unpublished Letters of Swift	282
penny edition)	579			Voyages d'Italie	282
Women Writers	579			Wes ev and Whitehall in Scotland	282
Wood, Joanna	579			Works of William Makepeace	282
Woodward, Miss A.	579			Ticknary	282
Wordsworth, Bishop	579			Zo oster; the Prophet of Ancient	282
Working Men, Fifty Best Books for	579			Iran	282
Wyndham, H.	579				282
"Yamso Mendi"	579				282
"Young Blood," Suppression of, in	579				282
Scandinavia	579				282
Young, John R.	579				282
Young, Prof. S.	579				282
"Young Lives"	579				282
Yoxall, J. H.	579				282
Zaccani	579				282
"Zack"	579				282
Zangwill, I.	579				282
Zola, M.	579				282
Zurbruggen, M.	579				282

FICTION—(continued)	PAGE	FICTION—(continued)	PAGE	FICTION—(continued)	PAGE	HISTORY—(continued)	PAGE
Calumnies	556	Love the Widower	538	Story of Nanno, The	317	Cameos from English History	518
Captains, The	291	Luck of the Four-Leaved Shamrock, The	479	Story of Old Fort London, The	555	Catherine Bforza	34
Captain of the Locusts, The	533	Ma Mère	479	Strange Executioner, A	558	China	361
Cardinal's Page, The	121	Maître's Racehorse and other Stories	479	Strong Hearts	666	Chronology of India	493
Carr of Dimascur	479	Macane Izan	556	Sunningham and the Curate	502	Count Frontenac and New France under Louis XIV	518
Castle Czarnas	656	Madonna Mia	180	Sword of Allah	624	De Soto and his Men in the Land of Florida	40
Chapel F. 11k	209	Mam'zelle Grand'mère	556	Tales of Northumbria	583	Derniers Moments de Napoléon, Les	289
Child Abel, The	71	Man and his Kingdom, The	556	Tattle Tales of Cupid	666	Deutscher Volkstim	572
Cicely Vaughan	502	Man with Two Souls, The	209	Thecla's Vow	375	Deuxième Campagne d'Italie, La	289
Cloud of Dawn, A	21	Mandarin, The	583	Things that have Happened	478	Ecclesiastical History of Eusebius in Syria	597
Comédienne	667	Mandate, The	478	Three Cat's-Eye Rings	558	Ecclesiastical History of Evagrius	544
Confession of Catharine Storza, The	21	Many Ways of Love	528	Through a Keyhole	636	Emperor Hadrian, The	334
Confounding of Camelia, The	428	Marble King, The	218	Tom Benton's Luck	347	England in the Age of Wycliffe	353
Contraband of War	375	Market Harborough	230	Tom Tutton's Toll	317	English Reformation, The	512
Counterpart, The	154	Mary Unwin	428	Tom Tugg and Others	22	Fifty Years of the History of the Republic in South Africa	540
Countess Tekla, The	375	Marie de Mancini	528	Touch of the Sun	617	Founding of South Australia, The	226
County Scandal, A	694	Maternity of Harriett Wicken	316	Treasure Officer's Wooing, The	374	Gleanings from the Charter Chest at Cluny Castle	391
Cousin Ivo	428	Maureen Moore	240	Triumph of Failure, The	210	Half a Century of Conflict	518
Cromwell's Own	584	Maze of Life, The	640	Turkish Automaton	121	History of British India, A	247
Cruise of the Golden Wave, The	528	Member's Wife, The	96	Turkish Bonds	428	History of Corsica, The	307
Curios	71	Ménage du Pasteur Naudis, Le	695	Two Men of Mendip	133	History of Pasellus	544
Darh for a Thione, A	693	Merodech	429	Uncalled, The	527	History of Scotland	256
Daughter of the Vine, A	374	Michael Dred, Detective	426	Until the Dawn	478	History of South America from its Discovery till the Present Time	629
Daughters of Babylon, The	232	Millionaire's Daughter, A	527	Vibant Affair, The	694	History of the Colonization of Africa by Alien Races	191
David Harum	429	Miss Cayley's Adventures	121	Vicar of Wakefield, The	175	History of the London Church Missionary Society	520
Days of Auld Lang Syne, The	65	Miss Jean's Niece	375	Virginians, The	82	History of the New World called America	412
Dead Men Tell No Tales	557	Mistake of Monica, The	502	Virtue's Tragedy	640	History of the People of the Netherlands	306
Dear Irish Girl, The	317	Mistress Content Craddock	686	Vision Splendid, The	183	History of the Popes	228
Death that Lurks Unseen, The	558	Modern Mercenary, A	558	Warstock, The	239	History of Tonbridge School	141
Defender of the Faith	583	Mollie's Prince	239	Waters of Caney Fork, The	666	History of Winchester College, A	651
Deliverance, A	210	Monsieur le Premier	667	Waverley Novels, Border Edition	65	Idler in Old France, An	629
Dense Forest Sketches	557	Montblanc	695	Weaver of Runes, A	479	Jesuits in North America, The	278
Depopulation	22	Morals of John Ireland	694	Well, After All—	428	Jeuneuse de Napoléon, La	289
Desperate Voyage, A	640	Morals of the Midlands	479	When the Sleeper Wakes	555	Josephine de Beauharnais	289
Didums	612	More Methodist Idylls	640	White Lady of Khaminavotka	479	Kings of Kashmir	597
Domination of Dreams, The	373	Mormon Prophet, The	375	White Princess of the Hidden City, The	154	La Salle and the Discovery of the Great West	278
Double Thread, A	667	Mr. Passingham	694	Wild Humphrey Kynaston	478	Le XVIIIème Siècle	14
Dream of Fame, A	429	Mystery of the Medea, The	641	Window in Paris, A	71	Lives and Times of the Early Valois Queens	359
Drones Must Die, The	345	Newspaper Girl, The	315	Window in Thrums, A	61	Medieval Empire, The	139
Duet with an Occasional Chorus, A	184	No. 5, John Street	641	Windyhaugh	98	Modern England before the Reform	37
Duke of Linden, The	346	North Shore Mystery	65	World Bewitched, A	317	Napoleon I. in Russia "1812"	174
Duke's Servant, The	240	Northern Lights	502	World's Rough Hand, The	71	Napoleon's Invasion of Russia	677
Dumb Forgiveness	556	Odd Issues	347	Young Lives	316	Narrative of the Changes in the Ministry, 1765-1767	519
Earthly Fulfillment, An	239	Off the High Road	546			Old Régime in Canada, The	518
Enemy to the King, An	558	Old Chester Tales	120			Oliver Cromwell	675
Esprit Santo	400	Old Rogue's Tragedy, An	665			Oliver Cromwell and his Times	461
Etchingham Letters, The	71	One of the Tentacles	477			Farai, Jauna and Sikh	597
Eveline Wellwood	667	One of the Grenvilles	377			Philadelphia, the Place and the People	359
Failure of the Wanderer, The	528	One Poor Scruple	478			Pioneers of France in the New World	278
Fair Fraud, A	694	One Way of Love	239			Quaker Campaigns in Peace and War	518
Faith	503	On God's Lines	640			Reformation Settlement, The	512
Faith that Kills, The	20	On the Edge of a Precipice	479			Rise and Growth of American Politics, The	301
Farm in the Hills, The	640	On the Edge of the Empire	526			Rise of Portuguese Power in India	493
Fettered by Fate	429	Opera and Lady Gramercy, An	153			Robespierre and the Red Terror	546
Field of Clover, A	98	Optimist, The	423			Roman Society in the Last Century of the Western Empire	3
For Better For Worse	558	Our of the Night	184			Romance of the House of Savoy	6
Force, La	289	Passion Royal	558			Saladin and the Fall of the Kingdom of Jerusalem	463
Fortune's My Foe	555	Passing of Prince Rozan	122			Selections from the Sources of English History	441
Fowler, The	453	Pateron's Parish	20			Short History of Switzerland	258
Francois the Valet	346	Persuasion	65			Short History of the Saracens, A	541
Frank Rodland, Recruit	694	Peter Schlemihl, the Shadowless Man	317			Short History of the United States, A	301
Frivolities	556	Pettis Rosseries	96			Six Hundred Years	66
Game and the Candle, The	558	Phuburns the Egyptian	256			Souvenirs et Anecdotes de l'île d'Elbe	289
Garden Court Murder, The	502	Philosophy of the Marquise, The	527			Spain: its Greatness and Decay	112
Garden of Swords, The	640	Pickwick	65			Story of the Revolution, The	31
Gentleman from the Banks, A	665	P or Human Nature	346			Treize Vendémiaire An IV., Le	289
Gerald Fitzgerald	347	Poetie Farm	665			Waterloo	289
Gift of Bonaparte, The	239	Potterds	239
Girl of the Klondike, A	316	Pour Remettre à Franck	667
Glamour of the Impossible, The	584	President of Boravia, The	502
God Save England	558	Priestess and Queen	528
God's Greeting	693	Probable Tales	558
Greater Inclination, The	556	Puritans, The	666
Green Field, The	527	Pursued by the Law	429
Grey Weather	428	Quaker Maid, A	122
Guardians of Panzy, The	557	Queen of the Night	695
Gwen Penri	479	Rabbi Sanderson	22
Harry Ingleby, Surgeon	478	Raccourse and Battlefield	478
Heart of Denise, The	375	Rachel	476
Hermits of Gray's Inn	65	Ragged Lady	582
History of Tom Jones, The	346	Rainbow Feather, The	184
Horatio	683	Rapin, The	346
House of Rimmon, The	71	Rebels, The	527
Human Octopus, The	98	Red Bridal, A	318
Hunting Crop Hall	583	Red Rock	154
Helot and Hero	667	Repentance of a Private Secretary, The	121
Hester Morley's Promise	528	Ricraft of Withens	154
Histoire Mirifique de Saint Dodon	19	Riding the Devil	583
Idlehurst	316	Riding Recollections	278
Idyl of the Wabash	21	Roberte	667
In Guiana Wilds	694	Robespierre	584
In Vain	665	Romance of a Ritualist, The	239
In the Shadow of the Hills	317	Romance of Canvas Town	21
Individualist, The	582	Romance of Elisavet	694
Infatuation	153	Romance of the Lady Arbell	584
Intruders, The	479	Rory O'More	65
Jane Treachel	558	Runic Rocks	240
Jock's Ward	65	Rupert Armstrong	316
John Halifax Gentleman	558	Samuel Boyd of Catchpole Square	429
John Thaddeus Mackay	96	Scourge of God, The	317
Khou-n-atonou	20	Scowcroft Oracles, The	122
King of Shreds and Patches, A	479	Secret of Sorrow, The	665
Kingdom of Hate, The	347	Selman	557
Knaves of Diamonds	584	Semi-Detached Marriage, A	477
Knight of King's Guard, The	667	Settled out of Court	76
L'Aiguille d'or	667	Shadow of Life, The	240
La Mongautier	583	Shanghai	346
La Strega, and Other Stories	345	Shellback, The	558
La Terre qui Meurt	502	Shueyngain	175
Lady Lanark's Paying Guest	210	Sketches by "Boz"	21
Lady of Criswold, The	667	Social Upheaval, A	238
Lally of the Brigade	667	Son of the Empire, A	583
Le Double	667	Son of the Sea, A	557
Le Sang des Races	667	Spies of the Night	347
Les Messieurs de Séryac	640	Sporting Adventures of Charles Carington, Esq.	558
Lesser Destinies	96	Stolen Idea, A	210
Lettres de Malaisie	374	Stolen Story and other Newspaper Stories	666
Life at Twenty	240
Life's Peep-Show	667
L'Inimitable	317
L'Innocente de Rochebignon	210
Little Miss Robinson Crusoe	667
Lone Pine	210
Lost Provinces, The	667
Louissette	210
Love among the Lions	316
Love and Olivia

FICTION—(continued)	PAGE	FICTION—(continued)	PAGE	FICTION—(continued)	PAGE	HISTORY—(continued)	PAGE
Calumnies	556	Love the Widower	538	Story of Nanno, The	317	Cameos from English History	518
Captains, The	291	Luck of the Four-Leaved Shamrock, The	479	Story of Old Fort London, The	555	Catherine Bforza	34
Captain of the Locusts, The	533	Ma Mère	479	Strange Executioner, A	558	China	361
Cardinal's Page, The	121	Maître's Racehorse and other Stories	479	Strong Hearts	666	Chronology of India	493
Carr of Dimascur	479	Macane Izan	556	Sunningham and the Curate	502	Count Frontenac and New France under Louis XIV	518
Castle Czarnas	656	Madonna Mia	180	Sword of Allah	624	De Soto and his Men in the Land of Florida	40
Chapel F. 11k	209	Mam'zelle Grand'mère	556	Tales of Northumbria	583	Derniers Moments de Napoléon, Les	289
Child Abel, The	71	Man and his Kingdom, The	556	Tattle Tales of Cupid	666	Deutscher Volkstim	572
Cicely Vaughan	502	Man with Two Souls, The	209	Thecla's Vow	375	Deuxième Campagne d'Italie, La	289
Cloud of Dawn, A	21	Mandarin, The	583	Things that have Happened	478	Ecclesiastical History of Eusebius in Syria	597
Comédienne	667	Mandate, The	478	Three Cat's-Eye Rings	558	Ecclesiastical History of Evagrius	544
Confession of Catharine Storza, The	21	Many Ways of Love	528	Through a Keyhole	636	Emperor Hadrian, The	334
Confounding of Camelia, The	428	Marble King, The	218	Tom Benton's Luck	347	England in the Age of Wycliffe	353
Contraband of War	375	Market Harborough	230	Tom Tutton's Toll	317	English Reformation, The	512
Counterpart, The	154	Mary Unwin	428	Tom Tugg and Others	22	Fifty Years of the History of the Republic in South Africa	540
Countess Tekla, The	375	Marie de Mancini	528	Touch of the Sun	617	Founding of South Australia, The	226
County Scandal, A	694	Maternity of Harriett Wicken	316	Treasure Officer's Wooing, The	374	Gleanings from the Charter Chest at Cluny Castle	391
Cousin Ivo	428	Maureen Moore	240	Triumph of Failure, The	210	Half a Century of Conflict	518
Cromwell's Own	584	Maze of Life, The	640	Turkish Automaton	121	History of British India, A	247
Cruise of the Golden Wave, The	528	Member's Wife, The	96	Turkish Bonds	428	History of Corsica, The	307
Curios	71	Ménage du Pasteur Naudis, Le	695	Two Men of Mendip	133	History of Pasellus	544
Darh for a Thione, A	693	Merodech	429	Uncalled, The	527	History of Scotland	256
Daughter of the Vine, A	374	Michael Dred, Detective	426	Until the Dawn	478	History of South America from its Discovery till the Present Time	629
Daughters of Babylon, The	232	Millionaire's Daughter, A	527	Vibant Affair, The	694	History of the Colonization of Africa by Alien Races	191
David Harum	429	Miss Cayley's Adventures	121	Vicar of Wakefield, The	175	History of the London Church Missionary Society	520
Days of Auld Lang Syne, The	65	Miss Jean's Niece	375	Virginians, The	82	History of the New World called America	412
Dead Men Tell No Tales	557	Mistake of Monica, The	502	Virtue's Tragedy	640	History of the People of the Netherlands	306
Dear Irish Girl, The	317	Mistress Content Craddock	686	Vision Splendid, The	183	History of the Popes	228
Death that Lurks Unseen, The	558	Modern Mercenary, A	558	Warstock, The	239	History of Tonbridge School	141
Defender of the Faith	583	Mollie's Prince	239	Waters of Caney Fork, The	666	History of Winchester College, A	651
Deliverance, A	210	Monsieur le Premier	667	Waverley Novels, Border Edition	65	Idler in Old France, An	629
Dense Forest Sketches	557	Montblanc	695	Weaver of Runes, A	479	Jesuits in North America, The	278
Depopulation	22	Morals of John Ireland	694	Well, After All—	428	Jeuneuse de Napoléon, La	289
Desperate Voyage, A	640	Morals of the Midlands	479	When the Sleeper Wakes	555	Josephine de Beauharnais	289
Didums	612	More Methodist Idylls	640	White Lady of Khaminavotka	479	Kings of Kashmir	597
Domination of Dreams, The	373	Mormon Prophet, The	375	White Princess of the Hidden City, The	154	La Salle and the Discovery of the Great West	278
Double Thread, A	667	Mr. Passingham	694	Wild Humphrey Kynaston	478	Le XVIIIème Siècle	14
Dream of Fame, A	429	Mystery of the Medea, The	641	Window in Paris, A	71	Lives and Times of the Early Valois Queens	359
Drones Must Die, The	345	Newspaper Girl, The	315	Window in Thrums, A	61	Medieval Empire, The	139
Duet with an Occasional Chorus, A	184	No. 5, John Street	641	Windyhaugh	98	Modern England before the Reform	37
Duke of Linden, The	346	North Shore Mystery	65	World Bewitched, A	317	Napoleon I. in Russia "1812"	174
Duke's Servant, The	240	Northern Lights	502	World's Rough Hand, The	71	Napoleon's Invasion of Russia	677
Dumb Forgiveness	556	Odd Issues	347	Young Lives	316	Narrative of the Changes in the Ministry, 1765-1767	519
Earthly Fulfillment, An	239	Off the High Road	546			Old Régime in Canada, The	518
Enemy to the King, An	558	Old Chester Tales	120			Oliver Cromwell	675</

LITERATURE—(continued)		PAGE		MISCELLANEOUS—(continued)		PAGE		POETRY—(continued)		PAGE		THEOLOGY—(continued)		PAGE
Erasmus Shakespeare, The		112	362	Municipal Parks, Gardens, and Open		362	565	Poems of W. B. Yeats		565	63	Apostolic Christianity		63	520
Exotics and Retrospectives		539		Spaces of London, The		370		Rubbish of Omar Khayyam		61, 62, 383		Belief in Christ and other Sermons		63
George Herbert's "Country Parson"		64	516	Mysteries of Police and Crime		37	542	Sacred Songs of the World		542	304	Bible Stories		304	383
Gleanings from Goethe		363		Notes from a Diary, Kept Chiefly in		250		Scotland for Ever		86		Book of Daniel, The		465
Green Window, The		516	597	Southern India		516	542	Short Poems		542	64	Book of Devotions, A		304	64
Henrik Ibsen: Bjørnstjerne Bjørnson		648		Old Clocks and Watches and their		250		Shorter Poems of Robert Bridges		542		Book of Job, The		383
High History of the Holy Grail, The		163	597	Makers		516	543	Silence of Love, The		4	137	Books of Samuel, The		383	64
Historical Development of the Qur'an		597		Old English Social Life		173		Singsings through the Dark		543		Boys and Girls of the Bible		64
History of Bohemian Literature, A		594	441	On Centenarians		391	542	Some Verses		86	504	Catholic Gospel, The		64	63
History of Japanese Literature, A		193		Our Daily Fare		657		Songs and Poems		542		Catholicism: Roman and Anglican		137
History of the Alphabet, A		336	170	Our Gardens		538	543	Songs from the Ghetto		333	465	Christ, the Substitute		504	303
Idylls of Old Greece		441		Pleasure and Leisure Boating		538		Songs from the Hills		86		Christian Dogmatics		465
Impressions		170	168	Prophecies of the Brahman Seer, The		572	544	Songs of Robert Burns		64	304	Christian Institutions		303	199
In Quest of the Holy Grail		168		Right to Bear Arms, The		257		Songs of the Spirit		464		Christian Pastor and the Working		304
Interludes		516	329	Salvage		391	86	Sonnets and Epigrams on Sacred		86	519	Church, The		304	581
King Alfred's Old Version of Boethius		329		Solitary Summer, The		332		Stanzas of Omar Khayyam		61		Christianity and Anti-Christianity		465
Last Links with Byron, Shelley, and		34	171	Some Norfolk Worthies		332	542	Summer Sonnets		542	63	Church and the Sacraments, The		63	601
Leben und Werke, Alfred Lord Tenny-		34		Study of a Child		335		Translations from Pushkin		624		Church of Christ, The		304
Letters of Benjamin Jewett		646	169	Trip to Paradoxia, A		527	86	Ventures in Verses		86	520	C. mmandments of Jesus, The		63	654
Letters of Walter Savage Landor		169		Where Ghosts Walk		306		Verses		86		Dialogues of Athanasius and		654
Literary History of Ireland, A		410	64	Witwatersrand Goldfields, Banket and		416	543	White Hyacinths		543	519	Doctrine of the Twelve Apostles, The		519	657
Mahabharata		64		Mining Practice		416		Wind Among the Reeds		439		Early Christian Doctrine		519
Memoires d'Outre Tombs		198	335	Wood and Garden		305	543	With Songs from the Four Rivers		566	601	Eccelesiastical Situation in 1899, The		657	657
Miscellanies		335		MUSIC—				Works of Lord Byron		594		Elements of the Science of Religion		601
More		516	363	History of the Pianoforte and Piano-		573	535	POLITICAL—			114	English Reformation, The		657	390
Mystery of Shakespeare's Sonnets, The		516		forte Players		573		Break-Up of China, The		535		Epistle to the Hebrews		390
Mystic Rose from the Garden of the		363	166	Music and Manners from Pergolesi to		279	114	British Empire, The		114		Exposition of the Revelation of God,		199	114
King, The		363		Beethoven		279		Can We Disarm?		174		The		114
Nonvelles Etudes sur le XIXme		166	487	Musician's Pilgrimage, The		386	196	China in Decay		196	390	Expository Times, The		114	389
Paladin of Philanthropy, A		487		Old Scores and New Readings		279		Colonies and the Century, The		655		First Epistle of St. Peter		389
Pen and the Book, The		197	219	Old Violins		10	86	Democracy and Liberty		55	519	Four Recent Pronouncements		657	390
Periods of European Literature: XIV.		219		Voice and Violin		279		Educational Systems of Great Britain		86		Gospel according to St. Luke, The		390	389
Century		330	228	NATURAL HISTORY—			516	Ireland from One or Two Neglected		90	519	Gospel according to St. Mark, The		389	63
Portraits Imaginaires		330		Birds		276		Points of View		336		519	Gospel of Joy, The
Prophecy of the Century		30	228	Flora of Cheshire, The		532	516	Li Livres du Gouvernement des Rois		336	519	Hebrew Prophets, The		519	581
Prose e Tragedie scritte di Silvio Pellico		228		In the Australian Bush		226		Local Government		516		History of American Christianity, A		581
Purgatory of Dante Alighieri, The		519	652	My Roses		520	276	New Leviathan, The		307	519	History of Dogma		601	303
Rebelle sur la Sombre Route		519		Rambles with Nature Students		516		Political Struwwelpeter, The		555		History of the Church Missionary		303
Religion of Shakespeare, The		652	64, 278, 622	Records of Big Game		485	492	Politician's Handbook		258	519	Hope of Immortality, The		168	520
Reprints		64, 278, 622		Sketch-book of British Birds		276		Travel and Politics in the near East		415		Hymns and Hymn Writers		520
Richard Wagner's Prose Works		64, 278, 622	63	Wonders of the Bird World		276	492	PSYCHOLOGY—			516	Inscription Mandates des Coupees de		680	63
Rartor Resartus		63		NAVAL—			492	Essays in Psychological Research		516		Kingdom of Heaven, The		63
Scottish Vernacular Literature		64	278	All the World's Fighting Ships		492		Etudes Classiques et la Democratie,		199	519	Law's Serious Call		114	547
Selections from Addison's Spectator		278		American Cruiser in the East, An		556	Les		13	Life and Letters of Paul the Apostle		547
Shakespeare's Handwriting		61	533	British Merchant Service		146	Psychology and Life		683	519	Life and Teaching of Jesus Christ, The		520	230
Stanzas of Omar Khayyam		61		Cruise of the Cachalot, The		175	Psychologie de la Colonisation Fran-		656		Maxims of Pity and Christianity		304
Stories from Shakespeare		653	382	From Howard to Nelson		560	Psychology of Reasoning, The		13	338	Meditations on the Incarnation		304	304
Studies in Some Famous Letters		382		Great Campaigns of Nelson, The		175	Psychology of Suggestion		338		Meditations on the Love of God		304
Tales of the Enchanted Islands of the		40	277	Gunner Aboard the Yankee, A		175	415	Story of the Mind, The		338	519	Messiah Cometh		304	114
Atlantic		40		Idylls of the Sea		415		Discharge of Electricity through Gases		280		Modern Reader's Bible		114
Tatler, The		277	354	Life of Admiral Sir Wm. Robert		492	Early Chapters in Science		280	519	On the Relations between Church and		657	520
Tennyson: A Critical Study		354		Mends		258	683	Flashlights on Nature			227	State			657
Traditional Poetry of the Finns, The		253	653	PHILOSOPHY—			683	From Matter to Man		307	519	Oxford Library of Practical Theology		520	388
Translation of a French Metrical		253		Antichrist, The		275		Geometry of Position		416		Parson's Handbook, The		388
History of the Deposition of King		653	38	Aspect of Religious and Scientific		275	494	Psychology of Reasoning, The		13	338	Paul, the Man, the Missionary, and		547	573
Richard the Second		38		Thought		494	493	Psychology of Suggestion		338		The Roucher		547
Various Quills		38	332	Bases of the Mystic Knowledge		494	684	Story of the Mind, The		338	519	Practical Exposition of the Epistle to		388	657
Vicar of Wakefield, The		332		From Comte to Benjamin Kidd		626		Discharge of Electricity through Gases		280		Question of Anglican Orders, The		657	465
West Irish Folk Tales and Romances		302	363	Genealogy of Morals and Poems		493	684	Early Chapters in Science		280	Reformation Settlement, The		512	520
Wordsworth and the Coleridges		675	363	Heart of Man		684	684	Flashlights on Nature		227	Religion		520		303
Works of Wm. Makepeace Thacker-		82, 252, 538	684	Heresies		684	625	From Matter to Man		307	519	Reported Change in Religion, A		303
ray			625	Human Machine, The		625	416	Geometry of Position		416		519	Roman Primacy, The		600
Braid on Hypnotism		624	14	Introductory Logic		14	145	Goldfields of Australia, The		416	519		Rome from the Inside		600
Natural History of Digestion, The		56	626	Is Nature Cruel?		626	307	History of Astronomy, A		145		519	Saint Clotilda		230
Vaccination		516	84	Joubert, A Selection from his		84	654	History of Banking, The		145	519		Saint Polycarp		230
			437	Thoughts		84	654	Infinitesimal Analysis		307		519	Saint Vincent de Paul		230
			13	Lettres Inédites de J. S. Mill à		437	654	Intermediate Text-Book of Geology		654	519		Sermons, Biographical and Miscel-		337
			12	Auguste Comte		437	280	Introduction to Stellar Astronomy		654		519	laneous		337
			13	Logic: Deductive and Inductive		437	547	last Link, The		280	519		Sketch of Medieval Church History		607
			13	Monadology		13	145	Lectures on Theoretical and Physical		547		519	Spiritual Letters of Edward Bouverie		200
			13	My Inner Life		12	226	Chemistry		547	519		Puney		200
			13	Philosophy of Greece		13	439	New Astronomy		145		519	Story of the Oxford Movement, The		228
			684	Sextus Empiricus and Greek Scepti-		684	547	New Manual of Astrology, The		226	519		Theologia Pectoris		304
			363	cism		684	547	On Buds and Stipules		439		519	This Church and Realm		573
			59	Spinoza		363	654	Outlines of Industrial Chemistry		547	519		Thoughts on the Present Position of		580
			626	Spinoza's Ethics		363	653	Principles of Stratigraphical Geology,		547		519	Protestantism		580
			626	Sursur Corda		59	657	The		654	519		Three Children of Galilee		198
			626	Through Nature to God		626	653	Recent Advances in Astronomy		145		519	Twentieth Century New Testament,		200
			626	The Spoke Zanthustra		626	657	Science of Life, The		653	519		Typical Christian Leaders		64
			626	Twilight of the Idols, The		626	657	Sewage Analysis		653		519	Unheeding God, The		417
			13	Uncconscious Mind, The		13	280	Sound		280	519		Urban et Orbis		600
			85	POETRY—			87	Treatise on Dynamics of a Particle, A		87		519	Use of Sarum, The		544
			596	Alhambra and Other Poems		85	382	Treatise on Photographic Optics		382	519		Via Domini		465
			542	Ballads and Poems		596	280	Volcanoes		280		519	Was Christ born at Bethlehem?		230
			592	Ballads of Evolution		542	87	Way the World Went then		87	519		Wesley and Whitefield in Scotland		87
			465	British Anthologies		592		SOCIOLOGY AND ECONOMICS—				519	Women of the New Testament..		465
			465	Brythnodd's Prayer		465	547	Annals of Toll, The		547	519		TOPOGRAPHY—
			86	By Southern Shore		465	491	Economic Foundations of Society		491		519	All Souls College		680
			86	By the Western Sea		86	491	Economic Policy of Colbert		491	519		Braconese College, Oxford		88
			597	Century of Indian Epigrams, A		597	491	Economics		491		519	Chester Cathedral		40
			86	Charlides		86	492	Factory System and its Effects, The		492	519		Cotewold Village, A		113
			64	Child Harold		64	492	Foundations of Society, The		492		519	Downing College		679
			112	Coming of Love, The		112	572	Higher Life for Working People		572	519		Durham		538
			86	Coming of Spring		86	491	Landmarks in English Industrial		491		519	Eusebius Chased in Gold		442
			543	Demon of the Wind, The		543	601	History		601	519		English Cathedrals Illustrated.		442
			464	Diagrams of Two Lives		464	547	L'Année Sociologique		547		519	Famous Houses of Bath and their		391
			86	Erymanthos		86	167	Martyrdom of Labour, The		167	519		Occupants		114
			86	England and Yesterday		86	491	Native Tribes of Central Australia,		167		519	Queen's Magazine Library, Vol.xi.		391
			494	Epic of Ancient India, The		494	441	Right to the Whole Produce of Labour		441	519		Rhippeas of a Bedfordshire Village		113
			39	Forest Chapel, The		39	491	Temperance Problem and Social		491		519	High Crosses of Castledermot and		682
			86	Garland, The		86	491	Reform, The		491	519		Burrow		114
			543	Good Regent, The		543	6	SPORT—				519	Highways and Byways in Donegal and		488
			464	In a Village		464	543	Annals of Mont Blanc, The		543	519		Antrim		113
			543	In Borderland		543	360	Book of Golf and Golfers		360		519	Highways and Byways in North Wales		679
			464	In Glasgow Streets		464	514	Book of Sport, The		514	519		Kirk's College		657
			171	In Memoriam		171	90	East of Sport, The		90		519	Lichfield Cathedral		306
			464	In the Wake of the Sun		464	683	Kirk's Mountaineers, The		683	519		Loyal L'haber and its Associations..		363
			86	John Greenleaf Whittier's Poems		86	441	Fly Fishing		441		519	Merton College		682

UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA
walt,cls v.4

Literature.

3 1951 000 746 066 G